I would like to refer to my pleasant experiences and the earnest, cordial people, friends and strangers alike, but I am fearing I may trespass to much upon your valuable space, so I forbear mentioning only in conclusion the pleasure it afforded me in meeting with Mrs. Jennie Conant Henderson, the former Banner of Light message medium, who, with her husband, are now residents of Brooklyn, and also Mrs. Maud Lord Drake, who, with her husband, is holding Sunday meetings at 10 East 125th street. They have been away from New York, in California, and adjacent territory for a number of years, and they will be welcomed back by a host of admiring friends who, with many who know her only by reputation, will throng her meetings and be instructed by her inspired utterances upon the platform, and in her parlor meetings as well, for I venture to assert there have been very few mediums who have been held in higher esteem and who have made more converts by their mediumship among a class of New York's representative people, including its literati and those in all professions, who were attracted to her seances, and it is a great deal to say that in those days the genuineness of her mediumship was never, or rarely questioned.

Among this number were such men as Rev. H. W. Beecher, Henry Kiddle, Judge A. H. Dailey, of Brooklyn, Horace Greeley, and scores of other people many of whom have experienced the beautiful realities of a sojourn in that fair clime beyond the skies.

A public announcement was made by Mrs. Milton Rathbun, representing the New York State Association of Spiritualists, that a Mass Convention will be held in Elks Hall, 8th avenue and 59th street, New York City, on February 14, 15 and 16, details of which will be given later in your columns. It is believed that the holding of this convention at this time will accelerate the interest and good work now being done by the local societies, and a large attendance from all parts of the state is earnestly desired.

Your correspondent will represent the Spiritual press, take subscriptions and have copies for sale.

IMPORTANT SUBJECT DISCUSSED.

The Difference Between Inspiration and Obsession.

To the Editor:—The great work you are engaged in of spreading the real truth of what is commonly termed Spiritualism, to my mind, deserves the endorsement and hearty support of every lover of truth, no matter what his or her personal beliefs or prejudices may be.

That marked progress is being made toward a better understanding of the laws governing psychic phenomena and kindred subjects, is largely due to the free and frank discussions found in the columns of The Progressive Thinker, is, in my opinion, so evident a fact that it is hardly debatable.

One of the most important questions confronting us at the present time is that of so-called obsession. With your permission, I will, on this occasion, write a few words in reference to that subject.

What experience I have had teaches me that the difference between inspiration and obsession is one of degree only.

Why is it, then, that the one is eagerly desired and sought after while the other is feared and detested?

Simply because inspiration is what may be termed partial control, almost invariably by higher intelligences, and resulting only in good, while obsession is total, or nearly total control by intelligences in all stages of development, in fact, oftentimes so ignorant that their highest thought is the gratification of personal desires, and therefore resulting in evil.

So, after all, it is only a question of degree.

The question is, to what extent is inspiration desirable? And is it possible to control it at all, if so, how?

That any person in normal health need fear obsession by a spirit intelligence, I am positive that I can answer in the negative. Providing, of course, that they use the same precautions that they would to prevent control by an intelligence still in possession of an earthly body.

It seems to me that just a little common sense in this matter is all that is necessary. If a person in the body should persist in an endeavor to control our affairs and try to compel us to do things that we did not desire to do, it would not take any of us very long to infer him that he was overstepping the grounds of propriety, and he would be extended a hearty invitation to, as is commonly expressed in slang phrase, "take a walk."

Now, why is this not done where spirit control is attempted? Simply from the erroneous belief that because after a man is dead his power of control is greatly increased.

Whereas, the truth is, as I believe anyone can easily verify, the preponderance of evidence shows that exactly the reverse is what we can confidently expect.

After an intelligence has left the earthly body, its power to control other intelligences not yet passed out of the body, is so greatly lessened or decreased, that it is only after repeated trials, and with conditions entirely favorable, that anything at all can be accomplished in that direction.

How is it, then, I imagine some one will say, that obsession exists at all?

I answer, simply because the conditions have been made (not purposely, perhaps), but made just the same, for the result of obsession to be obtained.

Let us see if I can prove that: Look out upon the world to-day, and we see thousands of men and women crazed and ruined by the opium habit, and by the use of alcohol. I believe that nearly all intelligent Spiritualists will agree with me that these unfortunates are cases of obsession, pure and simple. How did they get into this condition? Simply by supplying the necessary conditions. How so? They have begun these habits gradually.

Take the use of alcohol, for instance, those who have taken any pains to investigate know, that around places where it is sold, congregate those spirits who in earth life were in the habit of using it to excess. They are there because it is the only place where their appetite for alcohol can be supplied or appeased.

Now, it is possible for a person to visit such places for years without any particular evil resulting, simply because, as I said before, the conditions must be very favorable for control.

On the other hand, not knowing what those conditions are, every person that enters there and indulges in the use of alcohol as a beverage, thereby lays himself liable to control, by furnishing the very conditions that are necessary.

Am I not right? Is there anyone that will tell me that any man can be controlled or obsessed to become a drunkard if he does not himself furnish the conditions?

What I have said of this one evil, I believe will apply with equal force to all others.

If we do not want obsession, let us be careful not to furnish the conditions.

We do not need to be nearly so careful, as I mentioned before, as we would to prevent what you might term earthly obsession, still there is no use of putting our heads into the halter and then complaining because we can be led.

I will admit that there are certain injuries and certain diseases that will furnish conditions favorable for obsession by spirits, but these cases are the exception and not the rule, and in any case, we have many practitioners who have been and are very successful in the treatment of such cases, any of whom rarely fail to give relief, and to these all such cases should be given, rather than holding them up as examples of the danger of obsession.

If we do not want control by inferior and ignorant spirits let us keep away from the dark circle, especially the mixed circle, where we know not who or what spirit intelligences may attend. Let us be careful what stimulants, drugs and narcotics we habitually use. In fact, let us use the same sense in protecting ourselves from harmful influences from the other side as we would from the same kind of influences from this side.

On the other hand, let us endeavor to furnish the conditions for the higher spirit intelligences to speak to us, and let us do this in precisely the same manner that we would to make agreeable conditions for those of earth life whom we deem worthy and capable of instructing us.

Let me see if I can explain my meaning clearly: In a recent number of The Progressive Thinker, there appeared an article from the pen of Prof. Larkin. The article mentioned was a most excellent one, as in fact are all his productions, but this one in particular seemed to me to be unusually good. Dealing as it did with the problem of the age and probable durability of the material universe, it came very close to being a good Spiritualistic essay, and I understand that Prof. Larkin disclaims any personal knowledge of anything beyond the material.

Now, that article was to me pretty good proof that, notwithstanding all that he has written and said upon the subject, Prof. Larkin is in reality, one of the best mediums in the country!

Why? you ask. Simply because he has made the necessary conditions for the passing through him from the higher intelligences to us, of facts that we can come into possession of in no other way.

The point I wish to make is this: In making the necessary conditions for the reception of truths from higher intelligences, Prof. Larkin very effectually closed the door to any danger of obsession from the lower.

Imagine, if you can, a drunken, frivolous, vicious or ignorant spirit going to the observatory on the top of the mountain in California and attempting to obsess or control Prof. Larkin while engaged in his work there. What arrant nonsense! A drunken tramp, still in the body, with a club in his hand, might stand some chance of accomplishing such thing, providing he could get up ambition enough to climb the mountain (which is decidedly improbable, by the way); but what show would a poor ignorant spirit, deprived of his body, have in trying to accomplish such a thing?

It seems to me that the logic I have used is unanswerable.

If it is not, let some one answer it. I am open for conviction, and above all, I surely want to know the truth.

If there is any such danger of spirit obsession without contributory negligence on our part, as many would make us believe, I am more than anxious to be convinced of the fact.

ST. JAUL AND MINNEAPOLIS.

How Christmas Wes Observed in the Twin Cities.

Will you kindly give space in your paper so that the friends who were not in the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis may know the societies of those two cities kept Xmas.

On Sunday the 23rd, the St Paul Alliance held continuous services, afternoon and evening. In the afternoon the Sunflower Lyceum held the boards, and having invited 100 children, through the Associated Charities, to join with them, served them a grand dinner, after which the Lyceum was called to order, and the afternoon spent in recitations, etc., after which was the Xmas tree, and every child invited was given a present beside the nuts and candy, also the members of the Lyceum. After the afternoon exercises closed the ladies served supper in the hall and had a good time; held circles at which all mediums present took part. The evening meeting was largely attended, and Mrs. J. P. Whitwell gave the address, and Mrs. Paul Buehler gave the messages.

In Minneapolis the Band of Peace Society gave up their regular services and turned the hall and platform over to the Progressive Lyceum scholars of the Band of Peace. Here, also, as at St. Paul, was rendered a splendid program by the scholars, and then an Xmas tree from which everybody, young and old, was remembered by Santa Claus.

On Sunday, December 30, the North Side Society of Minneapolis held their Xmas exercises, so as not to conflict with the Alliance of St. Paul and the Band of Peace.

On the same day, in the afternoon, the regular services were held at which H. Hegdahl delivered the lecture and Mrs. Courtney and Mrs. P. Buehler gave messages. At the close of the afternoon services the audience was invited to stay and partake of a grand feast prepared by the ladies of the North Side Society, and to have a good and enjoyable time, until the children's or Xmas tree, meeting in the evening, and as the president, Mr. H. Courtney, announced when inviting them to stay, "This is the North Side Xmas, and everything in the way of entertainment and refreshment is free to-day. We want you to stay and enjoy the day with us. I must mention here the music furnished by Miss Grace Davidson, Miss Martin and the singing of the North Side Sextette.

Before the gifts were distributed President J. S. Maxwell and others made short speeches to the children, and the children followed with musical numbers and recitations. After the children had received their gifts, Mr Hegdahl said that they had a surprise for the other people, left by Santa Claus. He called for Brother Maxwell to come first and draw from the basket. As there was nothing but strings hanging out, you took your choice of the strings, and passed on. At the other end of the string was the present. This caused much laughter and merriment. Everyone in the hall, members and visitors, shared alike, and everyone said that the North Side Society had done itself proud.

LAKE BRADY CAMP, OHIO.

An Excellent Showing for the New Management.

As it has been some time since you have had anything from Brady, I thought it would be well to let our friends know what we are doing.

Well, Lake Brady is still on the map, and the camp there is progressing finely, in spite of the fact that the present organization was handicapped by the failure of the old Lake Brady company. But, profiting by their mismanagement and failure, injecting new blood, and introducing business methods into the management, we have won the confidence of the people who have come to our assistance, and now, at the end of six years' hard work, we can say what very few camps can say, we own the grounds, have an auditorium second to none, and best of all, it is all paid for, and we have a nice surplus fund with which to make other improvements.

We will build a large rooming house this spring, furnished and equipped throughout, for our friends who wish to stay with us a week, or the entire season.

Our speakers and mediums selected for next season are among the best, viz., Dr. W. O. Knowles, Georgia Gladys Cooley, Anna L. Gillespie, Elizabeth Harlow, Oscar Edgerly and Marion Carpenter.

We will have meetings during the week, and will be prepared to entertain our friends better than ever before.

Our railroad facilities are ample, electric cars every five minutes, connecting at Kent, Ravenna, Akron and Cleveland, with lines to all parts of the State.

We most sincerely thank our friends who responded so nobly, and made it possible for us to accomplish so much.

SCENE IN THE GARDEN OF EDEN.

A Poetic Tale of the Snake and Adam and Eve.

The Devil stood guard in the garden
when Adam and Eve were alone;
Just why he stood guard in the garden will doubtless be ever unknown.
He seemed to be gardener and owner and knew the great value of fruit;
He told them the truth of the apple and put the great God in dispute.

Yes, someone had told them a falsehood (they thought it came down from the sky);
Had told them to eat of the apple meant simply and surely to die.
But when they both ate of the apple their nudeness was plain to their eyes;
They knew now the good from the evil;
they ate of the fruit and "got wise."

They knew not till then they were naked, and modesty brought a distress,
So they fastened and fashioned some fig leaves, and made each a cute little dress.
homeless to buffet the cold and the rain,
And they got so despondent and reckless they raised little Abel and Cain.

And when they got settled concluded, as land wasn't scarce, 'twouldn't harm
To settle right down as sole owners of this little earth, on a farm;
And this is the way it all happened: A snake, as the Devil's own tool, Saw Adam and Eve there together, and he started with them the first school.

He knew they were there as God made them, both naked and ignorant too,
And he knew full well without knowledge they would't find much there to do,
So he stood on his tail in the Garden and looked the two square in the eyes,
And he told them of things unrecorded, and was cursed for thus nailing the lies.

Too bad that the God of all wisdom put snakes in that beautiful place;
To tempt our poor ignorant parents to fall from their goodness and grace.
How sweet must have been their short wooing, how deep and how ardent their love,
'Mid the fruit and sweet flowers around them, a snake, and the great God above.

With none to disturb or make jealous;
no Grundys or peek-a-boo eyes;
With nothing between their lone spirits
but sunlight beneath the broad skies.
Oh, what a great pleasure to lovers, to be all alone for a time,
With no one to gossip and slander, or ripple the silence sublime.

Forbidden to eat of their product of only one tree were this pair;
But Eve was so hungry she tasted, and gave to her husband a share.
She thought it was good by its beauty,
But she would not devour it all;
She sampled and gave it to Adam—and that was the cause of his fall.

Now, this is the ancient old story of
Adam and Eve and the snake,
The father and mother of peing, and it reads like a gossipy fake.
Though taking the yarn as a symbol of wisdom, of cunning and wit,
The Lord wasn't in it a minute, but his snakeship was certainly IT.

That story has blinded for ages the ignorant spirit of man,
But now it is proven creation was due to intelligent plan.
Though none can remember the coming,
the route that is traveled is known,
For Darwin unearthed it and made it the pathway of Nature, alone.

Now science springs up and informs us,
with air of conceit in its trust,
That man has evolved from the monad,
and not from a handful of dust,
And this has inverted all fables of
Adam and Eve and the snake,
And given that ancient old Bible, as record, a modern-like shake.

THE CAUSE IN THE EAST.

A Great Variety of Meetings in Boston.

I have the pleasure of reading your incomparable paper every week. It is surely a magazine of valuable riches. As one who is trying to be an assiduous student of the occult, I must confess I have received more real benefit from perusing its pages than from all other sources combined.

Here in Boston we have a great variety of Spiritualist meetings, each doing its part in enlightening the people in regard to the verities of natural philosophy, but of late I have been more interested in the meetings held at the First Spiritual Temple, Newbury and Exeter streets. These meetings are presided over by Mr. M. S. Ayer, the owner of this magnificent Temple. For several years the speaker at the Temple has been Mrs. M. J. Willis, but during the present month, (January, 1907), the speaker is the well-known peer of all trance speakers, Oscar A. Edgerly.

It is truly remarkable the variety of subjects dealt with by the spirit guides of Mr. Edgerly, and each subject, whether scientific or metaphysical, is handled in an eloquent, logical and interesting manner. It is the general regret of the attendants at the Temple that Mr. Edgerly has not a longer engagement here at this time. He goes from here to Pittsburg, Pa., for February; however, we all sincerely hope that he may serve the Temple for a longer time next season.

I feel that the Spiritualists of this city have a right to be very optimistic as regards the general outlook for Spiritualism. We hear its principles enunciated in the churches, on the streets, in the homes, in fact, everywhere where the people congregate. Now that our dear old Banner of Light has become "non est," we hope The Progressive Thinker will be boomed in this vicinity.

PROPHETIC DREAMS.

Remarkable Incidents, demonstrating That the Future Is Often Revealed While the Body Is Sound Asleep, While the Soul May Be More Awake Than Ever.

Dreams that pass through our head during the night that is sacred to sleep, from whatever cause produced, frequently turn out to be prophetic in their character.

An instance is given of a young Italian lad named Lugi Tiranti, employed in a home for lost children in London, England, having a dream in which four numbers occurred frequently. So impressed was he that he saved up until he could afford to spend $3 on lottery tickets. At the drawing, which occurred shortly afterwards, the magic numbers were drawn, bringing him $80.

An elderly Oregon woman was the recipient a few years ago of an interesting present from Queen Alexandria. She then lived in Croydon, England, and had several dreams in which her majesty had given her a chair, a shawl, and a bible. Worried by the constant repetition of these dreams she wrote to the queen, and a day or two later a chaplain of the royal lady went to Croydon and fully inquired into her circumstances. Soon after the dreamer was made proud on receiving a beautiful, warm woolen shawl and a bible, on the fly-leaf of which was inscribed that it had been sent by command of the queen.

Dream Decides Breach Suit.

During a breach of promise suit an epistle written by the faithless lover was produced. In it he stated that he would rather terminate all relations with the young lady, as there were "no signs of the coal business ever becoming a fact." In explaining this peculiar reason the defendant stated that for three nights in succession he had dreamed that the father of the girl had been made rich by finding a rich seam of coal on one of his lands. This dream had led him to court the girl that he might investigate the matter and see the likelihood of the dream ever coming true, but his efforts being fruitless, he decided to break off the engagement. In summing up the case to the jury the judge commented scathingly upon the sordid motives of the mercenary lover and the jilted one was awarded $250 damages. The father, though a hard headed business man, could not rid himself of certain impressions received during the young man's telling of his oft repeated dream, so commenced boring for coal in the field and, as the sequel proved, found it in such rich quantities that he and his daughter are now worth a small fortune through such find. The faithless lover now wishes he had married the girl.

A story comes to us from Scotland of a dream being the means of saving the lives of two little children near Dumfries. They were daughters of a blacksmith and disappeared one evening at dusk. Search parties scoured the neighboring country during the night, but without success. One of the searchers went to bed early the next morning tired out with his long search, but, unable to sleep, he passed into an uneasy doze, when he dreamed that he saw the missing children in a hole at a certain part of the woods which he and others had passed in search during the previous evening. Though skeptical of dreams, he got up and went to the place, and, lo, and behold, he found the children fast asleep, though hidden by a dense pile of brushwood.

Mansfield Vision a Reality.

Richard Mansfield, the actor, once had a dream in London, England, which was the turning point in his career. It occurred years ago when Mr. Mansfield was trying to eke out an existence as a painter in London, that his training as a singer enabled him to obtain an engagement with D'Oly Carte in a traveling "Pirates of Penzance" company, but the manager of that company was so exacting, cutting salaries or imposing fines on the slightest excuse, that Mr. Mansfield found it hard to get along. As he did not yield promptly to unjust demands he at last was set adrift with hardly a shilling in his pocket. So he walked to London, found a cheap lodging house, and tried to get a job. On the third night away from the company he dreamed of being called back to play once again for D'Oly Carte. He dreamed he saw the secretary of Carte call upon him in a great hurry, rush his portable property into a traveling bag, and do the the lightning run for the next train. So plain and vivid was the dream that on awakening in the morning at 6 o'clock he jumped quickly out of bed, and without considering how foolish it might be began throwing things into his satchel. But when he had completed his toilet he began wondering why he had been acting so absurdly, when there came a knock at the door. On opening it he saw D'Oly Carte's secretary, just as in his dream; and he was in a great hurry, too! He cried out to Mansfield:

"Can you pack up and reach the station in ten minutes to rejoin the company?"

"I can," answered the actor, calmly pointing to the bag. "It is all ready, for I was expecting you."

The little man was a trifle scared, but Mansfield was bundled into a cab and they hurried away to the station in a way similar to his dream.

Finds Wife's Husband for Her.

Some years ago a wife's dream landed the man who deserted her in the Chicago jail. In 1894, George Baudler married a woman ten years older than himself in Carroll county, Illinois. For awhile he was satisfied with life as a farmer, but after six months of domestic happiness decided that the country was too slow for him, so he went to Chicago. But he forgot to tell his wife of his intentions or that he had taken all the available cash about the premises. Mrs. Baudler was surprised when George did not return, and when, after a week, nothing had been heard from him she had the country searched. The station agent told her that her husband had left by train, and, deciding that she had been basely deserted, she went to see George's mother, disguised as a fortune teller, where, showing a wondrous knowledge of the latter's affairs, she in turn obtained the information that George, her husband, had gone to Chicago. Borrowing money, she left for the city, but might not have located the object of her search had it not been for a dream she had concerning his whereabouts. The fourth night after landing in Chicago she saw, in a dream, her husband coming out of a building which she recognized as Tattersall's. Next day she went there and saw that the real building was a bicycle factory; and at noon she saw her recreant spouse go to lunch. He afterwards was arrested and jailed on a charge of desertion.

Saved From Hanging by Dream.

Another dream comes from St. Louis, in which a wife charged with the murder of her husband is saved and the real murderer discovered through a dream she had concerning the event. Her name was Mary Thornton and she had been in jail a month, when she requested one of the jailers to let her see the judge. This being done she told him that she dreamed that a man named George Ray murdered her husband. Full details of how such murder occurred was given by her to the astonished judge, who was so impressed by the woman's earnestness that he caused a search to be immediately made for Ray. The man was found, and, the judge, charging him with the murder, recited the details of the occurrence as the woman had given them. Ray was thunderstruck. It was as if some one watching him commit the crime had reported the matter in every detail. He confessed to everything and the woman immediately was released.

JOHN MORRIS.

FRAUD IN SPIRITUALISM.

A Trenchant and Comprehensive Statement by the President of the N. S. A.

All intelligent Spiritualists are watching with deep interest the fearless course of the Los Angeles Herald in its exposures of fraud practiced by unscrupulous persons under the cloak of mediumship. That there is fraud, and large qualities of fraud, we are forced to admit in shame and sorrow, yet by that admission rational Spiritualists by no means declare that all of the occult phenomena of the times are spurious. On the contrary, they hold (and with good reason) that the phenomena of Spiritualism are as well established as to their genuineness as is the formula H-2O in chemistry. In warring against fraud, therefore, these truth-seeking men and women respectfully request that a just consideration be shown to the genuine phenomena presented to the world by Spiritualism. In pulling up the tares in which work all honest Spiritualists will most heartily unite with the Herald, it is but fair to suggest that care should be taken lest the wheat be destroyed also. There are those who are qualified to speak with authority on these subjects, and their opinions should be treated with as much respect as those of the great specialists in any field of scientific research.

What Darwin and Wallace accomplished in the field of Evolution, Crookes, Lombroso, Varley, Damiani, Hare, Mapes, Dodge and others have done in the field of Psychism. The Literary Digest of December 15 contains an interesting and instructive translation of part of an article by Father G. G. Franco, orginally published in the Roman Civilta Catholica, a papal organ. In this article Father Franco takes the bold position that the phenomena of Spiritualism ARE SCIENTIFICALLY ESTABLISHED, and that they are questioned only by those men "Whose feet are upon earth but whose wits go wool gathering in the moon." He numbers some of the learned professors in the Universities of Italy in this class, likewise some specialists in psychology.

It is not to be supposed that the Herald writers will claim that they are better able to weigh evidence than Crookes, Lombroso and their compeers. Nor can we imagine that they will accept Father Franco's conclusions in regard to all psychic phenomena. He admits their genuineness, at least the genuineness of many of them, but ascribes their origin either to "Satan" or to "unclean spirits." To admit the interference of "dark" or "unclean spirits" in mundane affairs would be to admit the genuineness of psychic phenomena. The Herald writers are, we hope, not on intimate terms with any of the powers of evil, hence we trust that they will heed Ingersoll's admonition and "let the little lamp of reason shine!" This light would lead them to see that there is a scientific basis for these phenomena and that they are not produced outside of nor above natural law, but in perfect harmony with it. In the LIMELIGHT OF NATURAL LAW, Satan and the unclean spirits quickly disappear, and forever, from the gaze of intelligent people.

Many Catholic prelates admit the scientific, likewise the religious, aspects of psychic phenomena, but hold that they are the property of the Holy Catholic church, hence should not be presented outside of its sacred walls. Not a few progressive Spiritualists freely admit that there are Catholic priests far better qualified to handle these phenomena intelligently and instructively than are many of the so-called mediums in Spiritualism, yet they strenuously object to any and all vested rights and special privileges in spiritual things, hence hold that these phenomena are for the common good of our sorrowing humanity everywhere, consequently plead for their presentation in all sincerity of purpose and honesty of soul to meet the common needs of all the suffering sons and daughters of God. This plea is ever accompanied by a demand that these phenomena shall bear the unmistakable stamp of GENUINENESS, and have no connection whatever with the commercial elements with which the Herald is so courageously dealing.

All that fair-minded, intelligent Spiritualists request of the Herald is this: That due emphasis be laid upon the genuine phenomena that Spiritualism has long since proved to the world whenever an exposure of a counterfeiter takes place. All Spiritualists of any standing are demanding that the augean stables be purged of those elements of wickedness that have long been hidden in them. They will gladly lend their aid and their experience to the work in question, but they ask in all sincerity that the residuum of truth which they know they have for the children of men, be made as conspicuous and equally as emphatic as the admitted presentations of fraud and chicanery. Truth only asks a hearing, for it never fails to overcome Error whenever it is given an opportunity to do so.

Yours for the Truth,

HARRISON D. BARRETT,

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A Very Suggestive Work Which Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1.00.

"Death, Its Meaning and Results." By J. K. Wilson, of the Pennsylvania Bar. An absorbingly interesting volume, of decided value. A narrative of wonderful psychical events in the author's experience. Cloth, 560 pages, illustrated, $1.25.

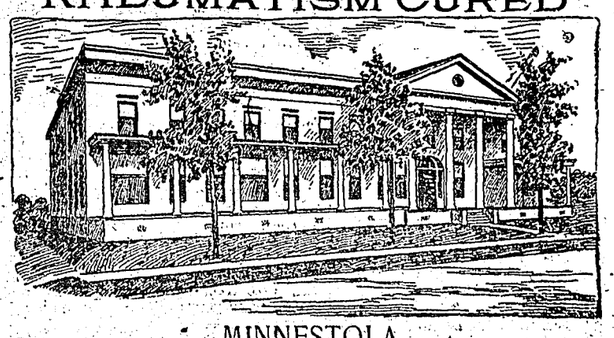
SIX HISTORIC AMERICANS.

A Book That Every American Freethinker Will Delight to Own.

By John E. Remsburg.

The work consists of two parts, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "The Saviors of Our Republic." In regard to Paine's religious views, Mr. Remsburg establishes the negative of the following (1) Was Paine an Atheist? (2) Was he a Christian? (3) Did he recant? Page after page of the most radical freethought sentiments are culled from the correspondence and other writings of Franklin and Jefferson, which show that these men were as pronounced in the rejection of Christianity as Paine and Ingersoll. That Washington was not a Christian nor a believer in Christianity. In support of Lincoln's infidelity he has collected the testimony of more than one hundred witnesses.

The book is handsomely bound in cloth, giving fine portraits of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant; also portrait of the author.



This book contains 365 pages, printed on heavy paper, well bound in cloth. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY.

Scaling Heaven.

The Bible tells us they, without designating who were meant by they, determined to build a city and a tower whose top may reach into heaven. "And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower." But the Lord saw nothing would restrain these children of men which they have imagined to do, so, to defeat their aspirations, he confounded their language to the end they could not understand each other, and he scattered them upon the face of all the earth, so they left off to build the city. See Genesis 11:2 to 9.

This story of priestly ignorance and pretended inspiration, was doubtless related to account for the multitude of languages spoken on the earth, all the production of human needs among peoples widely separated from each other. It was recalled as we read an account of a fifty story building to be erected in New York by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. The structural steel is already in process of manufacture. Access to the various stories of the Babel tower, probably not a half dozen at most, according to pictures in illustrated Bibles, was gained by a spiral roadway around the outside of the structure. It would have been a tiresome trip up such an ascent round and round to heaven, though greatly preferable to the ladder route on which it is alleged Jacob saw angels ascend and descend.

Our moderns build heavenward because the earth is too expensive in New York and other great cities, to spread their structures over large areas. And these New Yorkers expect to scale heaven by riding up on the wings of the almighty dollar. We apprehend they will be as unsuccessful as were the inhabitants of Shinar.

Still Harping on the Old Subject.

Senator Burkett, of Nebraska, is anxious to secure the indorsement of his Christian constituents by proposing the adoption of a joint resolution by Congress prohibiting the handling of mail matter on Sunday, together with the selling of stamps, and the transaction of any business with the public pertaining to the mails. He gives as a reason for this, that postoffice clerks and carriers should have Sundays for rest, and for attending church services.

As nights, when the sun is in hiding, is the period Nature evidently designed for rest, and as our secular government has nothing to do with churches, why not legislate to compel the people to sleep and rest nights, to the end they can toil to better purpose when the sun illumines the world? Such legislation would be to the interest of health and public morals. The Senator's plan would be in the interest of the preachers, and them only. There is no sense in agitating this subject. The priesthood have been laboring for more than a century in the same direction, and their efforts grow feebler each time they enter Congress with their petitions.

Arose Early Dead Corpses.

"Then the angel of the Lord went forth and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand, and when they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses."—Isaiah xxxvii:36.

Got up and found themselves dead corpses would ordinarily be counted an Irish bull, but we have divine authority for the expression. It must have been an accomplished fact, else the sacred historian would not have related it. A grim and ghastly sight to see 185,000 dead corpses arising in the morning, still ignorant that the angel had smote, that is killed, them the night before.

SPECIAL NOTICE!

The Spiritualists of the world are respectfully requested to take notice that Mrs. Mattie E. Hull is to continue the great work to which her honored and signally gifted husband, Moses Hull, has devoted his whole life. She feels as if she must finish the work he left undone, as well as complete her own. Let us see to it that her noble endeavor, her unselfish resolution, is carried out in full. Let us send her our sincerest sympathy, our truest inspiration, our best thoughts to sustain her as she moves on over the journey of life alone in the mortal, to the end that she may feel less keenly the loss that is hers, and be able to bless the world by reason of what she is able to do for our beloved Cause. Mrs. Hull will undoubtedly remain on the Pacific Coast until spring is well advanced. Her address until further notice is 230 North Sixth street, San Jose, Cal.

The Christmas Festival.

An English clergyman protests against the observance of Christmas. He says overfeeding characterizes a majority of those who participate in the festival, while the spiritual aspect of the solemnities is conveniently and unblushingly ignored in favor of worship at the kitchen altar. He adds: "A bird's carcass, a pint of beer and a piece of swine's flesh constitute the pivot of Christmas joy."

Has the good dominie ever taught his parishioners and the Christian world, that in glorifying Christmas, they are honoring an old pagan holiday, which the founders of their sect stole from Roman mythology? If not he has not done his duty.

We quote in substance from Lemprier's Classical Dictionary, article "Saturna":

"A festival celebrated say some on the 18th of December. It was instituted long before the foundation of Rome [753 years before our era] in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. * * * The Saturnalia were originally celebrated for one day, but afterwards the solemnity continued for three, four, five, and at last for seven days. The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which universally prevaled. The slaves were permitted to ridicule their masters, and speak with freedom on any subject. It was usual for friends to make presents, one to another, all animosity ceased, no criminals were executed, schools were shut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot and debauchery. In the sacrifices the priests made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a custom never observed at other festivals."

The date of these festivals, as given by ancient authors vary a few days, but all agree it was at the winter solstice when the sun, in its seeming annual movement southerward had reached its extreme limit, and had given evidence of its return northward, with greater warmth and light, to be soon followed by verdure, birds and flowers.

All the old sun gods were credited with being born on the 25th of December. Such was the case with Osiris of Egypt, Mithras of Persia, Dionysus of Greece, Bacchus of Rome. The latter god bore some forty different names, one of which was Jes. If, as many scholars contend, this Jes was Romanized by adding to it the Latin terminal us, forming Jesus, then, of course it is correct to fix the date of his birth on the 25th of December, with the other sun gods.

But note: Chambers' Encyclopedia, article Jesus, says:

"As to the month or day of the birth of Jesus, nothing is known, although the circumstance that the shepherds were watching their flocks by night makes it certain it did not take place at that time at which the Christian festival is held."

The same author, in the article "Christmas," repeats the same idea, but adds: "Among the early churches some held the festival in May or April, others in January."

Should it finally appear that a God was never born of woman, then the claim of Topsy that she "was never born, but just growed," may have force in regard to the hero of the popular faith.

The clergyman, however, who has furnished us this subject for review, made a good point against gormandizing, whatever the origin of the festival.

English for English Readers.

"Words are only coins to facilitate the interchange of ideas, and the best word is that which serves the purpose most clearly and concisely." So said S. Laing, a well-known English author in his, "A Modern Zoroastrian." That author writing for English readers will gain the greatest admiration and widest reading, who forgets his classics when he writes, and confines himself the closest to his English vernacular. It looks like pedantry to be constantly using untranslated foreign phrases in the midst of an article which it is expected the populace is to read. Many a book is rendered unpopular by the amount of Greek, Latin and French switched into its pages.

ENGLAND'S NEW THEOLOGY.

Based on Immanence of God, Says the Rev. R. J. Campbell—Every Man a Potential Jesus Christ—Worship Due Him as Humanity's Highest—Atonement Rejected; Immortality Retained—In Harmony With Science.

The great modifications in religious belief which are taking place throughout the Christian world have recently been manifesting themselves with especial prominence in England. The leader in radical revision of faith is R. J. Campbell, pastor of the City Temple and the recognized head of the English Nonconformists. He is about to make a tour of the country, addressing gatherings of provincial pastors at their request upon the "Restated Theology." Inasmuch as Mr. Campbell rejects many of the chief dogmas of the Bible, such as the story of the fall of man, it will be seen how radically different from the old is the new theology, which is supplanting the religious beliefs of a generation ago in England.

Mr. Campbell states his views with the utmost frankness in the London Daily Mail, and inasmuch as he is almost as well known in America as in his own country they will attract equal attention on the other side of the Atlantic.

"We object," he says, "to the formal statements of belief which have distinguished the theology of the past. We object to ecclesiastical labels. Every one knows that for the last twenty years there has been considerable uneasiness in the churches, due largely to the development of scientific knowledge, the progress of archaeology and the study of comparative religion. This uneasiness has affected every church, even Rome. From the side of science the new theology is typified in the work of men like Sir Oliver Lodge. The lines of divergence between the old and the new go down deep and there is great cleavage.

"The starting point of the new theology is belief in the immanence of God and man. This is where it differs from Unitarianism. Unitarianism made a great gulf and put man on one side and God on the other. We believe man to be a revelation of God and the universe one means to the self-manifestation of God. The word 'god' stands for the infinite reality whence all things proceed. Every one, even the most uncompromising materialist, believes in this reality. The new theology in common with the whole scientific world believes that the finite universe is one aspect or expression of that reality, but it thinks of it or him as consciousness rather than a blind force, thereby differing from some scientists. Believing this we believe that there is thus no real distinction between humanity and the Deity. Our being is the same as God's although our consciousness of it is limited. We see the revelation of God in everything around us.

"The new theology holds that human nature should be interpreted in terms of its own highest; therefore it reverences Jesus Christ. It looks upon Jesus as a perfect example of what humanity ought to be, the life which perfectly expresses God in our limited human experience. So far as we are able to see, the highest kind of life that can be lived is the life which is lived, in terms of the whole, as the life of Christ. Every man is a potential Christ, or rather a manifestation of the eternal Christ—that side of the nature of God from which all humanity has come forth. Humanity is fundamentally one; all true living is the effort to realize that oneness. This is the truth that underlies all noble efforts for the common good in the world to-day.

"The new theology looks upon evil as a negative rather than a positive term. It is the shadow where light ought to be; it is the perceived privation of good; it belongs only to finiteness. Pain is the effort of the spirit to break through the limitations which which it feels to be evil. The new theology believes that the only way in which the true nature of good can be manifested either by God or man is by a struggle against the limitation; and therefore it is not appalled by the long story of cosmic suffering. Everybody knows this after a fashion. The things we most admire and reverence in one another are things involving struggle and self-sacrifice.

"The new theology watches with sympathy the development of modern science, for it believes itself to be in harmony therewith. It is the religious articulation of the scientific method. It therefore follows that it is in sympathy with scientific literature known as the Bible. While recognizing the value of the Bible as a unique record of religious experience, it handles it as freely and as critically as it would any other book. It believes that the seat of religious authority is within (not without) the human soul. Individual man is so constituted as to be able to recognize, ray by ray, the truth that helps him upward, no matter from what source it comes.

"The new theology, of course, believes in the immortality of the soul, but only on the ground that every individual consciousness is a ray of the universal consciousness and cannot be destroyed. It believes that there are many stages in the upward progress of the soul in the unseen world before it becomes fully and consciously one with its infinite source. We make our destiny in the next world by our behavior in this and ultimately every soul will be perfected.

"From all this it will surely be clear that the new theology brushes aside many of the most familiar dogmas still taught from the pulpit. We believe that the story of the fall in the literal sense is untrue. It is literature, not dogma, the romance of an early age used for the ethical instruction of man. We believe that the very imperfection of the world to-day is due to God's will and is a working out of Himself with its purpose a purpose not wholly hidden from us.

"The doctrine of sin which holds us to be blameworthy for deeds that we cannot help we believe to be a false view. Sin is simply selfishness. It is an offense against the God within, a violation of the law of love. We reject wholly the common interpretation of atonement, that another is beaten for our fault. We believe not in a final judgment, but in a judgment that is ever proceeding. Every sin involves suffering, suffering which cannot be remitted by any work of another. When a deed is done its consequences are eternal.

"We believe Jesus is and was divine, but so are we. His mission was to make us realize our divinity and our oneness with God and we are called to live the life which he lived."

Some impose upon the world that they believe that which they do not; others more in number, make themselves believe that they believe, not being able to penetrate into what it is to believe.—Montaigne.

PROFESSOR LOMBROSO.

He Is a Spiritualist, and What He Says in Some Respects Sounds Like a Fairy Tale—He Says: "A small bell was put on the ground, about half a yard from Eusapia, and all at once her skirt was seen to bulge out as if it had been a bladder filled with gas, and in a moment the bell was seized and rung by what Professor Lombroso calls 'gaseous arms.'"

Under the heading, "Why I became a Spiritualist," Professor Cesare Lombroso, writing in the January number of "The Grand Magazine," says:

"Until 1890 Spiritualism had no fiercer nor more obstinate opponent than I," but in 1892 he was summoned, in his medical capacity, to attend a girl who had been suddenly attacked by violent hysteria. At times she lost the faculty of sight, but was able to see the tip of her ear, and although her eyes were completely bandaged she could read some lines of a page held before her ear. Subsequently her sense of taste was transplanted to her knee, and her sense of smell to her toes. She could see her brother when he was in the wings of a music-hall at a distance from her room, and could feel the approach of her father while he was yet several hundred yards away. She foretold the day and time when she would lose the faculty of walking, and when she would be seized with an irresistible desire to bite.

Although all the clocks and watches in the house were stopped, yet her prediction was accurately fulfilled. Her paralysis, she declared, would be cured by the application of aluminum, and all attempts to deceive her by employing other metals were in vain; she detected the substitution immediately, and when aluminum was used she grew better.

These facts caused Professor Lombroso to surmise that there might possibly be something in Spiritualism which could explain them, and a few years later he had an opportunity of sitting with Eusapia Paladino, and witnessed some striking phenomena in the light—for he refused to take part in any experiments carried out in the dark or in public seances. He saw a table rise from the floor and a small trumpet dart from the bed to the table and back again, when he was in a room alone with the medium, and at another seance he heard "rappings," and says that he was much struck by the fact that "a curtain in front of an alcove suddenly stood out towards me and enfolded me, as it were, with a strange persistence; for several seconds I could not succeed in disentangling myself from it. It felt exactly like a thin sheet of lead."

A plate of flour was found turned bottom upwards, and the flour, which was previously dry, was in a sort of gelatinous condition, which lasted for more than a quarter of an hour. "Just as we were all on the point of leaving the room," he says, "a ponderous sideboard which was in a far corner, began to glide in my direction, as if it had been some enormous pachyderm advancing to attack me."

On another occasion he placed a Regnier dynamometer on the table, in broad daylight, at about half a yard from the medium, and asked her to exert pressure from that distance.

"Suddenly," he says, "I saw the needle indicate 42 kilogrammes, while in her normal condition, Eusapia could never make it mark more than 36."

A small bell was put on the ground, about half a yard from Eusapia, and all at once her skirt was seen to bulge out as if it had been a bladder filled with gas, and in a moment the bell was seized and rung by what Professor Lombroso calls "gaseous arms."

In Milan, at a seance at which Professor Richet was also present, both professors saw "a branch of roses grow, as it were, and slowly come out of the sleeves of our coats, the flowers as fresh as if cut at that instant." Eusapia was asked to write her name on the top sheet of a block of paper. Using Schiaparelli's finger, she declared that "she had written her signature," but no one could see a sign of it; finally the writing was discovered on the inner side of the white tablet.

On another occasion the writing was found on the last leaf but one of the block of paper. Eusapia was put upon a weighing machine, and her weight increased and decreased by more than twenty pounds. Professor Lombroso says "we were all able at will"—to make these differences—which we are somewhat inclined to doubt.

The medium's hands and feet were firmly held, and sometimes her feet were tied securely. Her clothes were all completely removed, and she was dressed again in garments supplied by the sitters so that "there could be no possible suspicion of anything fraudulent."

At later seances, Eusopia, in a state of trance, gave perfectly intelligible and even intellectual answers in languages, such as English, of which she had no personal knowledge, and at times, "suddenly modelled bas-reliefs impossible to produce instantly in normal conditions, and especially for an uneducated person of her description," and those experiences compelled Professor Lombroso to "yield to the conviction that spiritualistic phenomena, if due in great part to the influence of the medium, are likewise attributable to the influence of extra-terrestrial existences."—Light, London, Eng.

"I SEE ANGELS COMING."

And the Child Closed Her Eyes, and Saw a Vision, and Then Fell Back and Died.

"I see the angels coming."

Little two-year-old Alice Glicker, who told her mother she was "always in the way," has gone to join them. She died just as a little daughter was born to Mr. and Mrs. Glicker of Steger, Ill.

New Year's Day the child told her mother she was going to die soon. She became troublesome and was reproved by her mother.

"I'm always in the way, mamma," she answered. "Soon the angels will come to take me. Then you will be sorry."

Soon afterward Alice was taken ill. Wednesday a baby was born and Alice's father went into her room to tell her of her new sister.

"I guess the angels brought it to mamma so she would not miss me so much," said Alice. "They are going to take me back with them."

Then the child closed her eyes and saw a vision that seemed to please her. She laughed and clapped her hands together.

"They are coming for me now," she said, and fell back dead.—Chicago Evening American.

CHARGE FROM THE SPIRIT SIDE OF LIFE

To the First Society of the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, Voiced Through the Lips of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Chicago, Sunday, January 13, 1907.

The word Fraternity is the highest word in the English language, excepting that from which it is derived: Love.

When one enters a sanctuary, whether it be of the mind and spirit, or an outward temple, one cannot enter without the right spirit. Before one can enter a Fraternal Society of Spiritualists one must be a Spiritualist and must be, also, fraternal.

In the realm of souls all souls belong to the Infinite love. In the realm of spirits all spirits are brothers and sisters, and whatever shadows rest upon them, those who are in the light are to help to remove by whatever light is theirs. Those who are seeking the light should seek to fully attain it.

As "perfect love casteth out all fear," so it casteth out all hatred and all of the results of hatred, and the spirit life finds no shadows that cannot be penetrated by the spiritual light and the spirit of love and the spirit of truth. As falsehood cannot abide in the presence of truth, as darkness cannot abide in the presence of light; so there can be no lack of fraternity where there is perfect fraternity and the perfect finding that all life leads in the ultimate to the highest and best flowering out of every human life, which will ultimately be perfect.

Between the states of the first sowing of the seed of spiritual knowledge and the attainment of this individual perfection all the struggles that belong to the individual must come. Those personal and individual struggles are matters of personal and individual seeking for truth. So in the helpfulness that can be given to those who are seeking, the spirit world finds nothing so helpful to one's own state as the aid, care and helping of others. Nothing so assists in the obtaining of knowledge as the imparting of what is known to others; nothing so helps to the attainment of love and wisdom as the giving and manifestation of love and wisdom to others.

It is the supreme law of the spirit that there can be no personal growth without helpfulness unto others; that no knowledge can come unless there is the imparting of knowledge. As the fountain must give forth its waters in order to receive the clear waters that shall renew its life, so every human spirit must give unto others of that which it possesses. If it is strength of the body, one must give that; if it is strength and knowledge of the mind, one must give that; if it is the possession of the power of the spirit, one must give or impart it to others, that one may receive more light from those fountains of life and light.

To this great truth that is manifested unto the world people must look for added knowledge and light. What each and all shall do with this light, the person must decide. If the fountains are kept clear and free and pure, so will the knowledge be. If they are clogged by selfishness, or bitterness, or unworthiness, then the waters cannot flow and the fountains cease to give their life and light. Therefore, as Spiritualism, which was inaugurated by the spirit world, has become the message of the conquest of life over death, so it is becoming the Comforter unto those who have received its inspiration, its philosophy and its religion by its manifestations throughout the whole world.

Fittingly now, the fruitage of that work must be the Fraternity of such lives as have been blest and benefited by its ministrations, and the spirit world looks to you to be loyal to this cause; to be loyal to your gifts of the spirit; to be loyal to one another. You could not be disloyal to any of the human race if you are true to the great spiritual light that has come into the world.

Now as this bond of fraternity is expressed, the spirit world welcomes that which will bind you more closely in the Spirit of Spiritualism that is to come to the world. And in that spirit, and in that fraternity, the Spirit World bids greeting to the spirit of this promise; to this order that promises to unite you; to this strength and light that will be helpful to you in bearing forward this message to the world.

From that White Light, where those who are united in the spirit of Truth and Love, and where all souls are the children of God, we give this, our Fraternal Charge.

IN THE ETERNAL NOW.

In the Eternal Now I stand,
In time and on th' eternal strand;
I hold the past, the present see,
And living grasp eternity.

Within the zones of transient time,
I dwell in the ethereal clime
Of the eternal Now; I am
A vibrant chord in Being's psalm.

The changing seasons come and go,
As drift on the eternal flow;
All finite things float on and on,
But life eternally is one.

Within the changing form of death
Is manifest life's ceaseless breath;
Within death's dark, destroying strife,
Behold the everliving Life.

Within the frown of dark decay,
See Life's bright smile forever play;
And in the depths of darksome night
Dwells the eternal, infinite light.

Though nations rise and people's fall,
Great Being's life preserveth all;
In the eternal verities,
God knoweth every soul is His.

Ever alone, yet ne'er alone,
The soul may wend from zone to zone;
From birth to grave or highest throne,
Great Being ever keeps its own.

Within the Spirit's endless morn,
All time and space are matter-born;
Within the earth's e'er-changing show,
I sense the Now eternal flow.

The narrow vision born of earth,
Expands afar by spirit birth;
I sense mid fading, passing breath,
Life is the other side of death!

O'erspanning Time's illusive dreams,
The everlasting Real gleams;
Through Time's illusive, transient night,
Shines clear the calm eternal light.

Through all Time's change and ceaseless strife,
Death is but other side of life!
The shadow veiling land and tide,
Is sunshine on the other side!

Still They Are Coming!

A letter from Dr. Davis indicates that a change has been made in the price of a full set of his remarkable works. They will be furnished per set when republished at $20 instead of $30, as heretofore announced. There are thousands who ought to have a set of these books. Their publication at an early day depends on the number of subscribers that can be secured. His books are a fundamental part of Spiritualism; the history of Spiritualism can not be written without them.

Since last week, the following subscribers to a full set of the Doctor's works have come to hand:

Louis H. Freedman writes from 32 S. Wood street, Chicago: "Please put me down as a subscriber for one set of A. J. Davis's works. Have you any idea when they will be published? I am not able to give you a permanent address at the present writing, but will be at this number until May, 1907, at any rate." They will probably re-published within the next 18 months by some one.

A gentleman who doesn't want his name mentioned, subscribes for a full set of Dr. Davis's works.

J. R. Francis will take five sets of his works.

A NEW EDITION.

The Unknown Life of Christ.

We have had a new edition of the Unknown Life of Christ printed, and it is gotten up in magnificent style, and for the benefit of students in psychic lore we have appended thereto the important lectures delivered by Col. Olcott and Miss Elizabeth Harlow on THE DANGERS OF PSYCHISM. Remember, this book is sent out to all as an ABSOLUTE GIFT when ten cents in stamps are sent to pay postage, and also ONE DOLLAR to pay for The Progressive Thinker one year. It is a book that will especially interest you, and will prove a valuable addition to your library. The Unknown Life of Christ formerly sold for ONE DOLLAR; now it is an absoLUTE GIFT to all on the terms above mentioned.

An Honest God Is the Noblest Work of Man.

To the Editor:—Thomas Harding of Sturgis, Mich., has taken great interest in the saying, "An honest God is the noblest work of man," and desires to place it to the credit of the proper author. I noticed the quotation in the Occult Magazine of January, 1907, and wondered what was meant by the quotation.

Brother Harding speaks of it as a peculiar sentence, in The Progressive Thinker. I think it a very peculiar and misunderstood sentence. I understand it to mean, "An honest worship is the noblest work of man." I believe that is what A. J. Davis meant when he used it, and also Col. Ingersoll. They were liberal-minded, and wished to carry the idea that an honest worshiper was an ideal man.

Taking it as I understand the meaning of the word "God" in the English language, it is to "designate that which an individual worships; therefore the word God is used in place of worship. If the word God in their sentence means a personal being, then it is surely a peculiar sentence, and hard to understand. G. S. KLOCK.

"The Light of Egypt." Volumes 1 and 2. An occult library in itself, a text-book of esoteric knowledge as taught by Adepts of Hermetic Philosophy. Price $2 per volume.

THE GREAT WORK.

Its Review by Lyman C. Howe.

Mr. Howe's article came too late for this issue. It will appear next week, and will create a vibration all along the line. Now is the time for Spiritualists to awaken and keep posted as to what is going on in our ranks. Never before have there been so many important issues before the great body of Spiritualists, and never before has Spirit Return been so prominently before the people, and never before has there been such a determination among the masses to seek the truth, regardless of any cult of creed.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

The Word of God.

An Inspirational Lecture by Dr. George A. Fuller, President of the Massachusetts State Spiritualists' Association, before the First Society of Spiritualists, Washington, D. C., Sunday Evening, December 9, 1906. Stenographically reported for The Progressive Thinker, by Walter P. Williams.

"THESE FACTS—THE SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCES OF THE AGES—DEMONSTRATE THE CONTINUITY OF LIFE AFTER THE CHANGE THAT WE TERM DEATH, AND IF SPIRITUALISM DID NO MORE THAN THIS IT WOULD DO MORE THAN ALL ORTHODOX RELIGIONS IN THE WORLD HAVE EVER BEEN ABLE TO ACCOMPLISH, BECAUSE THEY HAVE ONLY BEEN ABLE TO SET ON FIRE UPON THE ALTAR OF THE SOUL THE LAMP OF FAITH; THAT IS ALL. BUT HERE IN SPIRITUALISM FROM THIS EXTERNAL OR THIS EXOTERIC STANDPOINT WE HAVE A DEMONSTRATION OF LIFE THAT CONTINUES RIGHT ON; THAT DEATH DOES NOT INTERRUPT IT; THAT THERE CAN BE NO LINE OF DEMARKATION REALLY DRAWN BETWEEN THE LIFE THAT NOW IS AND THE LIFE THAT CONTINUES AFTER THIS PHYSICAL BODY IS LAID ASIDE. THIS IS A SUBLIME FACT, AND WE HAVE THE EVIDENCE TO PROVE IT, OR MANIFESTATIONS THAT DEMONSTRATE IT BEYOND POSSIBILITY OF DOUBT. WE ARE IN TOUCH WITH OUR FRIENDS OUT THERE, WE HOLD COMMUNION WITH THEM; WE HEAR THEIR VOICES SINGING THE SWEET SONGS OF HEAVEN; WE CATCH THE MELODY OF THAT LIFE."

Invocation.

O Thou who art our friend indeed, whom we call God and worship in truth and in spirit, we call upon Thee not because we would ask for the bestowal of any special favors, but we lift up our voices in adoration, in thanksgiving and in praise.

Thankful indeed are we for the revelations of the past, for every word that has been spoken by seer or prophet; thankful are we for those still newer inspirations of the present hour that lead us nearer to thy spirit and bring us into the recognition of that power which cometh only from Thee. With Thee, we are all powerful; with Thee, all wisdom is ours; with Thee, all life, all glory belong to us, therefore we lift up our hearts in rejoicing at the recognition of these great truths, the fundamental truths of the great spiritual philosophy that is sweeping on with rapid strides through the world at the present hour.

Thankful for every prompting of the soul that leads to the recognition of the continuity of life after that which men term death; thankful indeed for all the higher promptings of our own spirits in communion with Thee; for the knowledge, the light and the glory that is the birthright of every human soul. O may our lives be worthy of these great and glorious blessings; may our lives be richer, deeper and sweeter as we come into closer touch with Thee and with thine angels, and may that light go on in the world until all humanity shall be brought out of darkness, error and superstition, and light, knowledge, peace and happiness rest upon the whole world. Amen.

Mr. President and friends, these words come to me from the past; they are the words of Paul, and were spoken in the early years of the Christian dispensation:

"What, came the word of God out from you, or came it only unto you?"—I. Cor., xiv:36.

This is an inquiry that comes to us out of the past, and at the present time it is well worth our consideration.

A great many people in the world do not understand the difference between the word of God coming out of man and the word of God coming unto man only. The majority of the churches to-day have what they term the word of God that has come unto them. The few who are outside of the church who have received the light of the spiritual dispensation have the word of God that has come out of man. In keeping with this thought we have likewise a word from Walt Whitman, who spoke on bibles and religions like this:

"All bibles and all religions have come out of you, and more bibles and more religions may come out of you still."

Out of man has come the spiritual wealth and glory of the world. Out of human endeavor and effort have come the growth and progress of the world in which we live. No outside or external power has brought about the progress and growth in this world of ours from a material standpoint. Man has accomplished these things by his own efforts. Our great cities, filled with the industries of the world, our great libraries filled with the masterpieces of men of every age in human history, have all been built by man himself. This world in which we live, changing ever, has been changed largely for the better by the work of man. Everywhere we see the impress of man upon the world, the impress of man upon the life which we are living at the present time.

But what is that in man that has brought about all of this change in the world? What is that in man that has compelled him to move ever onward from darkness toward light, from ignorance and superstition toward knowledge and wisdom? Spirit, and that alone has compelled this ceaseless endeavor, this ceaseless upworking toward righteousness, this ceaseless growth toward higher and diviner things. They came from spirit and spirit alone. Not this external physical body, not this wonderful brain, not this mechanism that composes the whole human body, but that subtile something that eludes the grasp of our physical senses; that subtile something that compels us to be, has made all these changes that we behold in the world in which we live.

Out of that something have come the inspirations of the world; out of that something have come the bibles and the religions of the world; out of that something have come the sciences of the world; all art, all literature, everything that conduces to the advancement of the human race, have come out of that something that throbs and beats behind the human brain—not out of the brain, not out of the action of the gray matter of the cells of the brain, but out of that something that rises superior to material conditions that we call spirit—the illimitable—out of that has come all that is, and that is GOD. With Him we are one; one with Him; one with the divine—the divine in us and we in the divine, therefore the inspiration of God comes out of us, therefore the word of God comes out of and not simply to us.

THE MEN AND WOMEN to whom it has come have no apprehension of its source, have no conception of its vital truths. They are like parrots prating a thought that they do not comprehend, but the men and women who have been lifted up through trial, through physical and mental suffering, until at last they have come to the recognition of the thought that spirit is all—these are the men and women that recognize the source of all truth, the source of all inspiration and the source of all life. It is God—spirit—man—call it by what name you please, it matters not; terms are nothing in reality but our playthings with which we express ideas feebly and as best we may.

The truth is what we are after, the truth is the thing we are reaching toward, the truth is of importance in the world, and we are trying, struggling every day of our lives to grasp more of that truth, to bring it into our lives more fully that we may realize it in our everyday existence.

MANY OF THE PROPHETS and seers of antiquity recognized these great truths that we are recognizing now in the present hour. The world has had these truths for ages, but the world has failed to comprehend them, because they simply came to them and not out of them. We can recognize truth only when it comes out of us. Some have said, "How few people are ready for Spiritualism in the world; how few people really understand its spiritual significance," simply because they have not grown up to it, simply because Spiritualism has not come out of them as the flower of their souls. It must come out of every man and every woman as the flower of his or her soul, before it can be fully comprehended; not as an outside thing, but as an interior conception of truth. Not as something that comes merely through phenomena, not as something that presents itself to the physical or external senses. The psychical research societies of the world will never be able to grasp the true significance of Spiritualism. Externally they may understand it, as externally they understand the physical sciences; but spiritually they cannot comprehend it, they do not know its import and its meaning in the world.

One great psychical researcher declares that Spiritualism has come simply to prove immortality. It has come to prove no such thing. It is not necessary to prove immortality. You never seek to prove the truth of the axioms of geometry or of mathematical science. The axioms of spiritual science are above the axioms of material science. It is not necessary to prove them. It is not necessary to go as far as to seek the demonstration of them. Man knows of his immortality when he recognizes that he is spirit—one with God, one with the divine, and when Spiritualism comes out of him he recognizes these great truths, he recognizes this fact and this fact becomes established to him.

THE THING THAT SPIRITUALISM proves through a study of its phenomena externally, through the study of the psychical researcher, is simply continuity of life after the change that we term death—that we live right on. A great thing to demonstrate—a wonderful thing—something that the world has been seeking for a long period of time, and yet these facts have always been with the world. The phenomena have always been in the world. These manifestations of spirit have been in all times in all ages, and yet man has failed to fully and completely comprehend them. These facts—the spiritual experiences of the ages—demonstrate the continuity of life after the change that we term death, and if Spiritualism did no more than this it would do more than all orthodox religions in the world have ever been able to accomplish, because they have only been able to set on fire upon the altar of the soul the lamp of faith; that is all. But here in Spiritualism from this external or this exoteric standpoint we have a demonstration of life that continues right on; that death does not interrupt it; that there can be no line of demarkation really drawn between the life that now is and the life that continues after this physical body is laid aside. This is a sublime fact, and we have the evidence to prove it, or manifestations that demonstrate it beyond possibility of doubt. We are in touch with our friends out there, we hold communion with them; we hear their voices singing the sweet songs of heaven; we catch the melody of that life; we come in touch with the love that has never died—mother love, father love. The husband comes in touch with the love of wife, and wife in touch with the love of husband out there, and father and mother come in touch with the love of children out there on the spirit side of life. How beautiful all these things are. In Spiritualism we have its full and complete realization, not in any other religion.

But we go further than all this in our study of Spiritualism. This is from the study of its phenomena. This is from the study of its manifestations. I would not for a moment belittle manifestations that are important, manifestations that are valuable to all humanity, but I would not stop right there in this phenomenal atmosphere, I would rise above it into the atmosphere of spirit and I would grasp some of the divine possibilities of my own spirit—know what it is possible for me to do, where I am going, what is before me in the future and what is before me at the present moment, which may be, after all, the most important for me to know.

BUT HOW CAN I FIND OUT these things? By questioning the soul. BY LISTENING IN THE SILENCE UNTIL THE SOUL GIVES ANSWER. Now that may seem a strange assertion to make, but I make it advisedly from my own personal experience. By questioning the soul and listening in the silence until the soul shall give answer. Then shall we find the mission in life; then shall we comprehend what Paul meant when he made this declaration or asked this question that we repeated at the opening of the service, whether the inspiration of God, or that life and light and truth of God had come to us or had come out of and these are the questions that we are to decide as Spiritualists.

These are important questions that come directly home to us at this hour. It is not for us now to decide the question of the continuity of life after the change called death. That has been already settled. It is not for us to go over the phenomena again and again. The phenomena have been thoroughly investigated by the great scientists of the world, men like Crookes, Varley, Wallace, Flammarion and Hyslop, and hosts of others, have given in their testimony in favor of the phenomena upon which Spiritualism rests, It is not for us to investigate that phenomena longer, we know something of the revelation it brings to the world, but it is for us to seek the revelation plainer and clearer in our own lives—a revelation in our own lives that shall bless humanity.

SPIRITUALISM MUST MEAN something to us individually; it must mean more to us than the other religions mean to the world. If not, it is of no more importance and no more value, and, like other religions, will gradually be shed from the world. Many great religions have been shed just the same as the trees shed their leaves in the autumn time. They have served their day, they have served their purpose in the world, they have been useful and have contributed in a measure to the welfare of mankind, but they have served their time and their purpose and as the leaves fall in the autumn time, so these leaves fall to enrich newer forms that shall spring out from their mouldering ashes.

Now then at the present time Spiritualism shall go down like all of these other religions, if it has no more to offer the world than the one fact of spirit communion. It has offered that fact, it has demonstrated it, it has made it possible for you and me to hold communion with our friends out there. We know it beyond all possibility of doubt. It is not a question with us, we have satisfied our own minds, our own intellects along this line. We have listened to the rap, we have witnessed the tipping of tables, the levitation of heavy articles of furniture, we have listened to the entranced medium, we have seen the materialized form walk out of the cabinet. We have witnessed all these marvels that Spiritualism has to offer to the world and they have proven to us, beyond the possibility of doubt, that we live after the change men term death, and death becomes only an incident in the life of man; death becomes the beautiful white mother of eternal life, she lays her hands upon the brow of men and women who no longer are fitted to serve the purposes of this present life and calls them to awaken to a newer life; it cracks the shell, it causes the kernel within to germinate and grow out of that old shell, the physical body; the soul emancipated springs not into new life but into the recognition of the diviner possibilities of the same old life.

This we have proven to us, beyond all possibility of doubt, and if Spiritualism has no more to offer the world it has offered its great truth, and laid it upon humanity's sacred altar and must stand aside for something else to take its place and move humanity on to the conception of higher, grander truths. But I do not believe the mission of Spiritualism is yet fulfilled. I do not believe the time has come for Spiritualism to withdraw from the human arena. I believe its work has only just commenced, and other truths are to be revealed and emphasized by Spiritualism in the world.

TO BE SURE NEW THOUGHT has stolen a great deal of our thunder; to be sure, Christian Science has stolen a portion of our truths; to be sure, a hundred and one other cults and sects have come up since the advent of Spiritualism, having taken over something that really belonged to Spiritualism. Well, now, these new cults are not to blame; we Spiritualists are the only ones in the world to blame simply because we failed to recognize their worth to the world.

We have spiritual healing wonderfully displayed in Spiritualism in the early years of the movement. Wonderful spiritual healers went out over the world, men came to them on crutches, women were brought to them on litters and they got up and walked out of the office and went to their homes; the spiritual power was manifest then and there. In the days of Dr. J. R. Newton these wonderful demonstrations were occurring all over the land. It was my privilege to be in his office in Boston one day and witness the marvels that occurred at that time. One man came into that office on crutches, all drawn up with rheumatism. He had been so for nearly three years. He could not get up into the office only as he was carried up from the lower floor. As he was carried up by two men, he screamed from the agony every time they lifted him a step higher until at last they got him into the office, and there after twenty minutes he walked across the floor of that room not feeling a particle of pain, walked down the stairs and down the street, leaving his crutches behind him.

These were the marvels that were performed in the early days of Spiritualism. Christian Science, Mental Science, Spiritual Science, have taken up this line of work and carried it out into the world simply because Spiritualists have ignored it, and the result will be that unless Spiritualists come to the recognition of the power and possibilities of the human spirit it will depart entirely from them into other channels of usefulness in the world.

WE TALK OF THE WONDER of Christian Science at the present time, and as an organized movement it is a wonderful movement. No pope ever occupied the chair of Rome that exercised so much power as Mrs. Eddy, up there in her little home in Concord, New Hampshire. This power has come by and through concentration. The great wealth that has poured into the coffers of the Christian Science Church has come through concentration upon one idea, upon one thought.

To-day all over the land the same sermon is preached in every Christian Science Church, the same selections are read. Think of this wonderful power that is going up all the time from these different churches. It reminds me of an incident I read of Mr. Spurgeon, related in his reminiscences, while in Italy. He always recognized prayer as a wonderful thing, but he said that when one man prays it makes only a little stir in the great waves about him, but let a hundred men pray, he says, and see what a commotion there is everywhere. He said this was illustrated to him nicely when in Italy at one time. He was stopping in a hotel and several friends came there to see him. He thought it would be nice for them to have a little luncheon together and pressing a bell button in the wall got no response. He pressed it again with the same result. He waited a while, pressed it a third time, but there was no response. Three or four gentlemen were present in his room who were also occupying rooms at the hotel. He suggested that they go their rooms and at the same instant press the button in the wall and see the result. They did so, and several buttons were pressed at the same time. The result was that every waiter, and bell-boy and porter in the hotel came pell-mell rushing up the stairs, thinking the whole building was on fire. "Now, then," says Mr. Spurgeon, "when one man prays he only just moves the great bell up there in heaven; when two men pray the bell moves a little faster, but when a hundred men pray the bell rings so that God Almighty has to hear."

If we would accomplish anything in the world we have got to be united and concentrate our efforts upon that one thing. If we Spiritualists all over the land were only united and concentrated in our efforts, see how we would ring the old bell up there in heaven; see what we might accomplish as Spiritualists.

But, "Oh, no, it is not wise for us to be united." It is not well for us to be like anybody else; each one must be so thoroughly individualized that even when he goes to church or to a meeting he has to sit all alone for fear his elbows may touch the elbows of somebody else and something may be imparted to him that does not really belong to his own individuality. It is along this line in our work everywhere, jealousy creeping into our ranks, societies disorganizing, societies dwindling out, breaking up, simply because we will not unite, come together and work together, simply because the word has come to most of us and not out of us as it should. When it comes out of us we can work together, when it comes out of us we lay aside all our petty peculiarities, all our desire of being different from other people, and we come nearer together for the purpose of seeing how much there is in other men and women that we can admire.

IN THE EARLY YEARS of Spiritualism I heard a speaker say the great thing in Spiritualism was this; it was different from other systems of religion, it made men and women different from other men and women; and this one went on so far as to say that our thought differs from the thought of the church; and that individual seemed to spend nearly all of her time emphasizing the idea of the difference that existed between Spiritualists on the one hand and the orthodox Christians on the other. Now it seems to me we have done about enough of that kind of work. Would it not be well for us to turn over a new leaf and see if we cannot find some common ground whereon we can all stand, see if we cannot find some good in every religious denomination in the world—some good in orthodoxy, some good in the Episcopalian system of religion, some good in Romanism, some good in Universalism and in Unitarianism, and see if Spiritualism cannot offer to the world the common ground whereon all of these different religious organizations can meet and worship God in truth and in spirit. It seems to me high time that some move of this kind be made in Spiritualism. (Applause.) High time for the recognition of these vital truths which I deem are the most vital of all that Spiritualism has to offer to the world.

WE HAVE PREACHED the brotherhood of man, the church has preached the brotherhood of man, but how near have we come to the realization of the brotherhood of man? As a nation, how near are we to the realization of the brotherhood of man? We are increasing our armament, increasing the output of our arsenals, building new warships, building new forts and trying all kinds of new explosives in our great love of man! This surely is not the recognition of the brotherhood of man, and we term ourselves Christian people—a people who believe in Christ, and who accept as a leader one who declared "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." While the minister is preaching love, the congregation is trying to find some way of squeezing out of other men and women one more dollar easier than they have been able to do it in the past, and, likewise at the same time are trying to lay the foundations of some great war that shall add to the wealth of a few men in the world.

I tell you Spiritualism as I understand it recognizes fully the brotherhood of all mankind, and in this recognition of human brotherhood it would declare only one law for the world and that the law of love—that is, the spiritual law. All other laws can be broken, all other laws can be laid aside, all other laws can be controverted, but the laws of spirit can not be broken, cannot be laid aside, and in time this idea shall prevail in the world in which we live and when it does prevail peace, harmony, good will, shall be the birthright of every human soul. Then shall we rise to the recognition of all the higher and diviner possibilities of the soul that is within, and our lives be made sweeter and diviner by the messages that are whispered to us and through us from the spirit side of life.

SPIRITUALISM STANDS before us as the greatest of all the religions of the world; a religion of peace, a religion of good will, a religion of love and a religion of kindliness toward one another. Let us bear and forbear with one another; let us treat all about us as kindly as it is possible for us to do, remembering the great commandment of the hour is the commandment of kindliness toward one another.

One of your modern writers who although not a prophet and not exactly a minister, but who is a preacher after all and has preached and is possibly preaching to one of the largest congregations in the world through his books—Elbert Hubbard—says that the new commandment is a commandment of kindliness toward one another, "and by that," he says, "I do not mean soft spoken words, I do not mean the grasping of the hand of brother and sister and saying, 'Brother,' or 'Sister.' I do not mean anything of that kind, but instead I mean the showing of every man and woman in the world the way to earn an honest living and giving them a chance to earn that living." That is what he means by the law of kindness. That is what Spiritualism means by the law of kindness, giving to every man and woman the opportunities that belong to them and showing them how to make the most of those opportunities.

Opportunities flit by us sometimes. We are blinded, we do not see them. But never fear if a thousand opportunities have flitted by you, thousands of others lie in the way to come, in front of you. Do not be discouraged, do not become pessimists simply because you are growing old, your hairs are whitening and you feel as though opportunities have fled. Remember that there are as good opportunities to come as have ever gone by. Watch for these opportunities and make the most of them when they come. We shall do that when we recognize the word of the spirit that is in us and working through us, the word that is made manifest and dwells in the flesh. Not the word that was made manifest and dwelt in the flesh, but the word that is made manifest and dwells in the flesh. It was all right for those writers to speak of it as they did, "the word that was made manifest and dwelt in the flesh;" it does us very little good to contemplate the thing that has been, but it does us much more good to contemplate the thing that is now and is working in us and through us for the betterment of our lives.

AND SO SPIRITUALISM RISES to this high necessity of the hour, this recognition of the divine possibilities of the soul, rises until at last we shall look toward the mountains—the great spiritual mountains—that lie before us, not turning our eyes backward toward the past, not simply gleaning the fields of the olden time, not walking with hushed and reverent feet down through the corridors of time, pausing by the side of the great altars of Egypt, Greece, Rome, Palestine or India, but standing erect in the glory of this new century, with spiritual mountain peaks all about us and looking ever toward them with our feet ever pointed in the direction of their summit, climbing ever up the sides of those mountains we must hew for ourselves a pathway in the solid rock, we must clear aside the brambles and thorns, we must press with aching and bleeding feet this mountain side and climb, climb ever upward until at last on the mountain summit we shall feel the breezes of heaven fan our fevered cheeks and kiss our brows.

It is true these mountain peaks lie before us, and if we recognize the fact that the word of God is within us, that truth is ours, if we recognize the fact that all these things are possible for us, that man has in the past done even greater things than these, we shall accomplish them all in our daily lives.

We look back to the past and bow in adoration before the wonderful masterpieces of an Angelo or a Phidias; we bow before these wonderful creations of art and we say, "Oh, that we might accomplish something like these." Look up, O man, do not be discouraged, the possibility lies within you and even greater than Angelo, Raphael or a Phidias accomplished you may accomplish in the future.

We look back toward the past and see what has been accomplished in the realm of music by Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Haydn, Wagner and say, "Oh, that we might have accomplished something like this." Take heart, O men and women, the future holds even greater possibilities in store for you.

We turn toward the past and say, "See what Shakspeare, and Virgil, and Dante, and Homer, and Hesiod accomplished in days past and gone. There is nothing about me now but ashes of dead sea fruit, and that is all that lies about me." Take heart, take courage, O men and women, whatsoever Shakspeare accomplished, or Dante, or Hesiod, or Homer, is a possibility likewise for you, for you are children of the Infinite God, and not all of God's inspiration was wrapped up in Shakspeare, Virgil, Homer or Hesiod, but a little of it is wrapped up in you, and when that little comes out it makes room for still more, and more will come out of you until at last you shall accomplish your heart's desire and stand on the summit of the mountain with the angels in full recognition of the divinity of your own manhood and womanhood, and then over you the angels shall spread forth their hands and declare, "Well done, O good and faithful servants, in the great strongholds of humanity's enterprises, come ye up higher unto diviner things." (Applause.)

The Writer Expresses His High Appreciation of Mediumship

To the Editor:—I notice in The Progressive Thinker, date January 5, 1907, a few lines concerning "Marconi" and the fact of his becoming a Spiritualist, which, of course, I was pleased to note.

I will mention an incident: Only a few nights ago, while in conversation with a gentleman of our office, during which I mentioned the names of Marconi and Edison, and I took the opportunity to "show my colors," which I am proud of. I mentioned the fact of Edison being a Spiritualist and medium, and that all his ideas were received inspirationally from our noble scientists passed on, and that this had been acknowledged.

I said also, that Marconi received his in the same way, but had not yet come to the realization of the truth. The gentleman agreed with me, showing how many people we come in contact with are prepared for truth, if properly and judiciously presented to them at opportune moments. I said to him that Marconi would soon come to realize the source of his ideas, and hence my double pleasure in reading The Progressive Thinker.

In this connection I would like a few words also about "A Student's Views," same issue of the paper: His thoughts, in some respects, are good so far as they go.

Knowing a little of what mediumship is from actual daily contact, I would say, we are all mediums, and dependent ones at that.

Every unit is born without knowledge, and this all will concede, consequently our start in life is receptive or inspirational, and principally so all through the remainder of our sojourn on this first sphere of action, and this not without complete appreciation and understanding of our individuality or personality.

Mediumship has been, and is, the sublime source through which humanity receives all its gems of thoughts, all its inspiration, all its uplift.

Pray what are all our Tuttles, Richmonds, Peebles, Lockwoods, Lovelands, Longfellows, Shakespeares, Shelleys Edison, Marconi, not forgetting my dear wife, a lovely medium, and one who has in public converted many from despondency and doubt and spiritual oblivion, to an open acknowledgment of continuity of spiritual life beyond the grave. As well might we decry the oxygen we live by, as to decry mediumship. I am a medium myself, both independent and dependent. They are inseparable. A. C. PRIEST.

"Materialization." By Mme. Emma d-Esperance and Rev. B. F. Austin. Excellent. Price 10 cents.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary.

Eye Sight can be Strengthened, and all forms of Diseased Eyes Cured without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in the great majority of cases, has been proven beyond a doubt, by the testimony of of hundreds people who publicly claim that they have been cured by that wonderful little instrument called "Actina." Actina also cures sore and granulated lids, Iritis, etc., also removes Cataracts and Pterygiums without cutting or drugging. Over 75 thousand of the "Actinas" have been sold; therefore it is not an experiment, but an absolute fact. The following letters are but samples of those that are received daily:

Mrs. M. E. Champney, 242 West 135th St. New York City, writes: The "Actina" cured me of Iritis, after the doctors said there was no cure outside an operation. I have been entirely well for over four months, can see to read and sew as well as before. I can honestly recommend "Actina" for all afflictions of the eye.

Alameda, Cal. March 27th, 1906.

New York & London Electric Ass'n,
Kansas City, Mo.

Gentlemen:—I am more than pleased with the "Actina." When I received it I had been wearing glasses for more than 3 years for Astigmatism. I immediately discontinued their use and have not had them on since. It is wonderful. I consider it worth its weight in gold. I have recommend it to many of my friends.

Nery truly, (Miss) E. F. Tucker,
2041 San Antonio Ave.

E. R. Holdbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes: "Actina" has cured my eyes so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom have headache now, and can study up to eleven o'clock after a hard day's work at the office.

"Actina" can be used by old and young with perfect safety. Every member of a family can use the one Actina for any form of disease of the Eye, Ear, Throat or Head. One will last for years, and is always ready for use. "Actina" will be sent on trial postpaid.

If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Company, Company, Dept. 342N., 811-813 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive absolutely FREE a valuable book, Prof. Wilson's Treatise on.

STARTLING FACTS, OR Deeds of Darkness Disclosed

This work devotes special attention to Auricular Confession and its relations to sacerdotal celibacy, convents, monasteries, morality and civil and religious liberty. It is intended to be an embodiment of facts and documentary evidence of the pernicious influence of the confessional; a trenchant showing up of Romanism, based upon standard Catholic authorities; an eye-opener concerning the methods and spirit, the moral turpitude and evil works of Romanism. Cloth, 75 cents.

MAHOMET His Birth, Character and Doctrine. By Edward Gibbon. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. This work will be found intensely interesting. Price, 25 cents.

Talleyrand's Letter to the Pope. This work will be found especially interesting to all who would desire to make a study of Romanism and the Bible. The historic facts stated, and the keen, scathing review of Romish ideas and practices should be read by all. Price 25 cents.

Song Books

New and Enlarged Edition of C. P. LONGLEY'S Choice Collection of Beautiful Songs,

Containing ninety charming songs for home, camps, circles and meetings—words and music, including "Only a Thin Vail Between Us," and its companion piece; also beautiful words set to choice music, from the poetical works of Lilian Whiting. Of the latter, Miss Whiting writes Prof. Longley her pleasure at his setting to her poems and declares herself honored at the dainty music he has given her words. President Barrett of the N. S. A. writes that wherever he goes he finds the songs of Mr. Longley sung at meetings and by the friends and he affirms it as his opinion that Longley's musical compositions have ennobled the world. Price per copy, 50 cents bound in boards; 75 cents in cloth. wholesale rates made to societies, and dealers.

Maxham's Melodies.
Arranged for Solos, Duets, Quartets, Also Six Poems.
This is a song book adapted to the popular spiritualistic taste, and is eminently fitted to do good service in the lecture hall or family circle. Price, 15 cents.

Echoes From the World of Song.
A collection of 50 charming songs with chorus and music, sheet music size. Price $1.00; postage 15 cts.

COSMIAN HYMN BOOK.
A collection of original and selected Hymns for Liberal and Ethical Societies, for Schools and the Home. Compiled by L. K. Washburn. This volume meets a public want. It comprises 258 choice selections of poetry and music, embodying the highest moral sentiment, and free from all sectarianism. Price, 50 cents.

A. P. A. MANUAL A complete expose of the principles and objects of the American Protective Association. A book for all patriotic American citizens. Price, 15 cents, or two for 25 cents.

—THE— Christs of the Past and Present. By MOSES HULL,
A comparison of the Christ-work or Mediumship of Biblical Messiahs and the conditions they required, with similar manifestations in Modern Spiritualism. This is a good work to study for arguments with which to meet the very common orthodox question, "Why do you always require conditions for your spiritual manifestations?" Cloth bound, 35 cents; paper 25 cents. For sale at this office.

E. W. Sprague writes from Washington, D. C., where he is lecturing: "Our meetings are increasing in interest and numbers. Brother Wood, the president of the society, told me that our audience last evening was the largest of the season. This is a good society to work for; its members are brainy and they are spiritual Spiritualists, and know how to make the best conditions for good results."

Mattie E. Hull will continue the work commenced in San Jose, Cal., by herself and husband, the first Sunday of the present month. She will accept calls for other points in California, as she does not intend to return East until Spring. Address her at 230 North Sixth street, San Jose, Cal., until further notice.

Dr. J. H. Randall writes: "Recently the Chicago Spiritualists League held two large and interesting meetings for the purpose of determining its continuance. After thorough discussion its funds were considerably increased by voluntarily paid membership fees, and the following were elected to its official positions to constitute its executive board for the ensuing year: Dr. C. A. Burgess, president; Dr. Geo. B. Warne, first vice-president; Mr. A. M. Griffen, second vice-president; Dr. J. H. Randall secretary; Mr. A. G. Cleveland, treasurer; North Side trustees, Mrs. Wm. Hilbert, Mr. Max Gentzke, Mrs. Anna Dodge; West Side trustees, Mr. J. M. Sexsmith, Mrs. Susie Thompson; South Side trustees, Mrs. O. B. Wilson, Dr. Alex Gustafson. The present plan of the league is to visit the different meetings, and to occasionally hold a meeting at some central hall for educational, social and entertaining character, to unite more effectively and harmoniously the workers participating in all other meetings held particularly on Sundays. For particulars address Dr. J. H. Randall, Secretary, 1058 Washington Blvd., Chicago, Ill."

J. C. Craig, the lawyer who went from Clyde, Ohio, to California, lectured lately before the Truth Seekers' Society of Los Angeles.

D. Feast writes from Baltimore, Md.: "The Rev. A. B. Beresford, pastor of the Universalist church of this city, preached to the members of the Mystic Lodge of Masons, January 13, taking for his theme, 'Friendship.' The church was comfortably filled with Masons and friends generally. Right here I want to say that the doctor is very liberal in his religious views. He is quite friendly to our cause. In conversation with the doctor he told me that our Dr. Peebles was at his church during his engagement with the First Spiritual church; that he had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Austin while the pastor in our city. He has been at our services on several occasions, and requested me to forward him a copy of The Progressive Thinker."

Mrs. E. Barrows writes from Fayville, Mass.: "On January 1, I met in Berkley Hall with a few members of the M. S. A. At that time the question was asked, 'What are we going to do about a Spiritual paper?' All seemed to want a home paper, and so do I, as I was a subscriber for the dear old Banner of Light for many years. I think there is money enough, talent enough, and unity enough in Boston and vicinity to start a true spiritual paper; though it might be small to begin with it would surely meet with success. I think it was decided by all to take your paper, The Progressive Thinker, for the present any way."

W. N. Bennett writes: "I glory in your effort to have truth in all things, although it may offend some. The world has sailed under false colors long enough."

A. G. Keck, secretary of Lake Brady Camp, Ohio, writes: "You are certainly doing a good work, and ought to have the support of all Spiritualists."

Mrs. O. B. Wilson writes: "The Hyde Park Occult Society had an unusually interesting meeting Sunday evening, January 20. Mr. J. A. Marvin gave a very pleasing lecture. Mr. H. Fraser, W. M. Traver and Mrs. Bell were our mediums. They did finely. We will have Mr. R. Gilray as a speaker, January 27, and February 3, Dr. C. S. Tisdale."

H. L. Chapman writes from Marcellus, Mich.: "I am again called to record the passing of two true and tried Spiritualists. As you perhaps know that fifty years ago there was considerable excitement over Spiritualism at Vandalia, Mich., and Spiritualists were growing rapidly in number, and had stone and timber on the ground for a Spiritual temple, but just at this time came two or three speakers advocating the free love doctrine, which at once broke up the society, and only those who had gained a knowledge of the higher teachings still remained true to their convictions; among them Mrs. Osborn, Mrs. Leach, D. Copley, C. W. Thorp, John F. Goff, B. Rudd, and possibly a few others who have passed out during the last few years, all of whom gained the highest respect of the community where they lived in spite of the ridicule that was brought upon them by the false teachings; but since that date I do not think there has ever been but one Spiritualist lecture delivered in Vandalia, or a single Spiritualist funeral until the ones referred to in the enclosed notices. There are a few of the true and tried still living, and I feel that they truly rejoice to know that the people of Vandalia have once more had an opportunity to listen to a few thoughts pertaining to the grand philosophy of the continuity of life."

Frank T. Ripley is now ready for engagements at camp-meetings, grove meetings, etc. He has a few open dates for June, July, August and September. Brother Ripley is now filling a three-months' engagement at Battle Creek, Mich., giving good satisfaction there in the new hall of the Spiritualist society. Address him at that place.

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

Geo. A. Letford, the prominent drummer medium, has a few open dates between July 12 and August 13, for message work at camps. Address him at No. 275 Michigan avenue, Chicago, Ill.

W. J. Howes writes: "On Sunday, January 20, we had with us at our hall, 1977 W. Madison street, Dr. Geo. B. Warne, who gave a very interesting lecture, and also spoke very feelingly about the passing to spirit life of our well-known and much-respected brother, Moses Hull. Mrs. Howes gave some very convincing messages, and considering the stormy night we had a very good attendance, and am pleased to say it grows larger every Sunday. Next Sunday we shall have with us Sister Hild."

Mrs. C. Schwahn will hold meetings every Sunday and Thursday evenings at the hall 414 Waveland avenue. The opening meeting will be held on Sunday, Feb. 10, at 3 and 8 o'clock. Take Lincoln avenue car to Waveland avenue.

Mr. Merkel writes: "The Spiritualistic Church of the Students of Nature, at Flynn's hall, 461 W. North avenue and Robey street, had a very interesting meeting. The pastor's subject was 'Be careful what you say.' Sister Smith and many mediums gave wonderful tests which were recognized. On Sunday evening, Feb. 3, there will be a Spiritualistic christening at the hall. All are cordially invited to be present."

Henrietta L. Lichtig writes: "Not being able to stand the latitude and climate of Galveston, Texas, I resigned my charge there and have returned to Chicago. I am open for engagements for lectures and messages, or for funerals; also for camp-meeting work. Address me at 4746 Calumet avenue, Chicago, Ill."

M. Parmenter writes from Lawton, Okla.: "The Church of Spiritual Light of Lawton, Okla., held its first meeting in Hetherington Hall, Sunday, January 20, which has been secured for Sundays for the year. Brother C. S. Simmons, president of the State Association, and Dr. M. H. Owen were the speakers, interesting everyone. We would like to correspond with some good speakers and mediums that are endorsed by the N. S. A., or some state association."

J. E. Coe writes: "On Sunday, Jan. 20, the Golden Star Center Spiritual Society at Star Lodge Hall, No. 378 S. Western avenue, was favored with a fair attendance, who had the pleasure of listening to a soul-stirring address by Brother Peterson of the Magi, and those present will have something to think upon for sometime to come. We also had Brother Walker and Miss Peterson, who rendered some fine musical selections. Prof. McLane followed with appropriate remarks, followed by Mrs. Kusserow with remarks and messages, Prof. McLane ending with fine messages. On Sunday evening, Feb. 3, Brother Geo. B. Warne will be our speaker."

Mary B. Hill writes: "The dramatic and musical entertainment arranged by the social committee of the Band of Harmony and presented January 17, was well received, and merited the applause which was given. Mrs. Gilbert gave from her unlimited store of recitations, and is surely an artist in her line. Miss Dennis gave several rare selections on the violin, with piano accompaniment by her brother, Mr. C. Dennis. Mr. Anson Bushnell, a fine soloist, added to the event with several selections. Others joined in making the entertainment one of the best and most appreciated given by the Band of Harmony, which meets again Feb. 7, 1907, room 512 Masonic Temple. Bring your luncheon and friends."

Samuel A. Huntington writes from Malden, Mass., of the Progressive Spiritual Society, Louise Hall, 138, Pleasant street: "Sunday services of January 20, were interesting as usual. The president presided at both sessions, with Miss Mable Carter at the piano. At the afternoon circle, Prof. Raja Swami from the Temple of Philosophy and Occult Science of India, addressed the meeting on "The black cycle of materialism now passing away and in its stead the beautiful teachings of Spiritualism." Prof. Matook of Boston, followed on "The Astrological Outlook for the Nations of the World for the Coming Year." Sister Morton ended the session with interesting messages. The evening meeting opened with praise, reading of scripture and invocation. Mrs. A. M. Whall of Everett, Mass., was the speaker. She prefaced her work by reading a beautiful poem entitled "The Light of Reason," by Belle Bush, after which she devoted over an hour to giving many beautiful messages. Mrs. M. A. Bonney of Roxbury, Mass., will occupy the platform on Sunday evening, Jan. 27, and Prof. Graham of Boston, Mass., on Sunday evening, Feb. 3."

Mrs. Geo. Williams writes from Cleveland, Ohio.: "Rev. Oscar Edgerly concluded a remarkably successful engagement at the First Spiritualist Temple in Cleveland, Ohio, and was followed by Prof. Peck of St. Louis, Mo., who will remain with us during January and February. Prof. Peck's lectures are well attended, and are of absorbing interest. His lecture last Sunday on 'The Bible of Nature,' was greatly enjoyed by those who braved the inclement weather to hear it. His text, 'Tongues in trees, books in running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything,' was handled in such a manner as to convince his auditors that all nature speaks to us in eloquent and varied tones. The ladies of the Temple Fund Society are busily engaged in preparing for a bazaar to be held in the near future. An old folks' concert will be given at the Temple on Valentine's evening, February 14. The proceeds to go to the benefit of the Temple; an enjoyable time is anticipated. On Sunday, Feb. 3, at 7:30 p. m., Prof. Peck will deliver an oration at the Temple, on 'The Life and Deeds of Thomas Paine.' A rich treat is in store for all who can attend."

Will J. Erwood, a Spiritualist lecturer of LaCrosse, Wis., now engaged with the Indiana Spiritualist Association, delivered three able lectures at Mozart Hall last week, subjects: "Foregleams of Immortality," "In the Laboratory of the Soul" and "Spiritual Gifts." He is a young man and was greeted at each lecture by large audiences. He proved himself a man of ability and sincerity, a student of human nature.—Chrisney Sun.

Boston Meetings.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society meets in Appleton Hall, 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass., every Friday.

The Ladies' Lyceum Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, Boston, Mass., every Wednesday.

The Ladies' Industrial Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, every Thursday.

C. L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society met as usual with business meeting in the afternoon. Owing to the severe weather, the attendance was small, and the Snip Sale was postponed. A social time was spent during the evening, Mrs. Annie Chapman, Mrs. Jennie Rhines and others participating. Mrs. Mary F. Lovering presided at the piano. Next Friday a Salad Supper will be served, and a good meeting will be held in the evening, with test mediums. Be sure and come."

Mrs. Lora Holton would like engagements at the camps as musical director, pianist, psychometric reader and musical message bearer. Address her at Vicksburg, Kalamazoo county, Mich.

Rev. Alice Baker writes from Dallas, Texas, to the Oklahoma Spiritualists: "I am now arranging my route, making dates for an early spring tour of the state, as state missionary. I would like to hear from every place where my services are wanted. Please write to me at once. When you write, state the conditions as nearly as you can, so I will know how to arrange my time for you. Again, let me urge those that are not yet in line, get in line at once. You can not afford to be left out. Write now. Direct all letters to my home address, 449 Live Oak street, Dallas, Texas."

John B. Chrisney writes from Chrisney, Ind., of Will J. Erwood, who has been lecturing at that place: "He is a very able lecturer, and gave satisfaction to all who heard him. The Spiritualists should keep him in the lecture field all of the time. He is an honor to the cause we so dearly love."

Mrs. Emma Snow writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "Frank T. Ripley is filling a three months' engagement with us—December, January and February. He is doing a fine work and making many friends. His lectures are good and his messages fine. One lecture given January 6, contained some prophecies for 1907, in which he prophesied the earthquake in Kingston, and several other things that have come true. New Year's eve the society held a watch meeting, and during the evening presented Mr. Ripley with a beautiful umbrella, and several other tokens from individual friends. We recommend Mr. Ripley to societies wishing a true and conscientious worker. He will always be warmly welcomed by this society. We have just moved to a new hall, centrally located, and modern in every respect. This society is composed of not so many in number, but true hard workers, and harmony reigns supreme, and we are a happy family. Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie returns to us for March and April."

MASS MEETING.

To Be Held by the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, at Milwaukee, Feb. 9 and 10.

Mr. Geo. H. Brooks is among the most efficient workers of our ranks. He never seems to tire—what he does, he throws his whole soul in it, and never fails to accomplish something for the benefit of our Cause.

The Mass-Meeting.

Grand Mass-Meeting by the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, to be held in Milwaukee, on Saturday and Sunday, February 9 and 10, 1907, in Severance Hall, 421 Milwaukee street.

Dr. Geo. B. Warne president of the Illinois State Association, also vice-president of the N. S. A.; John W. Ring, Crystola, Colo., and others will take part. G. H. Brooks, president of the Wisconsin State Association, will preside at all sessions. The secretary, Miss L. Loebel, will also be present and assist. Come one and all, and enjoy this glorious meeting.

G. H. BROOKS,
President W. S. S. A.
MISS LOUISE G. LOEBEL,
Secretary.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

To Be Held at St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 27 and 28.

Our annual convention will be held at St. Louis, Feb. 27 and 28. We hope to have with us on that occasion Elizabeth Harlow and other visitors of note, beside our local talent, Brother Grimshaw, Mrs. Hary, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Price, also Mrs. Stephens of Kansas City, and your humble servant. Every Spiritualist in Missouri is invited to be present and bring their friends. To be held at the Temple of Spiritualism, 3015 Pine street, St. Louis, Mo. PAUL McARTHUR,
President.

Conductors and Secretaries of Lyceums

Please send me a list of your members, and the name of your lyceum. For some time I have been waiting anxiously for a list of all our lyceums. It is most important that we should have an authentic list of your lyceum, its membership, and address of its officers. Will you not give me this assistance?

The Banner Contest list will remain open through the month of January, so any school that has not reported, send in report at once; but even though you may not desire to enter the competition for a prize, please send report of your membership. The lyceums that have reported are as follows: Los Angeles, Cal.; Parkland, Pa.; Chesaning, Mich.; Pittsburg, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Decatur, Portland, Galveston, and a partial report from three others. We trust by the close of this month to have a full list of every working lyceum in the United States.

Yours for the children,

"Discovery of a Lost Trail." By Chas. B. Newcomb. Excellent in spiritual suggestiveness. Cloth, $1.50.

MICHIGAN STATE ASSOCIATION.

The Work in the State, Past and to Come.

To the Editor:—It has been some time since I have sent you any report of our work in the state. Though we have been silent we have been working. We have had several very important board meetings and have accomplished much in a quiet way.

On Nov. 2, we had the pleasure of having our N. S. A. president, Harrison D. Barrett, with us. He gave the board many helpful suggestions and inspired one and all with new courage. We took up our work with renewed effort and felt it was good to have him with us.

We will hold our Mid-Winter Meeting at Jackson, Mich., on February 8, 9 and 10. On Friday the meeting will be in the Unitarian church, corner of Washington and Jackson streets, and on Saturday and Sunday in the Assembly Hall on Cortland street, between Francis and Mechanic streets. We feel we shall have one of the best meetings the state has ever held, and we look forward to a large attendance. We have some of the best talent in our state and much good will be accomplished with these good workers: Dr. A. B. Spinney, Amanda Coffman, Dr. W. O. Knowles, Dr. Julia M. Walton, Mrs. Belle Fuller, and we also hope to have our good brother, Dr. P. T. Johnson with us, besides other mediums of prominence. Come and bring our friends and enjoy the good things that are in store for us.

We are to have Brother Will J. Erwood of Wisconsin with us. He stands high in his work and is well known throughout Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana. He was at one time president of the Wisconsin State Association. He is one of the best workers on our platform, and in him Michigan Spiritualists will find a rare treat. His writings are well known and his lectures a power of thought. I believe I am safe in saying this is Brother Erwood's first work for the State Association. Come and hear him; it will do you good.

The Home has had a sadness. Miss Ellen Hoben passed away after a week's illness. I wonder if the Spiritualists in Michigan or elsewhere realize what it means to be without a home, no relatives to care for you and no friends. As I stood by her bed I could not help but feel we were carrying out the wishes of our arisen friend and brother, John B. Goff. It means something for a board to carry on a work like this. Spiritualists, can you feel you are living up to the teachings of our truths and not lend a helping hand? If you can, your Spiritualism is vastly different from mine. I believe it teaches us to help the poor and needy and work for the Brotherhood of Man. Awake to the needs of the hour and help our State Association carry on its work, for in unity there is strength, and it is far more blessed to give than to receive.

Those who feel they can aid us, we shall be very grateful for gifts which come in the spirit of helpfulness, no matter how small. Send same to the secretary, 1230 Michigan avenue E., Lansing, Mich.

GENEVRA SPAULDING.
Secretary M. S. S. A.

AN EARNEST APPEAL.

Texas Spiritualists, Attention!—Respond to the Call.

In The Progressive Thinker of January 5, 1907, No. 393, Mr. Virgil H. Mills of Hubbard, Texas, makes an appeal to Spiritualists "everywhere" to "aid himself and brother in establishing a permanent camp-meeting in Texas." I know these young men personally. I know that they gave freely of their time, money, and heart to have a ten days' meeting last August at the park Mr. Mills mentions. I know that almost without exception, Spiritualists in Texas are anxious to have a camp and I know of no better, no cheaper, no easier way than to assist the Mills Brothers in the way indicated. Remember, he does not ask you to give him the money. He will send you twelve stereoscopic views for $1.25. If you have no stereoscope, send them to a friend.

I have many acquaintances, and some friends among the Spiritualists of Texas, and this letter is a direct personal appeal to YOU, whoever you may be. I think I can guarantee that the money sent will be used for camp-meeting purposes, and if enough money is secured we will have a camp in Texas next summer. Don't be afraid to send the money. I think I know that this appeal is made largely to find out the prevailing idea among Spiritualists as to a camp-meeting. We all want one. There are Spiritualists enough in Texas to raise any ordinary sum of money by each paying a small prorata.

Don't think, as many do, "Well, maybe they won't have the camp, and my money will do no good."

You know what force there is in thought vibration, and the very fact of sending $1.25 (a very small sum to each) will start a vibration and cause others to do the same thing.

One thing more, and I will trespass no more on your patience and the editor's space. Send this money NOW. It will take some time to set the wheels in motion to have a successful camp-meeting, and speakers and mediums must be secured before other camp engagements are made; so send for a set of 12 stereoscopic views at $1.25 at once.

While this appeal is primarily to Texas Spiritualists, it is an invitation to friends everywhere to help us, and at the same time give yourself the pleasure of these views. This letter is an earnest appeal to every Spiritualist I have ever met, to respond promptly to Mr. Mills offer. I appreciate the kind things said of me, but I am in no way peculiarly interested in this camp-meeting but am eager, anxious, to see the cause advance in Texas. Let me make a prophecy (my special phase of mediumship, but am not, never was, a commercial medium). To each one who sends for these views there will come some special pleasure traceable to it. I cannot tell what prompts me to make such a prophecy, but there it is.

SPIRITUALIST CONDUCTS THE FUNERAL OF BARBOUR.

Many Handsome Floral Tributes Grace Bier of Late Politician.—Obsequies Largely Attended by Friends and Relatives.

According to the simple rites of the Spiritualistic faith, of which the deceased was a liberal believer, the funeral of the late William H. Barbour, prominent Republican politician and former county office holder, was held from his late home, on West Third street, Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock. W. V. Nicum, an ordained minister of the Spiritualistic cult, delivered a sermon, in which he eulogized the life of the deceased and spoke of the doctrines of his faith with reference to death.

"The separation of body and soul is but a step on the pathway of progression," said the speaker, "and a doorway to a higher condition of the spirit."

The obsequies were public and were attended by a large representation of friends and relatives of the deceased, in addition to many who were drawn thither by the quaint simplicity of the ceremonies of the Spiritualistic faith. Handsome floral tributes graced the bier, the majority of them the offerings of the public and fraternal societies with which the deceased was affiliated.

The burial was with military ceremony, the Union Veteran Legion conducting services at the grave in Woodland cemetery. The Republican executive committee attended in a body. The following members of the regiment with which the deceased fought in the War of the Rebellion bore the remains to their final resting place: Captain P. M. Harman, Charles Ware, Charles Onderton, Michael Kurtz, Robert Jackson, Abel Ensey, John Wry and Philip Marquardt.

The Republican county executive committee, with which W. H. Barbour was identified for a number of years, adopted resolutions commending his upright life, his loyal public service, his kindly spirit, and his devotion to all the duties as a member of the committee.—The Dayton (Ohio) Daily News.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

My brother, Benjamin Flint Leighton, passed to the higher life from his beautiful home in Haverhill, Mass., on the morning of January 5. He was 86 years of age on Christmas. His aim was to leave the world better for his having lived in it. I now have four brothers and three sisters waiting to welcome me on the flower-gemmed shore of a brighter land and a better world.

GEORGE F. LEIGHTON.

At Hudson, Ohio, Dec. 26, 1906, Mr. Leach passed to the higher life, aged 71 years. He was firm in the faith of Spiritualism, and his wishes were fulfilled by his sons, that D. A. Herrick speak the last words over his mortal form. Interment at Northfield, Ohio.

At Ashtabula, Ohio, Jan. 7, 1907, I. J. Counterman, aged 25 years, went to the other life by his own hand. No cause was known for this deed, and he leaves a wife to bear the loss of a husband, also father and mother. D. A. Herrick officiated. Singing by the Spiritualist quartette composed of Mrs. A. H. Talcott, Mrs. O. Bliss, Chas. Hooley and H. F. Munsel.

At Columbus, Ohio, Dec., 1906, Frank A. Skinner passed to spirit life. After years of suffering he gladly welcomed the summons to join the loved ones on the other shore. He left a wife and one daughter, who with himself, are ardent Spiritualists, and know full well that their loss was his gain. Six members of the Musician's Union, of which he was a member, made beautiful music during the services, which were conducted by his old time friend, D. A. Herrick, of Akron, Ohio.

Mrs. Nancy Osborn of Vandalia, Mich., passed to the higher life, Jan. 15, 1907, aged 86 years. She became a Spiritualist in 1852, prior to the wrong teachings and downfall of Spiritualism at Vandalia, just as they were about to build a temple about fifty years ago; but having gained the knowledge of the higher teachings she tried to live it, being kind and generous, and always on the side of right and justice. She outlived the ridicule, and won the community as her friends. Services at her old home, Jan. 17, by the writer. Interment at the Prairie Grove Cemetery.

H. L. CHAPMAN.

Mrs. Jennie Leach, who had long been a resident of Vandalia, and for many years a staunch Spiritualist passed to spirit life at the home of her niece in Chicago Heights, Jan. 16, aged 69 years. She was a close friend of Mrs. Osborn, and will be sadly missed by her many friends in Vandalia and vicinity. Services by the writer at her home in Vandalia, Jan. 18; burial at the Lily Lake Cemetery.

H. L. CHAPMAN.

My daughter, Mrs. Sibyl Henney, passed to spirit life on January 17, at Woodville, N. Y., aged 43 years. She was reared a Spiritualist, and had a knowledge of spirit return from childhood.

R. BRUCE PHELPS.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

Since making my big hit in Mexican Mining property I got so many letters from people I know to be readers of your paper, that I ask you to publish this statement. If you and your wives wish to make money fast and sure invest in Mexico. Cecil Rhodes, Mining King, says that "Mexican Mine investments are the safest in the world and the most profitable." Mexican laws will not permit that wild-cat business that robs the people in the State. It is the richest mining district in the world. Any person can make money. A few dollars' investment now will bring you thousands in a year. I invisted $10 for a friend who is now getting $5 per month dividend. I have nothing to sell, and as I am traveling I have no chance to answer letters. The Pittsburg Oaxaca Mining Company, Block 25, Pittsburg, Pa., will give you full information regarding SAFE INVESTMENTS in Mexico. This firm is perfectly reliable. Through them I made $20,000 in less than a year with only a few dollars to start with. You don't have to go to Mexico. Ask them to send you samples of ore. Your old friend,

JACK MARSTON.

"Just How to Wake the Solar Plexus." By Elizabeth Towne. Valuable for health. Price, 25 cents.

"The Jesuits." By Rev. B. P. Austin, A. M., B. D. An excellent pamphlet. Price, 15 cents.

"Immortality, Its Naturalness, Its Possibilities and Proofs." By J. M. Peebles, M. A., M. D., Ph. D., Contains the address rejected by the Philosophical Society of Great Britain, with Introduction and Explanatory Letter. Price 10 cents.

The World Has Never Seen the Like!

At Great Expense we have secured the copyright of Mr. Ghandi's translation of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." It is to be sent forth as a gift to our subscribers, as set forth in the following:

It is an absolute fact. We are enabling our subscribers to form a valuable library at a nominal cost. One of them writes:

"I have your THIRTEEN premium books, which if I had bought in the open market at the usual price would have cost me at least $15. Sending each year for one copy at the cost of 25 cents, the whole thirteen volumes have cost me exactly $3.25. As you paid the postage thereon, which amounts to not less than $1.40, all you receive for the Thirteen copies I have, is exactly $1.85, causing you to lose in the aggregate each year a large amount of money in order to benefit your subscribers."

The above is an accurate estimate. All we have received for the thirteen premium books when they have been ordered one at a time for thirteen consecutive years, is approximately $1.85, a little more than the price of a single book.

We now offer as a GIFT OUTRIGHT, one of the most valuable books of the present age—THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. In order to obtain this book, you must send TEN CENTS in stamps to pay the postage thereon, and ONE DOLLAR for The Progressive Thinker one year. Your library is not complete without this remarkable book. Every Spiritualist should have it for study and reference. Every orthodox Christian should read it, and thus learn the whole truth in regard to Jesus. Remember it is a GIFT to you on the TERMS MENTIONED above. We expect to distribute at least Twenty Thousand copies as GIFTS.

Have You Read OUR PREMIUM BOOK OFFER?

Truly, the world has NEVER SEEN the like before. Search the annals of history, ANCIENT AND MODERN; critically examine the history of Spiritualism; look here and there, in every nook and corner of the world, and you CANNOT find a parallel to the offer made in reference to these THIRTEEN remarkable PREMIUM BOOKS. They constitute a wonderfully valuable Spiritualistic and Occult LIBRARY, and are furnished at a nominal sum. All are substantially bound and neatly printed, and those who purchase them are DELIGHTED WITH THEM.

We have now THIRTEEN magnificent PREMIUM BOOKS which you can select from.

GEMS OF THOUGHT, by SEVENTEEN leading authors, is our last Premium Book.

Any one of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 25 cents. This is the price, remember, when you order only one book in connection with a yearly subscription. The paper, one year, and one Premium Book, $1.25. But if you order more than one Premium Book the price is as follows:

Any two of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 70 cents.
Any three of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.
Any four of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.
Any five of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.75.
Any six of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.05.
Any seven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.
Any eight of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.65.
Any nine of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.
Any ten of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.10.
Any eleven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.40.
Any twelve of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.85.

Lastly, all of these THIRTEEN Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for 4.15, something never before equalled in this country or Europe.

Bear in mind that every order for a Premium Book must be accompanied with a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker, which is $1. We repeat that the world has never seen the like of it before.

OUR THIRTEEN REMARKABLE PREMIUM BOOKS FOR $4.15.

The following is the list of titles of the Twelve Premium Books:

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 278 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

Is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

What All the World's a-Seeking.

RALPH WALDO TRINE.

Each is building his world from within; thought is the builder; for thoughts are forces,—subtle, vital, irresistible, omnipotent,—and according as used do they bring power or impotence, peace or pain, success or failure.—From Title-page.

The above books are beautifully bound in gray-green raised cloth, stamped in deep old-green and gold, with gilt top. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

ANCIENT PAGAN AND MODERN CHRISTIAN SYMBOLISM.

By Thomas Inman, M. D. Revised and enlarged, with an Essay on Baal Worship, on "The Assyrian Sacred Grove," and other allied symbols. Third edition, with two hundred illustrations. Cloth, $1.

Prof. Lockwood's Books.

Store your mind with the great but demonstrative truths found in consecutive order only in these writings.

Prof. Lockwood is the only writer, thinker and lecturer in this country who affirms that the evolution of the soul of man is in strict accord and agreement with the evolution of the soul of nature; and that the only proof of immortality inheres in an analysis of nature's fundamental principles and the co-relation of cosmic elements and energies.

These great truths are explained and demonstrated from the plane of the Spiritual Philosophy founded on Nature itself.

The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature and Its Relation to the Philosophy of Spiritualism. A scientific demonstration of the invisible principles and attributes of nature and Modern Spiritualism. A mint of scientific truths as the basis of its phenomena. Price 25 cents.

The Infidelity of Ecclesiasticism—A Menace to the American Civilization. The entire hierarchy of Ecclesiasticism arraigned as infidels for subverting the scientific demonstrations of universities and colleges, by substituting the immoral phantoms of the Mosaic Hypothesis. It is a hot shot. Price 25 cents.

Historical, Logical and Philosophical Objections to the Dogmas of Reincarnation and Re-Embodiment. A concise and masterly review of the historical origin of Reincarnation as an ancient dogma. Its illogical claims and inconsistent assumptions. Its glaring defects and dogmas dissected. Price 25 cents.

The Spiritualism of Nature. Modern Spiritualism has its basic truths in nature, and is proven not by the bible or any sacred cosmogony, but by an analysis of nature's self-existent principles. Price 15 cents.

Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth. The greatest book, and the greatest truth of any age; a book of 212 pages with several telling scientific illustrations. Continuity of life and the association of spirit realms demonstrated to be in scientific accord with principles of the Co-relation of Force, and the Conservation of Energy. The greatest book ever written in the defence and support of Spiritualism. Price $1.

The Relation Science Holds to Natural Philosophy and Its Conflict with Every Phase of Religion.—In this essay the author shows that science is not a thing—a corporation or individual, but a process of inductive and deductive reasoning. Its acceptance means the death of Theurgical religions. Price 15 cents.

All of Prof. Lockwood's publications are on sale at The Progressive Thinker office, Chicago, Ill., and at the rostrum when he lectures. These treatises contain the wealth of a vast historical and scientific research.

The Universe

By L. M. Rose.

This booklet contains 71 pages of explanation regarding force; the beginning of creation; what matter is; what life is; immortality; psychic science; the soul of things, and ends with a poem entitled "Song of Psyche," by Emma Nickerson-Warne. Price 25 cents.

PROGRESSION

Or How a Spirit Advances in Spirit Life. The evolution of Man. By Michael Faraday. Price, 15c.

ROMANISM EXPOSED

Is a pamphlet of 80 pages, in reply to Prof. David Swing, Priest Cashman and Dr. Withrow, and is principally in defense of Protestantism. A concise little pamphlet. Price 15 cents.

Science and a Future Life

By Prof. James H. Hyslop. Price $1.50; Postage 10 cents.

This work is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its ethical deductions, unanswerable in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. For sale at this office.

Germs of Mind in Plants.

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

and Its Analysis, Its Relation to Modern Astrophysics, by Edgar L. Larkin, Director Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, California. This book treats upon a new branch of research into the laws of nature, and to the student or even an admirer of the modern astrological literature will surely come with great interest. Price, cloth, $1.75.

THE WORLD BEAUTIFUL.

Series one, two and three. By Lilian Whiting. Three choice volumes, each complete in itself, in which spirituality is related to everyday life in such a way as to make the world beautiful. Price $1.00 each.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. G. Purinton: Q. Is it true that Houdini can escape from a packing box, being first handcuffed, and placed therein and the cover of the box tightly nailed down by a committee chosen for that purpose?

A. Apparently he does. Even more is done by other performers. Prof. Marcus is handcuffed by a sheriff chosen by the audience, his legs tied together, placed in a sack, the sack tied, the knot sealed; the sack then placed in a box, the cover tightly nailed, and in a few minutes he walks into the front door of the theater, down the aisle to the front and salutes the audience. But he has no supernatural assistance. It is a trick of magic art, and a wonderfully clever performance. It yields the magicians good salaries, and they will be slow to give away the "trick" by which their audiences are bewildered. It is exceedingly remarkable that many rest their faith in Spiritualism on manifestations which are of this character—rope-tying, etc. As the seer A. J. Davis has said, if these are genuine they are the work of spirits descending to sleight-of-hand performances. Why should Spiritualism seek evidence in these wonder works?

Yet all religions in the world rest their evidences on this foundation. The performer of impossible things—that is apparently performing—was believed to be endowed with divinity. A man exhibiting a phonograph two centuries ago, if he had managed to escape being burned, he might have succeeded in starting a new religion, and made his votaries worship the instrument as a divinity and accept the words he had privately made on its records, as the voice of God. Never a wise man, seer or prophet had the superlative chance a phonograph would afford. They had to rely mainly on "healing the sick," most illusive of all manifestations, taking chances on foretelling the future, or sometimes they descended to sleight-of-hand, or availed themselves of chemical knowledge unknown to the densely ignorant masses.

I repeat, that it is strange indeed, that Spiritualists should seek evidence for their belief, not in the higher ranges of psychic manifestations, but in such as are given and have been given by wonder-workers, since history made a record. Ask the Christian what proof he has of the divinity of Christ, and he will refer you to healing the sick, raising the dead, walking on the water, changing water into wine, feeding thousands on a few loaves and fishes.

Should the Spiritualist follow this pitiable lead, and when asked for the fundamental evidence of his faith reply, that is the release of the medium when tied with ropes; the escape of the medium from a box, the appearance of spirits from a cabinet constructed for that purpose; the healing of the sick?

Now I do not want to be understood as objecting to any of these manifestations. I only wish them to be taken at their real value.

First of all the primal principle which is held fast to by every genuine scientific investigator, in whatever field he may enter, never brings the greater cause to account for phenomena that are explained by a lesser. That is, he would not refer to spirit agency, anything that could be explained by physical causes.

The Spiritualist who has investigated patiently, well knows that the line cannot be sharply drawn, but even if it should cut too far into the spirit border, there is such an infinite field remaining that the cause would be strengthened rather than weakened.

Inquirer: Q. I often see the term "the new Spiritualism." What is meant by it?

A. This is a difficult question to answer, for the term covers a wide range, formerly covered by the words "occult," "psychic" manifestations, and the odds and ends of credulity and ignorance. It has never been defined and is used by those who would be considered as having something better than plain Spiritualism. But after all, is not the old Spiritualism good enough?

There has been a definition given by spirits which clearly presents its empire:

"As a science, Spiritualism is the knowledge of the psychical, or spiritual, nature of man; and as spirit is the moving force of the universe, its study is that of creation, and is not complete until the unknown becomes known. In a narrower sense, as applied to the communion between spiritual beings and man, it embraces the facts, conditions and laws of such intercourse. It unitizes the psychical phenomena of all ages, and races of mankind, by proving that they are all governed by the same underlying laws. Modern Spiritualism is distinguished from that of the past by its acceptance of the doctrine of law; that the spirit realm is governed by laws as fixed and determinable as these which rule physical matter."

This definition includes everything beyond the borders of physical matter, and by the subjection of matter to spirit, takes in the physical universe as well. It is difficult how a "new Spiritualism" can exceed this, or embrace provinces not already exempted. While admitting that there has been a marked change in the attitude of many toward Spiritualism, and in the theories advanced, it appears to be a drifting away from the firm shores with no more than theories for guides.

Spiritualism is for the home and the eager-hearted. If there is any one place in world or heaven where the departed would desire to come it would be to their old homes, to the family circle. If there means are provided to receive them and allow of their communication, the ideal is gained. That is the Spiritualism following the years of its advent. The spirits came as realities, they spoke of their sphere as a reality. It was almost like meeting face to face. All that Spiritualism has become has been the outgrowth of this plain intercourse with the unseen world. Its most eminent lecturers were developed in these circles; its most valued writers there received their first inspiration; its most crucial facts have there been presented.

Now we are told that this product of a half century of growth is valueless because ill-observed, and without scientific methods. We will henceforth call Spiritualism "Occultism," "Theosophy," or "Psychic Research." A medium will no more be called by that ignoble name, but a "psychic"; a circle will be a "session for occult research." We will hand the whole matter over to a coterie of scientists and after a while if they determine that the probabilities are that something they do not understand is manifested through the psychics they subject to the "sweat box"—in police language—we'll follow by saying, "Yes, there is something in it, but we don't know." Meantime the assurance of the old-time circle is gone. The feeling that the dear departed were near us, and although fettered by the method of communicating all they desired, and in a manner, yet able to prove that they lived and loved!

The danger of these circles! The dangers of mediumship! I wish to write this reply in largest letters: THAT TO THOSE WHO INVESTIGATE SPIRITUALISM WITH PURELY SPIRITUAL MOTIVES; A DESIRE TO KNOW OF SPIRIT LIFE, AND PRAYER FOR THE COMING OF LOVED ONES, THERE IS NO DANGER. There may be to those who seek amusement or the furtherance of their worldly affairs by knowledge thus gained; by those who would prostitute it to fortune-telling, for to every one comes his own, and a reception of what he seeks. You may talk of obsession by evil spirits; the devil never obsessed an angel. It is said he tempted a Christ but failed.

It does not seem necessary to use any adjective to qualify Spiritualism. It is exceedingly ancient, yet it is not old; it surely cannot be called new, And as Materialism designates the realm of matter, Spiritualism presents that of spirit.

Those who would substitute for this wonderful all-embracing word the fine-sounding phrases, "occultism," theosophy, psychism, which severally or together only represent a small fraction, remind me of a gardener who, while shelling peas was asked what he was doing, replied: "Shelling the vegetable world." When expostulated with, he indignantly answered: "Peas should be the name of all vegetation. If you would have this proved to you put a peapod over your eyes and see if there will be anything else visible!"

THE BOOK OF THE WARS.

When the book of the wars of men is done
And the story is truly penned
From the yellowing page of the tale begun
To the chapter that holds The End—
When the trumpets of peace the world around
Have blent in a chorus grand,
And the battle flag shall no more be found
As a shadow above the land,
Will we keep the Book of the Wars of men
In a high and honored place
That our children's sons may be thrilled again
With the stories their eyes may trace?
Will we cherish the book in faithful pride
That men of a future age
May acquaint themselves with the ones who died
That the volume might have a page?
Will the Book of the Wars of Men tell truth?
Will it mingle the songs and cheers
With the sacrifice of the beardless youth
And the dew of a mother's tears?
Will it blazon in gold the noble deed
That won a forgotten fame?
Will it tell of the grips of a ceaseless greed
That has wrought for a nation's shame?
O, the Book of the Wars of men; it waits
Till the wakening of the world,
Till the banners that tell of scorns and hates
In the glory of peace are furled—
Will we keep it to tell of the rolling drum
And the peals that the fifers know,
Or to speak to the men of the days to come
Of the ways that they must not go?

"How to Train Children and Parents," Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying this little book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

"Spirit Echoes." By Mattie E. Hull. This pretty volume contains fifty-seven of the author's latest and choicest poems. Neatly bound in cloth, and with portrait of the author. Price, 75 cents.

"HOW SHALL I BECOME A MEDIUM?"

It is fully answered in "Mediumship, and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation," by Hudson Tuttle. Price 35 cents. Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio

J. M. Peebles, M.D.

The Veteran Author and Lecturer at Melbourne, Australia,

There has always been a tender place in my heart for Dr. Peebles, as his was the first lecture on Spiritualism that I ever listened to, some thirty years ago. This subject, although sternly tabooed at that time by the orthodox, was attracting great attention in Australia, and the Victoria Theatre, Sydney, where the lecture was given one Sunday afternoon, was filled with attentive listeners.

I remember as if it were yesterday, how Dr. Peebles walked on to the platform with a large piece of stone in his hand, went straight to the base of the spiritual philosophy by declaring that if that stone were exposed to sufficient heat it would resolve itself again into the gaseous vapour whence all so-called "matter" is formed. It was a new aspect of Spiritualism to one like myself, who was then only an investigator, and gave the subject a scientific turn that commended itself at once to my attention. This is, indeed, the foundation of the spiritual philosophy and of its every offshoot. Prentice Mulford, who may be claimed as the chief promulgator of advanced spiritual ideas, takes the evanescent character of matter and the potency of spirit as the raison d'etre of his divine message to the world. This lecture of Dr. Peebles' and some purely scientific ones about the same time on Sound, Heat and Light, when the vibration theory, afterwards so ably expounded by Sir William Crookes in connection with a psychic world, showed the limit of our bodily senses and the illimitable unseen forces around us, gave Spiritualism for myself the scientific and firm basis that its ablest defenders all the world over claim for it. And now by the latest American mail comes evidence that Dr. Peebles has not only defied time in his 86th year by an activity that fills columns upon columns of the American papers, but that he has begun anew also to attempt a solution of the deeper mysteries of this boundless Universe in his latest volume, "The Pathway of the Human Spirit," with sub-title, "Did it pre-exist and does it re-incarnate again into mortal life?"

Those of you who remember the pamphlet issued about two years ago by Dr. Peebles on "Re-incarnation," and the strenuous opposition to this doctrine put forth therein against all-comers, will agree with our contemporary, London Light, that "his answer to these questions does not seem as decisive as of old. "Re-incarnation," Light goes on, "used to provoke him to the fiercest specimens of his always fervid vocabulary, but he appears to have had a walk around to the other side of the shield and to see the connection between pre-existence to which he has always been friendly and the re-incarnation which he has always abhorred." Although he says in his preface that the arguments in favor of re-incarnation are "growing in favor" with him, nevertheless he informs us that his "last word has not been spoken on the subject."

The Theory of Re-incarnation.

And who will ever say the last word on it? It is a subject on which people are strongly disposed to dogmatise, and for my part I am convinced that many will be the illusions dispelled, many the cherished dogmas shattered when the spirit enters that wonderful spirit world where all is Love and orderly Evolution.

That the soul has pre-existed goes without saying to such as realize that the divine spirit of which every human body is the temple, is a portion of the universal spirit pervading all nature in which we live and move and have our being. Some of the greatest minds—F. W. H. Myers among the rest—who, though not Re-incarnationists are on the highest spiritual planes, believe that great Teachers are occasionally sent again either by their own volition or desire or at the behest of some great spiritual conclave in the spheres as special messengers. But we are all incarnations of the Divine Spirit with an eternity stretching before us of infinite progress, and our sure path is to be ever pressing forward "toward the mark of the high calling of God," leaving all questions that can never be definitely settled to a wider and fuller knowledge. And this in a measure is the attitude of Dr. Peebles, for he says in his introductory chapter if people "who have not thought along the line of the spirit's purpose they will see that his aim has been to present tentatively the higher teachings of life and immortality in relation to involution and evolution and has followed the injunction to "Speak thy thought if thou believ'st it;

Let it jostle whom it may,"

to which sentiment I cordially subscribe. But let us be free from dogmatism!

Dr. Peebles and Walt Whitman.

For myself, the most delightful part of Dr. Peebles' book, "The Spirit's Pathway," is its charming introductory chapter, in which he devotes himself in a quite unexpected manner to a dissertation on Whitman with a few personal details. It would be difficult for me to explain in a short article the influence that Whitman has had on my own spiritual development. Whitman and the bible are my constant companions whatever else comes along. It is over a quarter of a century ago that when on a visit to the Blue Mountains of N. S. Wales with a party of friends that one of them passed me a volume of Whitman edited by W. M. Rossetti. Strange to say I opened the book at that remarkable poem "To You," and its stirring appeal

"There is no endowment in man or woman that is not tallied in you,
There is no virtue, no beauty in man or woman, but is good in you,
No pluck, no endurance in others, but as good is in you,
No pleasure waiting for others, but an equal pleasure waits for you," struck me like words of fire. Then I turned to "Whispers of Heavenly Death," and found that here again was written that I had been in search of for so long—all my life in fact. "This is the first poet who speaks direct to the soul," I remarked, as I returned the book to my friend—"the first man who dares in his 'Carol of Death' to welcome the Great Deliverer."

"Dark mother, always gliding near,
with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee—I glorify thee above all—
I bring thee a song that, when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly."

Years afterwards, when I had read every line Whitman had written, I came across W. M. Rossetti's mention of him in a volume of letters, in which he said to Mrs. Gilchrist, the biographer of William Blake: "That glorious man will one day be known as one of the greatest sons of Earth, a few steps below Shakespeare on the throne of Immortality." And so it was good to read how Dr. Peebles had, like the friend who gave me my first glimpse of the "Good Gray Poet," met Whitman in the flesh, had chatted with him on great themes and the great minds in our midst. "Longfellow," Whitman told Dr. Peebles, "called upon him with Childs, the great publisher. His manners," he said, "were stately conventional—all right, but careful." "Was his conversation striking? Was he at all like Emerson?" asked Dr. Peebles.

"Not at all. Emerson was as different as day from night. Emerson had the best manners of any man I ever met; by this I mean manners in the right sense; manners, words, thoughts, always right, yet never at any time suggesting preparation or design. * * * Dear Emerson! I doubt if the literary classes which have taken to coddling him have any right to their god. He belonged to us—yes, to us—rather than to them." It was Emerson who said on the first publishing of 'Leaves of Grass," over half a century ago, that "it was the greatest piece of wit and wisdom yet produced."

About this wonderful life of ours that Dr. Peebles is endeavoring to elucidate, Whitman says:—

"O, but it is not the years—it is I, it is You.
* * * * * * * * * *
We stand amid time beginningless and endless, we stand amid evil and good,
All swings around us, there is as much darkness as light,
* * * * * * * * * *
I believe Materialism is true and Spiritualism is true, I reject no part."

And here we leave this great subject of Life among the stars and systems in which we are all being whirled along on our course, and for further information on Dr. Peebles' volume will ask our readers to turn to the excellent "Review" kindly furnished by our distinguished contributor, Mr. James Smith.

What Dr. Peebles is Doing Now.

By the latest advices we learn that our enterprising traveller was just about to start on his fourth journey around the world, and that he will take in Australia on the way. This is good news for his many Australian friends. He was to sail from New York, we learn from "The Two Worlds" of October 19, on that same date for England, en route to India. Dr. Peebles has long desired to again visit that country and to speak in that wonderful land of Occult mysteries of the light that Modern Spiritualism is pouring into these newer civilizations and of the life-giving spirit it is infusing into every branch of modern thought. In Dr. Hensoldt's most interesting and learned lectures just given in Melbourne, he spoke of the sadness that permeates the life of the Hindoo. Life is looked upon by them as something to be endured rather than a never-failing source of joy, so well defined in that splendid poem of Tennyson's, "The Two Voices." It is not until we get at the meaning of Life here as a school for the development of the soul that we learn to rejoice in it, and it must not be forgotten that Buddha, in his "Day of Enlightenment," rejoiced as he felt himself at last "at one" in loving sympathy with every breathing, sentient thing. Life's lesson is not learned until we can rejoice in the face of difficulties and be independent of externals for the light that Love brings perpetually to the earnest soul. Dr. Peebles is full of this all-pervading optimism, and his mission to India will be watched with interest by his many friends all over the world. As Tennyson says in that poem, "The Two Voices:"

"'Tis life, whereof our nerves are scant,
Oh, life, not death, for which we pant
More life and fuller that I want."

"The Spirit's Pathway Traced."

Dr. Peebles, who may be said to be eighty-five years young, for his mind is as full of fire, his brain as active and his pen as rapid as they were at five and twenty, has just published a book thus entitled, as an answer to the questions: "Did the Spirit pre-exist, and does it re-incarnate again into mortal life?" In a preliminary chapter tells us it was written under the same powerful spiritual compulsion which urged him two years ago to compose "The Demonism of the Age and of Spirit Obsessions;" and that when he paused for some assurance of the necessity of such work at the present time, the answer came in tenderest tones of earnestness, "Write—write! The time has has come." And no one who is watching the direction of the currents of modern thought can doubt that the world is just becoming ripe for the illumination which a volume like this is calculated to bestow upon it. For the foundations of that great deep, which we call the human mind, are being broken up. Men are falling away from the faiths of their forefathers; the theologies of an ignorant and superstitious past are being renounced in all directions, with a feeling of wonder that they should ever have found even temporary acceptance; and while not a few persons are falling back upon Agnosticism, numbers are eagerly desiring the light that cometh from above. And never, perhaps, was the promise contained in the words, "Seek and ye shall find," more abundantly fulfilled than at the commencement of what promises to be the most eventful century in the history of the human race, more so even than the first century of the Christian Era, because assurances reaching mankind from those higher intelligences, who are co-workers with the Master, for the redemption of mankind from the dominion of Self, that before the arrival of the year 2,000 he will have completed his mission on earth.

We are glad to find that to the first of the two questions propounded by Dr. Peebles, he was enabled to furnish a very emphatic reply. "Pre-existence," he writes, "is, with myself, a settled conviction." And the reader will find, in the succeeding chapters of this book, an overwhelming weight of testimony to justify that conviction, which is likewise held, at the present moment, by 400,000,000 of human beings in Asia.

To the second question, Dr. Peebles returns a more guarded answer: "That there is an underlying truth in the theory of re-incarnation, few with a philosophic turn of mind will deny;" and after rejecting the oriental idea of the transmigration of souls into lower forms of animal life as unscientific and, indeed, ridiculous, he goes on to say: "But re-incarnation considered in relation to involution and as the descending arc of the circle, is not only plausible but logically true, and so I am a believer in re-incarnation in the higher esoteric sense of that all-too-often misunderstood principle."

Without re-incarnation it would be absolutely impossible to reconcile the appalling disparities of character, capacity, opportunities and circumstances which prevail among mankind with the Supreme Justice of that Divine Being who is "no respecter of persons;" while this great truth, as the present writer holds it to be, supplies a master-key wherewith to unlock some of the profoundest mysteries of human life.

"The Pathway of the Human Spirit" is a book to be read and re-read with increasing profit and pleasure, and as such I cordially commend it to the study of my readers; merely asking its gifted author, in conclusion, to rectify, in a second edition, the error he has fallen into on page 47 of attributing to the poet Longfellow the noblest ode in the English language, namely, that entitled "Intimations of Immortality, from Recollections of Early Childhood," which Wordsworth was inspired to write while he was on the shores of the Lake of Grasmere.—Chas. Bright, in Harbinger of Light.

SOME PLAIN THOUGHTS.

The Ignorant Minister Is the Devil's Best Friend.

To assist our fellow-man in his struggle to a higher plane of spirituality is indeed a noble aim.

However, the apparent failure of the church everywhere, in this line of work which she assumes to do and pretends to accomplish, is deplorable in the extreme, and the almost general indifference to spiritual progress is only outdone by the frantic efforts for material things.

It is painful to observe the insincerity of those who pose as pillars and leaders in churches and kindred societies, who forever exhort their neighbors, shout the most amens, and make the longest prayers, and yet are far from living their public utterances in their private life.

A great fuss is being made of late in the religious world over the alleged success of those hell-fire and brimstone revivalists, with the devil to assist them "to awe their flocks a-quaking with rantings fierce." And, as a result of these mutual excitations, the most sensitive among them frequently break down under the mental strain; and now thousands of them languish in over-crowded asylums to eke out their miserable existence, and millions of others who have escaped this ignoble doom have nevertheless become spiritual cripples, whose diverse deformities are due to the reckless teaching of absurd doctrines by ignorant men, who have the impudence to brand a God of love as a vindictive monster, of whom they say he will wreak vengeance on all who have not found Jesus or salvation.

They fail to realize that salvation depends upon a well spent life and a rectifying of the past; and as the future is clouded with doubts, and the past with difficulties, nobody, and least of all the foolish preacher, can boast of his salvation until it has been worked out and earned. It is subject to a process which cannot be hastened with a shout and a scare, with a jump and a grab, by whitewash, or force-pump, or by any feat of mental gymnastics, no matter how emotional.

Salvation is the Truth; to find and live it makes our path and duty clear, and it alone can set us free.

The scripture tells us of one Jesus, who came to destroy the works of the devil, and to cast out demons, and said that those who would live up to his instructions should be his disciples, and also do the things he did, and even greater works should they do.

Now what are the works of those would-be disciples now-a-days? Do they cast out demons? or set the obsessed free? Verily, no! but to the contrary, they fill those with them who were free from them by forcing their ridiculous and false doctrines with threats and exhortations, upon the resistless victims, which muddle the brain and confuse the sensitive minds, and thus open wide the door for external influences to enter.

And when then in their ecstasy they shout and act foolish, the leaders say, "the spirit is upon them"—and so it is, but what kind of a spirit is it? Without saying so, the leaders would like to make one believe it is the Holy Ghost, or the Spirit of God, but for the fact that the poor victim becomes unmanageable in many cases and is sent to the mad-house for safe-keeping.

And thus it happens that those ignorant and overzealous salvation-peddlers, who call themselves followersd of Jesus—for which, by the way, he would be very grateful if delivered from—instead of helping to destroy the works of the devil, they, in their ignorance, have become his most industrious helpers and faithful servants.

Camp Couplets Concerning Southern Cassadaga Camp.

Mrs. Elsie Stumpf gave the address January 13, from the words, "What Shall the Harvest Be?" and brought out the point that as we sow so shall we reap.

Mr. J. H. Young read the address of January 20, subject "Life," given to him by automatic writing. It was a masterly effort.

Next Sunday a symposium by Mrs. Twing, Mr. Alonzo Hubbard and Mrs. Morrill of Grand Rapids, Mich., who with her husband has arrived and taken the speaker's suite of rooms in the Apartment House, and express themselves as delighted with their surroundings in general, and the climate in particular.

Camp will begin its first meeting, February 5.

Card parties, dances and public seances are well attended; private seances are more frequent, and strangers becoming more interested.

A large party will leave Tuesday for a week's visit to the beach; some going to Coronada and some to Sea Breeze, but all will see the automobile races for a day at least.

The Blue Springs and De Leon Springs parties speak highly of their trips.

The Hotel Webster will open Feb. 1, under the able management of Mr. and Mrs. John A. Jeffreys (nee Marguerite Webster). This house is near the camp grounds, with all modern conveniences, including steam heat.

Mr. and Mrs. Mack of Hartford, Ct., have taken their rooms in the Apartment House.

Cupid has been playing pranks with the hearts of Mr. Irvin and Mrs. Johnson. A trip to Tampa, and a return to domestic felicity in her cottage is the result.

GREETINGS!

An Interesting and Breezy Letter From Lole F. Prior.

A New Year is ours. As it unrolls its white scroll I am reminded that many weeks and months have passed by, since I last spoke to my dear friends through The Progressive Thinker. Weeks and monthsthat have been so filled with work and changing scenes, I have been almost unconscious of their passing. Many miles, by both land and water have I journeyed. I left Christ-Church, New Zealand, in March, 1906; returned to Wellington, N. Z., and remained four months; from there I went north to Gisborne, Auckland, Wairhi and Rotorua. At each city I spent some time, and hope have sown seeds which will bring forth a good harvest.

New Zealand is ready for Spiritualism, and it is too bad that more of our workers do not go there, especially as the society at Wellington is willing to pay well, and wish to engage a speaker by the year. After spending some time in the North Island, New Zealend, the last of September, I again crossed the Tasman Sea, and spent a short time visiting friends in Sydney, N. S. W., then on to Melbourne, Victoria, where I lectured in October. It was with sincere regret that I bade goodbye to these dear warm-hearted Australian friends, November 6, 1906, and turned my face once more westward. This time journeying further from home, so as to return to it.

Five long weeks on the sea, does not seem long, where one recalls that it took as many months, only a few years ago to make the voyage from Melbourne to London; but it is quite long enough. The passage was a very pleasant one, congenial people on the ship, attentive officers and stewards, who saw that each passenger was well taken care of. The rough part of the voyage was crossing the Australian Bight; where there are so many cross currents the sea is always rough. We experienced some nasty weather, and all were glad when we put in at Adelaide, So. Australia, where we spent a day.

Our next port was Freemantle, West Australia, from which port we took rail for Perth, the largest and most progressive town in the west, and where there is a very nice Spiritualist society.

I regretted that I could not spend some weeks there; but the "power" said, "go on your way."

From Freemantle 'tis ten days ere land is again in sight. It was a very pleasant time of the year, however, to be in that part of the world, not too hot, and the days passed quickly, for we had deck games, in the afternoon, and music and dancing at night.

I was all anxiety as we drew near Colombo, Ceylon, for it meant my first view of the Oriental life. I was not disappointed. How picturesque! how gaudy! how different from all that to me was familiar! Spent 24 hours, hours that were full and pressed down. Each one who spent the time on shore returned tired and broke; for somehow the natives have a knack of getting one's money out of his pocket; and you must be very careful or you are taken in by the wily Indians. One lady paid £2 (about $10.00), for what she supposed to be an emerald, and which proved to be a bit of glass! Oh! they are very clever, these men of dark skin!

Just as our ship got well under way, leaving Colombo, there was a cry "Man overboard!" Such a dreadful sound! all was confusion among the passengers, but how calmly, quickly and systematically did the sailors work; it did not take them long to have a boat in the water, and in less than half an hour had picked up the cast-away, for so it proved to be; a dark skinned man who had fallen from a Scotch ship, that had left three hours before. It seems almost incredible that anyone could remain in the Ocean that long without drowning; the poor fellow was half dead when picked up.

Ten days from Colombo to Suez. Will I ever forget the passage through the Red Sea? Or my first view of Egypt land?. No, never!

Then Port Said! The strangest, dirtiest seaport in the world. The most immoral spot to be found, so 'tis said, upon the east! Suez Canal. But I must not linger nor attempt to describe all the wonders of those five weeks! Little did I realize that there was still more in store for me.

When we entered the Mediterranean we had a nasty storm to battle against, but after 24 hours it abated, and we saw how beautiful can be that Ocean. How beautiful is Southern Italy and the Isle of Sicily. With mighty Etna rising in solitary grandeur to a height of 10,743 feet. The day was beautiful; warm sunshine, tinting the olive groves, vineyards and snow-peaked mountains, until all showed forth in many irridescent colors.

At the Straits of Messina, it is only seven miles from Sicily to Italy, and here is to be found some of the most picturesque spots in the world. Who does not recall a bit of history connected with this land? Is it not here that Giants; Cyclops and Lotophagi once dwelt? Did not Trojans, Cretans and Phoenicians once sail their ships in these waters? Did not Rome and Egypt once sail their great war galleys here? But if I linger too long will be my letter, and half is not yet told.

At Naples I left the "Orontes," the steamship that had been my home for so many weeks.

Naples, beautiful Naples! spent six days there, visited Pompeii. Walked in the silent streets and felt strongly the psychological influence of the place. Went to Torre Annunziata and Boscotricase, the two villages that suffered so much through the eruption of Vesuvius last April. At Torre Annunziata the ashes were six feet deep, but the Italian government sent the soldiers there, they cleaned the streets and houses; and rebuilt those that had collapsed; but Boscotrascase was less fortunate, a stream of lava swept through the main part of the town, killing many and covering to a depth of 40 feet over 50 houses; in places the lava was still hot. I climbed to the crater of Vesuvius, a hard walk of two hours, now that Cook's tram-line is destroyed, and standing on the edge of that great "blow-hole," one can form only a slight idea of the great quantity of lava fires, gas and ashes that has come forth from time to time.

From Naples I went north to Rome, passing through historic ground. I spent eight days in the Eternal City, days that were all too short. Would that it could have been months. Space forbids me entering into detail, but I must speak of one experience: I had an audience with the Pope, Pius X. Little did I think that such a privilege would be mine. From Rome a few hours brought me to Pisa, from there to Nice. Monte Carlo and along the Riveren, to Marseilles, France, where I spent two days, and there took passage on the "Oruba," December 23, for London, which city I reached after a stormy voyage the last day of the year.

My work in England has opened with bright prospects and as I am expecting to visit Wales and Scotland while here, I may have something of interest to say in my next letter. I will also tell about the royal welcome extended by the London Alliance.

I do not expect to remain here longer than three months, and will return to the U. S. A. in time for the camp meetings. Am open for any engagements after April first. 1907.

Letters may be addressed Lois F. Prior, 18 Endsleigh Gardens, N. W. London, England.

I hope my letter is not too long. You will hear from me again soon, however. I may be in the U. S. only a few months, for it is now my wish to return to the colonies again the last of this year. If so, I'll be away some years, for I will then go to South Africa also.

With the New Year's greetings.

LOIS F. PRIOR.

IMPORTANT CONVENTION.

The N. A. W. S. A. Will Hold Its 39th Annual Convention, February 14-19, in Music Hall, Fine Arts' Building, Chicago.

The friends of equal rights will come together on this occasion with an outlook even more than usually bright.

During the past year full suffrage has been granted to the 2,500,000 women of Finland, the greatest victory since full national suffrage was given to the women of Federated Australia in 1902. Within the past year municipal suffrage has also been granted to women in Natal, South Africa; National Woman Suffrage Associations have been organized in Hungary, Italy and Russia, and the reports at the recent meeting of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance at Copenhagen showed a remarkable increase in the agitation for woman suffrage all over Europe. In England, out of the 670 members of the present House of Commons, 420 are pledged to its support.

In the United States, widely-circulated newspapers and magazines, representing the most opposite political views, have lately declared for woman suffrage; the National Grange has just endorsed it unanimously, and the American Federation of Labor with only one dissenting vote. In Chicago, 87 organizations with an aggregate membership of 10,000 women, have petitioned for a municipal woman suffrage clause in the new charter, and the men and women most prominent in the city's good works are supporting the plea. In conservative Vermont, a municipal woman suffrage bill this year passed the house 130 to 25, and came so near passing the senate that a change of three votes would have carried it. In the Vermont Constitution Convention of 1870, woman suffrage received but one solitary vote.

In Oregon, where an equal suffrage amendment was last spring submitted to the voters for the third time, a more systematic and organized campaign was made against it than ever before in any other state. The combine formed against it was said to have been the strongest ever effected against any public measure in Oregon. Yet the amendment received a larger vote than ever before, and came so near victory that a change of 5,022 votes in a total of 83, 893 would have carried it.

In California, five of the six political parties this year put woman suffrage planks in their state platforms.

In Colorado, the chairmen of the Republican and Democratic State Central Committees have united in denying over their own names the anonymous report that equal suffrage was a failure, and that the leaders of both parties had determined to nominate no more women. Mrs. Katherine L. Craig, the newly elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction for Colorado, was the only one of the victorious State officers who ran thousands of votes ahead of the ticket.

Men and women are natural complements of oneanother. American political life to-day is marked by executive force and ability, qualities in which men are strong, but it is often lacking in conscience and humanity. These a larger infusion of the mother element would supply. We believe that men and women in co-operation can accomplish better work than either sex alone.

We invite all who share this belief to meet with us at our National Convention and in an earnest effort to crystalize public sentiment, to consult together, to devise plans for co-operation and to take such steps for advancing the interests of our Association as will best serve the progress of woman's enfranchisement.

The gathering will lack the visible presence of Susan B. Anthony, the beloved Honorary President of the Association for so many years; but in the rapid advance of the movement to which she was devoted, her soul goes marching on. One day of the Convention will be a memorial meeting for her; but the best of all memorials will be to carry forward to victory the cause she loved.

Clairvoyant's Diagram Leads to Stolen Jewelry.

Lynn, Mass.—By means of a diagram drawn by a clairvoyant, whom they had consulted on the case, Inspector Firth of Portland, Me., and H. C. Mason of the West End Hotel in that city, found jewelry valued at more than $2,000 buried in the cellars of two houses here.

The jewelry is the property of the wife of Colonel Castner of the West End Hotel and of Mrs. H. J. Lessard of the Jefferson Hotel, both of Portland, and is said to have been stolen by Carl Dunbar, alias Earl Robert, alias Charles DeLacey, who has already a long police record, and Dr. Paul Castner and his wife. The two latter are under arrest in Portland charged with larceny.

One package of gems, valued at about $1,000, was found in a house on Eastern avenue, the second in a house at Lynn Highlands. The people of these houses are not implicated in the robbery.

The diagram was given the Inspector by Frank Vaughan of Portland, whose wife, a clairvoyant, had been consulted by the Portland officers in regard to the matter.—Boston Post.

THE LINEAL KEY

to its Origin, Character, Methods and Purposes.

The work nears the close with "The Mark of the Master" and a scientific analysis of "The Transition Called Death" carrying the reader to the doorway of the succeeding volume—in a final chapter entitled "The Passing of the Master"—from the plane of Earth into and beyond the dark "Magnetic Field" outward and upward through "Nature's Brilliant Barriers" into the dazzling splendor of the "Real Spiritual World."

Because of lateness of publication we are urging our friends to send Holiday Orders without delay—and to accompany them with cash payments—by P. O. or Express Orders or Bank Draft. Price, $2.

EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE.

For the use of Societies, Lyceums, Sunday Schools and the Home. A manual of physical, intellectual and spiritual culture, containing a collection of Music and Songs, Golden Chain Recitations, Memory Gems, Choral Responses, Funeral Services, Programs for Sessions, Parliamentary Rules, instructions for organizing and conducting Lyceums, instructions in Physical Culture, Calisthenics and Marching; Banners, Standards, the Band of Mercy, etc. A book by the aid of which a Progressive Lyceum, or Liberal Society may be organized and conducted without other assistance. Price, 50 cents, postpaid.

FROM SOUL TO SOUL.

Contains One hundred and twenty of the author's best poems, embracing a wide range of subjects and versatility in composition; historic, heroic, pathetic, humorous and descriptive. They are admirably adapted for recitations. The book also contains five songs, with music by the eminent composer, James G. Clark. 250 pages, beautifully bound. Portrait of author. Price $1.00, postpaid.

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND OTHER OFFERINGS.

This volume is dedicated: "To these whose thoughts and longings reach into the Unseen Land of Souls this handful of Asphodels, mixed with common flowers is offered, hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way station on the journey thither." It contains one hundred and thirty-nine poems, and twenty storiettes, a part of the latter by Clair Tuttle, in her most charming style. 285 pages, six full page illustrations, among which are likenesses of the author and Clair Tuttle; beautifully bound in blue, with silver embossing. Price, $1.00, prepaid.

ANGELL PRIZE-CONTEST RECITATIONS.

To Advance Humane Education.—For use in entertainments managed by Societies, Lyceums, Bands of Mercy, or individuals aiming to establish right over wrong, kindness over cruelty, knowledge over ignorance, and justice over all. The plan is this: Some large church or public hall is secured; several societies are invited to send their best speaker or reciter to compete for the prize medal; some prominent citizen presides; other prominent citizens act as the committee of award, and a small admission fee, ten or twenty cents, pays all the costs, and leaves a handsome balance. Price, 25 cents, postpaid.

THE BRAIN AND HABITS.

"Likewise We Are Compelled to Believe That If We Follow This Train of Reasoning We Can Give No More Praise to the Virtues, Than We Can Offer Censure of the Faults of Friends."

The publication recently of a scientific article with illustrations showing how youth with criminal instincts or predilections could be converted into normal beings, by operations upon the brain suggested to us at the time the probability that irresponsibility would be at once claimed by many youthful persons who commit unlawful acts; but we were hardly prepared for the shrewd theory put forward by a St. Louis boy of 12, who says that ever since his ear was operated on "his head has been lopsided, and he just had to go and steal something."

We see here the scientific doctrine reversed. The operation caused the lesion. Manifestly another is necessary to correct it. But there is something comforting for frail human nature in this new speculative view of surgery. Vagaries and abnormalities of behavior of all kinds have their explanation. The man who entertains a whimsical taste for mustard on his pie which he himself cannot explain, may now know that it is due to a peculiar convolution in his brain or a bony button within or without his cranium.

All phases of human action which seem extraordinary are thereby accounted for. It changes our whole attitude toward each other and ought to bring in an era of charitableness universal in its comprehensiveness. We should no more look with amused contempt upon the young man who flies into a towering rage because he breaks a shoestring, than if he had a club foot.

He has a club head, that's all; and if it had a glass top and we could peer into it we should see there the malformation that causes ungovernable temper. Likewise, we are compelled to believe that if we follow this train of reasoning we can give no more praise to the virtues that we can offer censure of the faults of our friends. They are all as nature made them, and the best we can do is to kindly but firmly perform operations on them when they need it.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

FREE SALVATION.

Cause of Opposite Conclusions.

I cannot accept the theories of E. J. Schellhous in The Progressive Thinker, under the head of "A Critic Criticised."

Without debating them I want to take up the question he has stated and answer it another way.

"Why do men of equal intelligence, being equally honest and sincere, having equal opportunities to investigate and learn, come to opposite conclusions on the same subject?"

This may be ascribed to several causes. There are hundreds of conflicting theories on the same subject and persons of different characters will not give the same answer to a question, because they have been educated differently and are biased by their faith and training. They don't seem to conceive of anything beyond their faith, and affirm a thing is true because they believe it, taking their faith and conceptions for reality. They are victims of delusion.

Faith is no proof of a fact; and some believe things that others deny, and the conflict of their arguments is evidence of their error and ignorance.

There is little chance to disagree on matters of fact, truth, nature, science; such matters are soon settled. Persons who disagree on various subjects make use of faith, theory, assumption, and make one false assertion prove another.

Most persons dislike to have their cherished views disturbed. Opponents who disagree cannot both be right, for there are many chances to be wrong and none to be right. The main cause of opposite conclusions is, the subject is unknown, and based on religious faith. False conceptions and conclusions are inevitable products of a false system. The tenets of religion are necessarily irreconcilable, because anything specifically belonging to Christianity is fundamentally false. It is a breeder of sects.

That is no better evidence of its shams and delusions than the divisions and differences of its votaries. They all claim to exist by divine authority, ostensibly for the service and worship of the same god; they disagree in that also.

What is approved by one sect is sacrilege to another.

The Christian religion is a fraud, a solemn farce; it came not to bring peace; it came to bring the sword of war, division, strife, and has filled the world with discordant theories, fraught with harmful results to humanity.

Every interpretation of it breeds discord, and the antagonistic churches are its concomitants.

"Free Salvation."

Christians often declare "The Gospel of Salvation is free for all people."

How is it free? It is free for them to accept, and they are free to bind and pledge themselves to it; then they are "Servants of the Lord." And the subjects of this "free salvation" find themselves in servitude to an imaginary ruler.

This free gospel of salvation comes with a powerful argument for its acceptance—a threat of damnation for all who do not accept it. This is a forcible incentive to submission.

It takes a big sum of money to run the Christian religion.

"There are millions in it." It constantly calls to its adherents, "Give! Give! Give!" Yet it gives no equivalent in return. It is a fraud. There is no advantage derived from it commensurate with the increased expenses to its devotees. The purpose of its teachers is to get all the wealth they can from its victims, and they make it pay. When a churchman of 10 or 20 or 30 years standing counts the cost of his imaginary "free salvation," he finds in the aggregate a large sum of money.

NOW IS YOUR TIME—

PRICE REDUCED.

In order to place that valuable book, "MYSTERIES OF THE SEANCE," (written by a life-long Spiritualist) in the hands of as many Spiritualists and investigators as possible this winter, I have decided to CUT THE PRICE IN TWO, and will, until the supply on hand is exhausted, mail it to any address for 12 cents per copy—less than half the former price. This book gives all the methods employed by fake mediums in producing bogus manifestations in all the different phases, and instructs the reader how to detect and expose the fraud. A silver dime and red stamp brings you the book, prepaid, by return mail. Get it and avoid being fooled. Address, ED LUNT, 119 Cedar street, Roxbury, Mass.

THE PATHWAY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT.

Or, the Pathway of the Spirit Traced.

By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

SUGGESTIVE THERAPEUTICS.

Plan of Getting Well by Laughing Away Melancholy.

A lawyer of prominence in New York, who has no patience with any form of faith cure, ascribed his recovery from a prolonged and bitter siege of dyspepsia to auto-suggestion—to his determined purpose to think himself well. This purpose he achieved by conducting himself as a perfectly well man—laboriously laughing away melancholy, sneering at pains and, in short, treating all indications of disease as a figment of the imagination. He thinks anybody can do the same, or, if any person has not the power to deceive himself into health, he is to be pitied and allowed to fill himself with drugs.

It is not necessary that the suggestion of cure should come from the patient himself. Perhaps the most experienced of the authoritative advocates of suggestive therapeutics is Dr. H. H. Seeleye, an officer of the Massachusetts Medical Society. He has dignified the system with the name of psychotherapy, which is in itself almost enough to effect a cure of a light malady. He does not limit his treatment to imaginary diseases. His first case was that of wryneck, the result of exposure to cold. Telling the victim that he would apply a sovereign remedy of instant efficacy, he rubbed a little water on the neck, and in five minutes the man was well.

An educated lady, suffering from laryngitis, was cured as quickly, her severe pain vanishing in a few minutes. Another patient had a sunstroke, fell unconscious and had violent spasms. Having aroused him the physician, addressing the spectators to impress the patient, said he would have him well at once. The placing of the hand on the sufferer's head was enough. Other cases, including one of infantile paralysis and one of apparent mebraneous croup, showed the same happy results, though not always so promptly.

The lawyer who uses auto-suggestion is the man whose method is to be followed—he has no doctor's bill to pay. Besides, it is less humiliating for a person to be deceived by himself than by somebody else. He may maintain that it takes a smart man to make a dupe of him, and so plume himself on his shrewdness.—Washington Post.

HOW THE BIRDS WERE SAVED.

The Songsters of the Air Have a Spiritualizing Tendency Among Humanity, and Should Be Protected.

To the Editor:—[As set forth in the Chicago Daily Journal] public sentiment in the matter of bird protection has proved to be better than law. It is patent to the most casual observer who ever leaves brick and mortar behind him that the birds have increased in numbers the last few years faster than any enthusiastic followers of Audubon ever dared dream.

It is true that since public sentiment was aroused in the matter the laws against the killing of the song-birds have been more rigidly enforced than ever they were before, but fear of the law nevertheless has had comparatively little to do with the recent immunity from shooting granted to the songsters. The Audubon societies, the press and the schools have done their work.

Ten years ago everything was game to the boy and to the pot-hunter who went out to the slaughter. Women wore hermit thrushes and scarlet tanagers on their hats, and the woods and fields were fast becoming the silent places.

The Audubon crusaders took up the work of quickening the public conscience, and it has done the work well. The organization has shown the good that lies in "keeping everlastingly at it." Its labor for ten years has not lagged for a day, and there is yet no lagging in sight. The members were condemned as cranks. The man members were called "old women," though in the main they belonged to the husky tribe of the field and woods trampers. For an effeminate lot they did several men's work.

The flicker, the robin, the martin, the blue-bird, the white-throat and the rest have come back to their own. The sea-birds that ten years ago were going the way of the great auk and the Labrador duck are now under the protection of the wardens paid by the Audubon societies and under the stronger protection of public sentiment.

At the beginning of their work the bird protectors had an indifferent public to win over and an open commercial enemy to fight. The public succumbed to reason, and commerce was thrashed in the courts. To the "crank" the country owes something.

The Cause at Portland, Oregon.

The First Spiritual Society, the mother society of the Spiritualists of Portland, Orogon, has just held its election of officers for the ensuing year. The society has had a successful year, during 1906, under the administration of President E. F. Staley and the retiring board of officers.

The officers for 1907 are, Mrs. Emily L. Driscoll, president; Edward Kling, vice-president; E. de Young, secretary; Mr. Trigg, treasurer; Mrs. Struble, 2nd vice-president; C. Affolter, 3rd vice-president; Mrs. Bailey, financial secretary; Miss Jennie Werner, corresponding secretary.

The outlook for progressive Spiritualism in Oregon is very bright, and the First Spiritual Society will, as ever, be in the van during 1907, to lift high the banner of the Harmonial Philosophy, and the intelligent thinking people show by their appreciation of its meetings that spiritual Spiritualism is growing rapidly.

Conference at 10 a. m.; Lyceum, 12:30 p. m.; Musical and Dramatic Club, 2:30 p. m., and a lecture and spirit messages at 7:45 p. m., every Sunday.

The conferences are of a high order, and capable speakers address the audiences.

The Lyceum is under the able management of Mrs. Avilon, who is one of the most enthusiastic workers in lyceum work. Mr. McHenry and Prof. Paul, actors of many years experience, have charge of the Dramatic Club, and Miss Werner is instructor and lecturer in the musical department. Mrs. Driscoll is tactful and graceful as the presiding officer.

A Missouri Medium's Peculiar Phase.

More wonderful to all of our little family than the phenomena given from week to week in your valuable paper, is that which has been given through some psychic influence to S. D. Black.

Living in a community where Spiritualism is not tolerated, and only an occasional one of the belief can be found, it came to him a few years since, if for any purpose beyond his own enlightenment, it has not, as yet, developed. Not in any circle or seance, but lying in bed in the darkness of night, phosphorus letters and symbols came on the blackboard with startling and vivid distinctness. Pointing away back past the dark ages, to where the alphabet first originated, commencing with the letters C, and L, and the meaning together with the power characteristic of the form, etc., and from them on as the vowels and other attributes were added.

That which seems lost in the make-up of words to-day, for in Webster's dictionary we find the occasional phrases, "It is supposed to mean" so and so. "It is generally understood" thus and thus, etc. Therefore it is plain to the student that there is not a thorough understanding.

To President Roosevelt's attempt at reform in simplified spelling he says most emphatically, NO! For all the letters that are used in the make-up of different words help to convey their meaning. Without them words would lose their power. Strange indeed it seems that this knowledge should come to him, information that some people are spending years of research and study to obtain. Whether anyone but himself will ever be benefited by this theme remains yet unanswered.

He is at this time 73 years old, living on a little farm a short distance from Fordland, Mo. Neighbors are not in sympathy with him, for he is misunderstood, and his whole enjoyment is in going over the long-forgotten or lost art of using the letters in their proper and symbolic meaning.

From whence did this knowledge come? He does not himself know. He was, at the time, engaged in studying the bible, and with the earnest desire that he might understand it, came the wonderful lessons, as they were, commencing at the beginning, with symbols explaining mythology, and finally the bible stood out plain, all written with its double meaning, one for the wise and the other for the ignorant.

He concludes that there are not many who understand this subject to-day, or they would be more particular in the way they use words.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 35 CHICAGO, ILL., FEBRUARY 9, 1907 NO. 898

PLYMOUTH SPIRITUAL CHURCH.

The Beautiful Temple at the Mecca of Spiritualism Selected in the City of Rochester, N. Y., Famous as the Birth-place of modern Manifestations Through the World-Renowned Rappings of the Fox Sisters.

Plymouth Spiritual Church at Rochester, N. Y., which was opened for public service last October, has become one of the popular places of worship in that city of churches.

It was expected when the beautiful edifice was acquired by the Spiritualists of Rochester, at a cost of $15,000 that there would be difficulty in securing a congregation that could meet the expenses of maintaining so large a church, and doubtless, had the attempt been made ten years ago, the venture would have met with failure, by reason of prejudice against Spiritualism, and lack of courage on the part of believers to be seen in regular audience at the service.

But since the dedication of the Church to Spiritualism, and the institution of morning and evening services each Sunday, exercises on Wendnesday evenings, and a class in soul culture every Thursday, the attendance has been most encouraging and increases as time progresses.

The Church membership is composed of many Spiritualists and liberals, and each Sunday there may be seen in the congregation notable professional and business men who evidently attend either out of curiosity or to gain an insight into Spiritualism.

No doubt the reputation of Rev. Dr. Austin as a lecturer, and one-time famous Methodist Divine and college president in Canada, attracts many of the educated and inquiring minds in the city and vicinity.

Another attractive feature of the services is the music, which is of a high order of excellence. The Church contains the third largest organ in Rochester, and is presided over by Mrs. Williams, a notable organist and musical director of some thirty years experience. There is a choir of good singers with experienced soloists under the leadership of T. T. Swinburne.

There is an entire absence at Plymouth Church of the cheap clap-trap songs and hymns that characterize the boisterous, meaningless music of evangelic revival meetings and many orthodox gatherings. Instead, the Plymouth music is inspiring, uplifting and consoling.

Rr. Austin was careful in the matter of music in the church, which was to be under the critical observation of a great cultured public, the majority of which inherit a prejudice against Spiritualism.

The method of conducting the Sunday services is most admirable. After a voluntary by the organist, followed by a selection on some spiritual theme by the singers, Dr. Austin delivers an invocation, always in keeping with our spiritual philosophy, and couched in beautiful language, and pointed diction; blessings appreciated and invoked in the name of Truth. Then follows a hymn, such as "Lead, Kindly Light," or "Sweet Hour of Prayer," joined in by the congregation, after which the Doctor delivers his sermon-lecture. This is followed by the usual notices of functions, meetings, etc. The collection is then taken up while the organ and choir render a selection.

The next feature of the service is the presentation of messages by a medium, and in this connection it may be said that some excellent tests have been given by the following well-known mediums who have visited Rochester since the dedication of Plymouth Church, and been secured by the pastor: Georgia Gladys Cooley, Tillie U. Reynolds, Mrs. Gillespie, Frank T. Ripley and Mrs. Judderson.

Rev. Dr. Austin has certainly made his mark in Rochester as an orator and teacher. It is a fact that every lecture he has delivered from the pulpit of Plymouth Church has been reported in the daily papers, particularly by the Democrat and Chronicle and the Union and Advertiser. This publicity has been most helpful to the Church, by awakening the interest of the people. Among the themes of Dr. Austin's lectures which have attracted the notice of scholars and thinkers are those pertaining to the origin of religions, the evolution of morals, the history of the bible, the Spiritualism of the bible, the new religious thought as propounded by Rev. Dr. Crapsey and the higher criticism, the old religious ideas of various nations, a review of Mohammedanism, the Buddhist religion, and kindred subjects, all of which have been intensely interesting and instructive.

People outside of Spiritualism are realizing that by attending Plymouth Spiritual Church they can learn something worth knowing, and escape from the humdrum, conventional and obsolete theology, and at the same time be strengthened in their desire to find the true pathway to spiritual development and the higher life.

Dr Austin is peculiarly fitted for the pastorate of this newly organized body of Spiritualists in Rochester. He is unusually esteemed for his moderation and courtesy in discoursing upon the shortcomings of organized Christianity, or rather "Churchianity," and in his efforts to show the demonstrated facts in regard to the spiritual philosophy and spirit manifestation which gave rise to every religious movement since the advent of man upon this planet.

Dr. Austin, while wholly declaring his views regarding Spiritualism, so clothes his language as not to antagonize nor give offense to those whose ignorance of the subject renders them staunch supporters of the orthodox superstitions and ceremonials, consequently he draws people who, under ordinary conditions, would not be seen at a Spiritualist meeting.

Plymouth Church has a good many members who live at a distance from Rochester. They are people who have been identified with Spiritualism since what is known the world over as the "Rochester Knockings," or "Rappings," due to the Fox Sisters.

These non-resident members feel it a duty to help maintain what may now fairly be considered the most beautiful temple for Spiritualism in the United States, which will stand as a perpetual memorial to the little Fox children, through whom the spirit world inaugurated the great revival of Spiritualism in the 19th century, and may be proudly pointed at by all believers in the beautiful philosophy as the National Temple at the Mecca of Spiritualism. It is hoped that Spiritualists throughout the country will do what they can to help Dr. Austin and the trustees of Plymouth Church to pay for the building. Donations for that purpose will be very helpful.

The Church cost $45,000 some 35 years ago. The property is now valued at about $80,000 due to rise in property value. In the hands of the orthodox dehominations it has not succeeded as a church. There were mortgages on the property which were paid from time to time until the amount was reduced to $15,000; when the Spiritualists of Rochester stepped in and took it up.

The invitation to all Spiritualists is to make a pilgrimage to their Mecca and hear the real glad tidings of great joy in its beautiful Temple.

A LIVELY TIME.

A Spiritualist Lecturer Creates a Commotion in Indiana.

To the Editor:—It is seldom that the announcement of a Spiritualist lecturer coming into a city causes such a stir, and arouses such an interest among its citizens, as did my going to Mulberry, Ind. Brother J. H. Steckel, a recent convert to Spiritualism, but prior to this, a prominent and influential member of the Lutheran church, flooded the town with handbills announcing my coming and lectures to be given January 21 and 22.

Our first meeting was well attended, and I believe from what followed that it was a success. Every one appeared interested, few having before heard a spiritual lecture.

The following day I heard that my lecture had created quite an interest among the people, and that I might expect a crowded house that evening.

On arriving at the hall, I found at least three hundred people, eager to hear what might be said. The subject for the evening was, The Laws Governing Spirit Return. The manner in which it was handled must have hit somewhere. Two Lutheran ministers were in the audience, and after our meeting was dismissed, Rev. P. E. Wike, pastor of the church, arose and announced that we would now hear the other side of the question discussed by the Rev. N. J. Seiberling, of the Lutheran Academy, which is located here.

I look upon ministers as harmless creatures, and therefore feeling no fear, I invited Rev. Seiberling to the rostrum, grasped his hand and welcomed him. His handclasp was given in a reluctant manner; however, I could not censure him for this, for he then stated that I had aroused his righteous indignation. He then proceeded to expound scripture, but having prepared it beforehand, it fell short of touching or overthrowing one point made in my lecture. A question was asked by some one in the audience, requesting him to explain where God got the material out of which he created the devil. Now any Reverend should have known that, but from some cause, Brother Seiberling could not quite explain where, and finally said God did not make him, but that he made himself. That is, he was a good angel, but grew into a devil.

His definition I think hardly satisfied the questioner, and many more of the audience. The Rev. appeared confused and proceeded to pray (that was the easiest way out of it) for the speaker whom he designated as the devil's agent misleading the people. I think possibly he was using me to illustrate, or rather as a comparison with the original fallen one. He was there, he said, to defend his Lord and Master, and I gave him all of the assistance I conscientiously could render. I always believe in helping the under dog. However, I felt called upon to reply to him, which I did. He again clamored to be heard. I then informed the Rev. that if he desired to discuss the subject of Spiritualism in debate, to name the date. This silenced him. And thus closed two spiritual lectures, somewhat out of the ordinary, in this day of thought and enlightenment.

I will say, however, that the public sentiment in the town was strong in denouncing the ministers. One prominent citizen said that the scene reminded him of the one pictured of Joan of Arc, warning the Christians to be careful, as they builded the fires to consume her body at the stake, lest they burn themselves. I think the audience found no trouble to distinguish who was displaying the Christ spirit.

As I took my departure from the town, I could but think that a spiritual awakening would follow, for as one gentleman had remarked that the recent floods, railroad wrecks and not even the earthquake, had caused so much commotion among their people. And indeed there are some lovely people among them, and especially do I kindly remember Mr. and Mrs. Hood, who so delightfully entertained me, and Brothers Steckel and Dryer, who made it possible for me to hold the meetings.

WHAT THE WAVELETS SAID.

I took a stroll one summer night;
The moon and stars were very bright;
My path lay near the water's edge,
Where wavelets dashed on rocky ledge.
Their splashing sounded like a plea;
Their voiceless call attracted me.
"I'm pleased," said I, with this grand view."
"We know," said they, "that this is true.'

And as I gazed upon the scene,
Admiring the bright and silv'ry sheen
The moon and stars produced that night,
My better, "conscious-self" took flight.
I was with loved ones far away,
And heard their cheery voices say
That I still loved them well they knew;
"Yes," sighed the wavelets, "that is true."

And, as I journeyed, I met those Whose bodies in their graves repose;
Whose souls move in a higher sphere;
Yet who to loved ones oft draw near,
To guard them from temptation's snares,
And lift them out of worldly cares,
And minister to all—to you,
The wavelets cried, "'tis true, tis true".

Then, conscious of the time and place,
I looked up into endless space
And felt that all that is is good,
Though ne'er by mortals understood;
But how to merit all this love,
All good things here, and there above:
A thought arose that I but knew:
The wavelets said, "Be good! Be true!"

To My Brother, Moses Hull.

An Impressive Brotherly Tribute in Honor of the Arisen One.

Many years ago, in Northern California, I stood one day and watched a corps of lumbermen as they were felling one of the mighty redwood trees found in the great mountain forest of Humboldt County. Axe and saw were used with skill and vigor until at last the giant stood tottering upon the foundation whereon he had rested in perfect safety for perhaps a thousand years. A simple turn of the hand and the great tree fell to the ground. There was a moan that died away into a pathetic echo as the tree started earthward, that went straight to the onlookers' hearts. There was a deep melancholy sigh as the line of perpendicular was forced into new relations with the center of gravity, a wail that rang for days afterwards in the ears of all who were near on that occasion, when the forest king fell to rise no more, forever.

Other forest giants tossed their arms frantically as their larger, stronger brother swept past them on his way. Wave followed wave in quick succession in the surrounding atmosphere, moving grass, shrub, flower and even mortals by the force of its impulse, bending them all to its will, like reeds in the wind, and making them all to appear as if they were wringing their hands in agony of grief at the tragedy that was being enacted before their eyes. When the Goliath struck the earth, it seemed as if a seismic shock rivalling Catina and Lisbon, was moving the earth to and fro, as if it were a feather in the hands of a zephyr. When the echo of the crash and groan of the fall had died away, there lay before us, prostrate, motionless, yet majestically grand, the monarch that had looked down upon ten or more centuries of changing scenes of earth.

When I heard of the transition of Moses Hull, this Humboldt County episode came vividly before my mind. I felt the shock as of the fall of a king of the forest, heard the low, sad wail, the heart moans, the bursts of grief, even the sobbing of sorrow that must have way at such times, when I realized that he was to be with us no more in mortal form. I felt the atmosphere swirl around me, until it seemed as if I were being moved by some mighty force, like unto that which swept me from my feet when the redwood giant went down before my eyes in those days of the far away past. My eyes turned in the direction of San Jose, but I saw no tree where hitherto he had stood, and felt no inspiring breeze from its branches as in days agone, since he journeyed southward to take up his residence there. It was a gap in the forest, a veritable void in the midst of earth's busy millions, and no one able to completely fill the place.

It took centuries to grow that tree, and the tree of the soul obeys the self-same law. The outer shell was visible for a time, yet it, like all material substances whence life hath departed, had become but the outer appearance of the thought of its Creator that had died away in an echo. It is ever thus with all who assume mortal being, through which to gain the experiences that will make them neophytes in wisdom when they return to the sphere of the Soul, whence they came, seeking instruction, in the long ago.

"A giant has fallen in Israel." This Hebrew saying can well be applied to the Spiritualists of the world in their present loss. Moses Hull was a teacher of teachers. He was a minister who ministered to the real needs of mankind. He stands alone to-day, as he always has stood, in the special field in which he labored. No one among the Spiritualists and the Christians of the world knew the bible better than did Moses Hull. It does not matter whether his interpretation of the bible was original with him or not. There is nothing new or original under the sun. Originality consists in making new or unique use of old truths, or of developing methods of presentation that indicates strong personalities on the part of those who put those methods into vogue. Moses Hull possessed a strong, virile personality, and he had the courage to set forth what he felt to be the truth in ways that left a permanent impression upon the minds of his hearers. Perhaps his great claim for originality lay in his signal ability to analyze, compare, explain, and expose the conditions with which he was dealing.

In his early life he had the privilege of listening to that signally gifted and highly inspired man, Alexander Campbell. Perhaps it was Campbell's influence that turned Moses Hull's thoughts towards the ministry, yet that influence was not sufficient to make a Campbellite of him. Possibly he was attracted more by the enthusiasm, the verve, the spiritual fervor of the Methodists than by the serene spirit and calm logic of Campbell. In any event Moses Hull became a conscientious student of the bible. Upon his conversion to Adventism he centered all his energies upon the task of becoming a perfect master of the contents of the book. He was a natural conversationalist, and being a keen logician, was able to score point after point with whomsoever he came into contest. Adventism is largely controversialism, and it proved a good school for "our Moses."

It was about 1860 or 1861 that his attention was called to Spiritualism. It is needless to relate the story of his conversion here. He became a zealous a Spiritualist as he was Adventist. It is a curious fact that W. F. Jamieson, once an eloquent Spiritualist speaker, now an atheist, was largely influential in bringing the truths of Spiritualism home to Moses Hull. Mr. Hull soon became a tower of strength in the cause he espoused, while Mr. Jamieson did not advance one step after he helped his friend into Spiritualism. He had finished his work.

For forty-five years Moses Hull has written and spoken in behalf of the religion of Spiritualism. He has traveled far and wide, and has, I believe, spoken, in every state in the Union, besides making several tours of the Canadas, in behalf of the religion of his choice. Week nights and Sundays, day in and day out, month after month this indefatigable worker toiled on in behalf of the movement that meant so much to the children of men. Large audiences greeted him everywhere, and it is no reflection upon other speakers to say that no one among us had a larger personal following throughout the numerous debates in which he engaged as the champion of Spiritualism.

For the last ten years of his life he held a commission from the N. S. A. making him the official champion debater in behalf of Spiritualism, in America. In his hundred or more debates, he never once came out second best. A clergyman said to me recently in speaking of our arisen brother, "I know of no clergyman who has any business to attack Moses Hull, Mr. Hull is able to wipe the earth with the best man we have." This is high praise—deserved praise—and it comes from a man who holds a position of influence in church circles.

Moses Hull was an author, reformer, preacher, politician, and instructor combined in one. His books, some twenty in number, have exerted a most helpful influence upon the minds of people just graduating from the church, also upon those who were honestly in search of the inherent truths of Christianity. His theological writings are now to be found in every theological school in America, where they are exerting a salutary influence upon the minds of the young men who are fitting themselves for the Christian ministry. In this way he will continue to instruct his fellow men for many generations to come. It is to be hoped that the ministers whom he has helped through the mediumship of his books will be honest enough to give him credit for it now that he has taken leave of earth. Especially should this be true of those Spiritualist speakers and mediums who owe their start in our work to his generous aid. He was a firm believer in education, and spent the last five years of his life on earth in the arduous labor of establishing a Spiritualist school, the Morris Pratt Institute, upon a self-supporting basis. Were a monument to be erected to the memory of Moses Hull, I know of no one that would be so appropriate as that of a generous endowment of the Morris Pratt Institute.

Other hands than mine must write the story of his labors in behalf of abolition, of financial independence for our nation, of economic reforms, social and industrial progress and political liberty. He did a needed work in all these fields of endeavor, and a truthful record thereof should be given to the world. I have known of Moses Hull ever since the Cooper and Cary Campaign of 1876 and the Greenback days that followed, but I never met him personally until the early nineties. He has grown upon me with the passing of the years, for I have ever found him to be a truth-seeker, a truth-defender, a lover of right and justice.

The oppressed of all nations had a friend in Moses Hull. He was not always just to himself, for he would give away that of which he himself stood in need, even if the suppliant were to him a total stranger. No doubt "our Moses" had his faults—he would not have been a human being if he had not—but to-day as I write these words of him, I do not feel qualified to determine what they might have been. I have seen Moses Hull only in part—when I see him the full orbed soul of man, I shall then be qualified to speak of his short-comings. By that time, I shall be so completely occupied with my own, I shall have no time to dwell upon those that any of my brothers may seem to possess.

Moses Hull was a firm believer in organization and advocated it as the surest means of spiritual success, wherever he was called upon to labor. He was president of the New York State Spiritualist Association for one term, and was often sent as a delegate to its conventions. For five years he has been the president of the Morris Pratt Institute at Whitewater, Wisconsin. He has been a delegate to every National Convention since 1893, with two or three exceptions, and I believe every exception was due to illness. In those conventions he always took a leading part, either as the chairman of some important committee or as an exponent of the religion of Spiritualism in the evening services. He has been a legal resident of more states in the Union, and voted therein as a citizen, than any other man I have ever known. In the political compaign of 1906 he was the candidate of the Socialists for Congressman from the Eighth Wisconsin District, and made a thorough canvass of the same, speaking almost every day for full six weeks. He was honored by running far ahead of his ticket in many precincts. He took his Spiritualism into everything he said and did, hence it is not strange that we find united in him the zealous religious teacher and the earnest civic reformer.

Of the work of Moses and Mattie Hull in their joint fields of effort for thirty-five years or more, all who know anything of Spiritualism are already informed. Their names are household words, wherever Spiritualists reside, and many there are outside our ranks who hold them in the same high esteem. She is now compelled by the progressive law of life to part with the one who has so long been her husband, her sole comrade, her helper in the affairs of life. Let us send our deepest sympathies, our "psychic push" as she takes up life's duties and journeys on towards the setting sun alone. With her, all Spiritualists are parting with "our Moses" as a mortal, but with her, in spirit we shall ever have his spiritual impress to aid us in our endeavors. Let us help her in her efforts to complete his work—to finish her own. Let us remember our arisen teacher, defender and prophet, at his best and recall the good he has done with tenderness in our hearts, and gratitude in our souls. "In the land of the Pomenah, in the realm of the hereafter" we shall meet "our Moses" face to face. For him, now no more pain, no more physical privation, no more worry, no more torture of soul; with him, as with others who have gone before, "all is peace."

In freedom now he awaits the coming of those to him most dear in his home," just around the turn of the road in the land beyond the cloud-rift.

A MEDIUM'S VIEWS

On Prophets, Prophecies and Fortune Telling.

"And in those days came prophets from Jerusalem unto Antioch. And there stood up one of them named Agabus, and signified by the spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world, which came to pass in the days of Claudius Caesar."—Acts 11: 27, 28.

The above quotation comes to my mind after reading the very able article by H. D. Barrett in No. 894, "The Arrests in Seattle."

Mr. Barrett generally is sound as a white oak post on every question pertaining to Spiritualism.

I am impressed, however, that in this article he is drawing the line a little fine between proper and improper, legitimate or illegitimate mediumship.

Unless we are to define "fortune-telling" a little clearer, it is going to be a pretty tough job to discard it altogether.

If it is to be a crime to "prophesy," which means to foresee the future, we must banish all the evidence we or any other religious body ever had regarding the truths and use of each and all of the religious movements recorded in the world's history.

I am so dull of comprehension that I can see but little difference between the principles of obtaining the advice of the lawyer and paying his retainer fee for his ability to foresee the future fate of my lawsuit, and fortune-telling.

The same difficulty in the distinction arises when I employ a physician to foretell the result of my physical ailment, or that of my loved ones.

The principles of life and fire insurance are based upon the future probability.

All business, commerce and trade of every sort; likewise every invention and building project receives the stimulating effect of the keen business foresight of the promoters else no money would be invested in the enterprise.

The four men who, against unthinkable opposition, followed their foreseeing instincts and successfully engineered and completed the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific railroads across the Rocky Mountains, thus furnishing means of transportation for millions of human beings from the east to the west coast, were pretty good fortune-tellers.

The weather man gets a salary for forecasting the future weather, good or bad, hit or miss.

Our Christian Bible as well as all other bibles are full of prophecies, and it seems the prophets were accustomed to assemble in conventions to compare notes, when at this particular time one Agabus arose and prophesied regarding the dry season to come.

They all gave heed to the prophecy. It is worth noting that they proceeded to pass the subscription paper at once.

I am, and always have been, squarely opposed to the exceedingly materialistic methods employed by many "professionals," and do not advocate the glaringly improbable advertisements that are seen in the papers. At the same time, if we are to be forbidden the use of the natural prophetical powers that are always demonstrated at any ordinary "reading" there will be but little left of the reading that the "sitter" will care for. And, too, there will be but few who will desire the services of the best mediums that exist.

I am accustomed to write an outline of the future events every New Year's eve, and generally hit it remarkably correct. My success in foretelling coming events has kept me in the body thus far.

Hundreds could testify to the benefits derived from that which I have told them. And yet I do not claim to be a "fortune teller" in the sense that many do.

Our entire Christian religion is founded upon "dreams and prophecies," but I believe I never foretold anything so utterly at variance with nature and common sense either.

In studying the "Ten Great Religions of the World," I find every one of them based upon fortune tellers, prophets and astrologers.

We are admonished by Paul the Apostle to "cultivate spiritual gifts and despise not prophecy."

After all the experience of thousands, aye, millions of people in the past, can we discard psychometry? Can we refuse to receive a warning from our spirit mothers and friends? I think not; rather let us draw the line on the methods and motives apparent in the conduct of the prophet, and refuse to recognize him unless he contributes his talents and means to a generous extent, to the organized cause of Spiritualism.

THOUGHTS.

Rise up higher, ever higher,
Let your thoughts forever cry
To reach on and up and outward;
Never stop until you die.

Never say, "I can't go farther,"
Never were you meant to stand
In one place, but on forever,
Till you reach a higher strand.

Life ofttimes is not all sunshine,
And dark clouds obscure the way,
Soon again within our vision
Everything looks bright as day.

You have often heard the story
Of the mighty oak that grew
From a little dark-skinned acorn;
May your thoughts so grow for you.

Let your thoughts reach ever higher;
Try to see what they can do;
Never stand within the shadow
Of the old, but reach the new.

A PHILOSOPHER.

In winter time he's happy
When he's pelted by the snows;
In summer time he's singing
[he gathers one sweet rose;
And earth seems ever better
For the happy way he goes.

If dark the tempest's frowning
And no stars are in the night,
He thanks God for a shelter,
And sleeps, and dreams of light,
And somehow, earth is brighter,
For he ever makes it bright.

And so, in joy and sorrow
He walks his earthly way,
And thanks God for to-morrow,
And does His will to-day,
And somehow, Earth is brighter
For that lesson—love—obey!

A Heartfelt Tribute

To My Old Friend, Moses Hull.

Seldom have I known a death that grieved me as this one. Not so much on his account, as on account of the uncompleted work of his life, the laudable ambition of his riper years, the educational enterprise.

For nearly a generation Moses Hull and myself differed widely in our views upon the great question of future existence—and it is a great question, the profoundest of the centuries, "If a man die, shall he live again?"

Again and again we met in the polemical field, and I say now, as I have always declared ever since I knew him, that a more courteous debater I never encountered, nor an abler one, apt, witty, philosophical.

Nearly forty-five years ago (we were mere boys then) I first met him in Paw Paw, Mich., for six sessions, two hours each, before packed audiences. No revival of religion could compare in intense interest with that famous debate. He was an Adventist minister, I a Spiritualist lecturer. We were both full of enthusiasm and "rushed in" where angels and ministers fear to tread. Moses was eloquent, mirthful, sarcastic. To my way of thinking he was a natural-born orator; rapid in utterance, cyclonic. With his bible before him he had a habit of "cuffing" it open to read anything to suit him. Furthermore, he had a prodigious memory; was a walking biblical encyclopedia.

I have always since meeting Mr. Hull on that memorable night in October, 1862, greatly admired his genius; have always liked the man. There was something noble in him. He was free-hearted. He was manly. He loved his friends and forgave his enemies.

Next day after the Paw Paw debate Dr. J. M. Peebles, in Battle Creek, then the home of both, met Mr. Hull, and inquired "how he came out in the debate." In reply, Mr. Hull held up a document, saying, "Here is my recantation of Adventism!"

But the "Advent Review" refused to publish it. Mr. Hull wrote to me at Albion, Mich., that his church friends declared that he had been captured by the devil, and they begged him to give them a chance to save him from the devil's wiles. He asked for my counsel. I wrote to him: "Give them that chance. If they can win you back you are not ripe for the new philosophy."

They prayed for and with him three weeks, and he went with some of the "brethren" on a preaching and baptizing excursion. A gifted soul was at stake. The Adventists worked in desperation to "save" it.

At last Mr. Hull wrote to me, saying, as he did immediately at the close of our Paw Paw debate, "I have preached my last Adventism." He entered the field of Modern Spiritualism and became one of its most popular advocates. As he expressed it: "Though starvation seemed to stare me, my wife, and my four little daughters in the face, I was a free and happy man.

"Salary or no salary, I would preach; somehow I could not help it. My preaching was as spontaneous as the singing of birds."

Perhaps this is why it was ever a delight to hear him. He had something to say, and know how to say it. Very few in Christian pulpits could be compared to him in preaching ability. I have heard Henry Ward Beecher, Wendell Phillips, O. B. Frothingham, T. DeWitt Talmage, Benjamin F. Butler, John B. Gough, Bret Harte, and scores of other pulpit and platform celebrities. Moses Hull was their peer as an orator and as a man, an individualized man. His speaking on the public platform carried with it an indescribable charm.

His wife, Mattie, full of courage, brave little woman, pursues her work, saying, "Spiritualism is the only sustaining influence in an hour like this." Whether it is the only sustaining influence or not, it does cheer every one fully imbued with its teachings. I know that from my own experience. Many years ago, when I had not one doubt of a future spiritual existence, I was aglow with happiness; joyous with songs of birds; thrilled with woodlands' beauty; entranced with the contemplation of the starry firmament where, sometime, men and women and the beautiful children should find their permanent home and universal happiness. For years, under the influence of Spiritualism, mine was a life of ecstasy. I was greatly indebted to the writings of A. J. Davis for this harmonious condition of mind and body. Little cared I for the petty ambitions of this world.

Some, doubtless, say with Hull: "If Spiritualism be a delusion it is a charming delusion, and I hope never to live long enough to find it out." He did not. Many of my fellow-travelers assert that, inasmuch as this philosophy does make mankind happier and better, why seek to prove it a delusion? While we live, the conviction that it is true, I admit, makes this earth a heaven. Another admission: Multitudes of Spiritualists are positive that spirits exist in earthly bodies, continue to live after their decay, and communicate with people on earth.

Still another admission: No materialist, and no scientist, has ever demonstrated that Spiritualism is a delusion. The materialist who says that "death ends all," dogmatizes. It is a mere assertion based upon an appearance. I have never been that kind of a materialist; but for years have said, death may end all. With Francis E. Abbot I say, "Truth, though it slay me!"

Spiritualism may be true. The Spiritualists proclaim: "It is true—I know it is true."

That is the main difference between Spiritualists and myself. It was enough, however, to exclude me from nearly every Spiritualist platform in the country. There is no people that I esteem more highly than Spiritualists, not mere defenders of frauds, which have been, and are, such a blight upon a glorious philosophy; and I loved Moses Hull as an own brother.

That clear-headed thinker, Lyman C. Howe, is impelled to acknowledge that there are "bigoted, sectarian Spiritualists." There are "bigots," "sectarians," who are materialists, too.

When Moses Hull undertook the role of "Reformer," thorns and briars were his portion. As he expressed it, "thoroughly misunderstood by both friends and enemies," and added: "I am to-day heartily thankful for all I suffered in that fight."

The day may come when the man and woman wearing no label, working diligently for humanity's good, for universal mental liberty, telling truth as the speaker sees truth, shall be welcomed by every assembly of people who love Truth, Freedom, Equality.

HOME CIRCLES.

Experiences, with Thoughts on Reincarnation.

To the Editor:—I am much interested in your paper, and think it would be helpful to have a home circle column, as it has been suggested, and readers contribute their experiences. I for one have had most wonderful experiences in spirit return. Have seen wonderful writings, drawings and visions. Often hear voices, so natural that I easily recognize them, though sometimes they are as inaudible as thought. Have had warnings, when death was about to enter my family, before my son died, and later, when his wife Cora, passed away.

She was ill, yet not dangerously so, and I had lain down, closed my eyes, felt drowsy, yet, knew my surroundings, when a bright light appeared in front of me, and in the center of it the form of a young girl appeared, resembling Cora, dressed most beautifully with wide gimp embroidery of gold and silver down the front of her dress, which glistened and sparkled as she moved. I gazed in astonishment when she pointed upward, and slowly moved away. Cora told me she had a young sister who passed away many years ago, though I did not tell her of my vision. A few days after, when Cora was dying, her eyes moved, apparently seeing some objects she recognized, and sweetly smiling till she passed out of the body.

The first winter I was in Oklahoma I lived in a shack one-half mile from any house. Weather 15 below zero. Windows frozen down, high, cold winds, when one morning I tried to build a fire before I had dressed. The stove began to pour out a thick black smoke, filling the room. I rushed to the door (a self-locker). As I stepped out I heard a voice distinctly say, "Don't shut the door—you will freeze!" I turned just in time to prevent the door locking. If it had closed, myself on the outside, nothing could have saved me from freezing to death.

I felt the presence of so many people about me, those whom I knew, too, that I must believe it was the spirits of friends who have passed away, who gave me the warning.

I do not pretend to be a medium, though I often see faces, hear voices and have restored lost articles. Have asked, in writing and other ways, if reincarnation was true—and the answer has always been "No! There is no such thing where we are, and we don't know of any place there is." Have read a great deal on the subject, and cannot see anything reasonable or just in the belief. If it were natural for one to remember back 1,000 years it would be for every one. Spirits tell me the life, or spirit, commences with the body, and grows with the body, to maturity. When the body is worn out, the spirit enters the higher life, to progress, and not to return to a lower state of existence; and it is absurd to think they ever enter another body to live over another experience. It is natural for old people to die, and they are usually glad to pass out. I would be miserable enough if I thought I would have to come back into another body, and live this life over again. The cause of one child in a family being vicious, and another virtuous can easily be accounted for in a natural physical way—through inheritance, or some act of the parents—so also with talented people.

I know of parents, who had no musical talent whatever, and yet a daughter was a fine musician. Back a generation was a relative who was talented in music, and this daughter greatly resembled her.

How absurd to think a matured spirit would degenerate into a simple babe, who has everything to learn; and even if it were true, what benefit is it to us when we can't remember our experiences. God works in a natural way. If it were true. I wish some one would answer these things in a reasonable way.

I have had as reliable communications from the spirit world as anyone ever had, and I positively know spirit return is true. Guardian spirits often bring back children to see their parents, for different causes, to love them and to comfort, grow up with them, but never to enter another body. People should use common sense in their investigations, and reason, as well, which I hope to hear.

Correction.

To the Editor:—Please allow me space in your valuable paper to correct a statement in my short article on Reincarnation in The Progressive Thinker No. 896, as it does not fully convey the meaning I intended and has been muisunderstood.

Where I say "the spirit cannot enter and occupy a physical body the second time," etc., I should have said, "the spirit cannot develop or occupy a second physical body, any more than the life of the fowl can return to an egg and produce another chicken, or the insect return to a caterpillar and bring forth a butterfly."

I want to call the attention of every disciple of reincarnation to the very clear, thorough and comprehensive article on this subject by Rayah, on page 8, of The Progressive Thinker. If a careful persual of this article does not clear the brain of every advocate of the re-embodiment theory, their case is hopeless.

HOW JOSEPH JEFFERSON CAME TO WRITE "IMMORTALITY."

Thomas Jefferson [says the Chicago Journal], who has succeeded his father, the late Joseph Jefferson, in his most famous role, Rip Van Winkle, gives the following account of the publication of his father's lines on "Immortality":

"My father was a good deal of a thinker along the lines which lead to the things of the next world, and as he grew older he thought more and more about the future life. One day, not long before he joined the great majority on the 'other side,' he was out in Buzzard's bay with his two good friends, Grover Cleveland and E. C. Benedict of Indian Harbor, Ct. The three friends were lunching on Mr. Benedict's yacht, the Oneida, and the conversation turned on the life to come. My father expressed himself as being grateful for the good things of this world which had been heaped up for him and his family, as he had had more than his share of the joys of this life, and he was ready, he declared, at any moment, to meet the fate common to all mankind.

"He told his two friends that he had been 'scribbling some doggerel,' and at their request he repeated the lines which are reprinted herewith. He promised both men copies of the verse, but they had some difficulty in obtaining the lines. But he finally fulfilled his promise, and ex-President Cleveland gave them to the public after father had passed through the gates. My excuse for giving them to The Journal now is the editor's request to do so, a letter having been received at your office asking for them from G. W. Palmer of 2710 Indiana avenue. Here is the verse:

"Immortality," by Joseph Jefferson.

Two caterpillars crawling on a leaf
By some strange accident in contact came;
Their conversation, passing all belief,
Was that same argument, the very same,
That has been "proed" and "conned" from man to man,
Yea, ever since this wondrous world began.
The ugly creatures,
Deaf, dumb and blind,
Devoid of features
That adorn mankind,
Were vain enough in dull and wordy strife,
To speculate upon a future life.
The first was optimistic, full of hope;
The second, quite dyspeptic, seemed to mope.
Said number one, "I'm sure of our salvation."
Said number two, "I'm sure of our damnation;
Our ugly forms alone would seal our fates
And bar our entrance through the golden gates.
Suppose that death should take us unawares,
How could we climb the golden stairs?
If maidens shun us as they pass us by,
Woud angels bid us welcome in the sky?
I wonder what great crimes we have committed
That leave us so forlorn and so unpitied?
Perhaps we've been ungrateful, unforgiving;
'Tis plain to me that life's not worth the living."
"Come, come, cheer up," the jovial worm replied,
"Let's take a look upon the other side;
Suppose we cannot fly like moths or millers,
Are we to blame for being caterpillars?
Will that same God that doomed us crawl the earth,
A prey to every bird that's given birth,
Forgive our captor as he eats and sings
And damn poor us because we have not wings?
If we can't skim the air like owl or bat,
A worm will turn 'for a' that.'"
They argued through the summer; autumn nigh,
The ugly things composed themselves to die;
And so, to make their funeral quite complete,
Each wrapped him in his little winding sheet.
The tangled web encompassed them full soon,
Each for his coffin made him a cocoon;
All through the winter's chilling blast they lay,
Dead to the world, aye, dead as human clay.
Lo, spring comes forth with all her warmth and love;
She brings sweet justice from the realms above;
She brings the chrysalis, she resurrects the dead;
Two butterflies ascend, encircling her head.
And so this emblem shall forever be
A sign of immortality.

DREAM LEADS TO RICH GOLD MINE.

Denver Man Sees Lucky Spot in Vision and Finds Ore on Claim.

G. O. Johnson, tailor, of Denver, Col., saw in a dream one night not long ago great riches for him. Now his vision of a gold mine has come true. Johnson, tailor, is now Johnson, gold mine owner.

Johnson plied his trade in a modest way here. He prospered moderately. In his business he has always sought to be fair with all the world and to treat his fellow-men rightly. Thus is he popular. His modest little fortune will now be spent in developing his mine and buying property in its vicinity. His friends, also, will back his venture.

It was in July that Johnson dreamed of a spot in the mountains which, when touched with prospector's pick and spade, would bring forth gold for him. He says he awakened his good wife and told her of his dream. "George, can we believe it is so?" she asked him.

Johnson, keeping his secret, visited the spot not many miles from this city and quietly bought up the land. Then he put men to work prospecting. These workmen brought up from the earth gold ore. The prospecting continues. Johnson and friends are still buying property near his claim. He will name his mine "Dream Mine."

Emmanuel Church.

An Interesting Account of a Distinctively Unique Institution.

It is Refreshing to See a Church Organization Taking a Step in Advance, and Drawing Near to the Angel World by Humanitarian Work. The Uplifting, Spiritualizing, Tendency of Unselfish Humanitarian Work, Can be Witnessed in This Church Organization in a Marked Degree, Affording a lesson that in Many Respects Might Be Copied by Spiritualists. Good Deeds Win; Mere Belief, Without Humanitarian Work, is a Skeleton Void of Any Lasting Vitality. Spiritualists, Read and Profit by the Lesson.

Religion and Science have joined hands in Boston to heal disease. The experiment, which is arousing enormous interest in the city of culture, is designed to correct Christian Science by methods which are orthodoxly Christian and exactly scientific. The movement, launched during last November in a series of Sunday night talks in Emmanuel Church which organized into classes during December, has now got thoroughly under way with a list of cures, crowded testimonial meetings and an epidemic of excited curiosity which brings letters from all parts of the country.

Emmanuel Church is in Newbury street, near the public garden, Boston, Mass. It is not "high," as the Church of the Advent, or "low," as famous Trinity, but "broad," belonging to that middle ground in the Episcopal world from which so many sociological experiments have sprung. It has, perhaps, the largest Episcopal parish in Boston. Dr. Elwood Worcester is the rector, and Dr. Samuel McComb the first assistant rector. Dr. Leighton Parks, now rector of fashionable St. Bartholomew's, came to New York from the church in 1904, and immediately electrified his parish by launching a crusade against divorce.

THE WORK OF SOCIAL RENOVATION. It is in the spirit of Emmanuel Church to do things... It has only just allowed Boston to simmer down from the excitement caused by its tuberculosis cures in the tenement districts. But the movement in psycho-therapeutics seems destined to make old Emmanuel the most talked-of church in America. The rector and his colleague are preparing a book on their experiment, and what the "church clinics" fail to do in propaganda it is safe to say the book will complete. Morton Prince's "Dissociated Personality" and Boris Sidis' "Multiple Personality" must fade in dramatic importance before the forthcoming volume on religious neurosis from the pens of Dr. Worcester and Dr. McComb.

Boston, with its $2,000,000 Christian Science Temple, its various New Thought clubs and College for Metaphysical Healing, its Babtists and its Theosophists, supplies a splendid culture for the germ of a new idea. CHURCH AND SCIENCE joining hands is a distinctly new idea; this is perhaps the first time in the history of civilization that such an experiment has been actually made. It must not be confounded with the health guilds of London, although that experiment in sanitation was a pointer which the initiators of this project acknowledge.

The black beast which the Boston clergymen have called in the scientists to aid in expelling from the garden of social life is that terrifying monster of smothering embrace and devouring jaws which is claiming victims among the richest and most educated, the horror of overripe living, NEURASTHENIA. The beast is known variously as melancholia, moral fatigue, hysteria, suicidal mania, psychopathic sexualis, kleptomania—in a word, psycho-neurosis.

The rector's study was haunted by despairing Christians of his parish who displayed so certainly the stigmata of mental disease that he, being a psychologist as well as a doctor of divinity, saw that something more than a clergyman's counsel was necessary.

Dr. Worcester came from St Stephen's Church, Philadelphia, where he was rector for eight years. Before entering upon that pastorate he was professor of psychology and the history of philosophy in Lehigh University. He is a graduate of Columbia General Theological Seminary, with degrees from the University of Pennsylvania, and Hobart College. His colleague, Dr. McComb, is a graduate of Oxford University, and has studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and Glasgow University. Both of these gentlemen appeared as theological counsel for Dr. Crapsey in the recent trial at Batavia.

It will be seen that this movement rests upon ripe scholarship; that it originates in a church made up of vigorous intellectual membership, and it is projected along strictly scientific lines, as will be shown.

CONTROL AND SUGGESTION.—The Sunday night meetings which originated the movement were four in number. The first was addressed by Dr. James Putnam, of Harvard, who spoke on "The power of Control." The second was addressed by Dr. Richard Cabot, whose subject was "The Value and Limitation of Suggestion." These men, both eminent psychologists, so aroused the Boston public that the Sunday night neurasthenic meetings as they were popularly known, soon overflowed with outsiders. They came from every quarter of the town, and every creed was represented. There were Hebrews and even Catholics present. The new thought adherents swarmed like bees to honey, and strange little dowdy figures shrunk here and there in corners, suggesting evangelicalism gone astray to a ritualistic temple.

In the last two meetings of the series the rector and his assistant told plainly what they intended to undertake—religious therapy was explained and two scientific books were expounded, Paul Dubois' "Psychic Treatment of Nervous Diseases" and Dr. Joseph Jastrow's "The Subconscious." These two works were spoken of as text books for the movement.

IT WAS THE INTENTION of the two rectors to be very conservative and begin quietly and simply a sane movement along scientific lines. They were unprepared for the onrush that ensued. At the last of the four meetings the sidewalk and vestry were crowded before the doors of the chapel could be opened. People struggled for places much as they do at the Friday rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, only the personnel was different. When the doors were finally opened a football rush followed. Fully half the people had to stand, being unable to find seats, and many sat in the ledges of the Gothic windows and on the edge of the platform.

Through this throng Dr. Worcester crowded his way from his study and arrived breathless, dishevelled and plainly astonished, in the small space reserved for him on the platform. The atmosphere of the room was charged with the intensity of the people gathered to hear of something miraculous, and this electric feeling did not subside even with the singing of a number of well-known hymns, the recitation of the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer. The people had come out to hear a new thing. They were ready for it and wanted it without delly.

IT WAS WITH BREATHLESS attention that the assemblage hung upon Dr. Worcester's words when he arose to expound the the new dogma that deadly poison lay in evil thoughts which the most searching drugs were powerless to reach.

"I want to tell you," said the clergyman, "why this movement, which is to be largely moral and religious, is likely to affect our physical condition. Huxley used to say that consciousness could no more affect the body than a steam whistle could a locomotive. Scientists for years ignored THE ELEMENT OF THE SOUL. It is only within the last ten years that a revolt against materialism in medicine has sprung up from the writings of certain eminent physicians and scientists, such as Dubois and Carpenter and others, men who have recognized the relations of the mind and body. Christian Science, mental healing, New Thought carry people away from religion into illusions, because each contains a certain element of scientific truth, and, strangely enough, this revolt against materialistic medicine and orthodox religion is a popular revolt in the name of the soul.

"BUT IT IS NOT NECESSARY to go outside of orthodoxy, it is not necessary to desert true science to lay hold of this wonderful healing power that has been discovered within the mind. There is a fine body of literature growing today on the very power residing in the soul. We purpose to lay hold of these newly defined psychical powers through the means within our grasp, religious faith and exact science, and while we are going to establish a "clinic," we expect to confine our efforts to nervous diseases resulting from conditions of the mind. The conditions may be observed by the layman in recurring or fixed ideas and melancholia. We have all seen rich men in dire terror of poverty and persons with apparently well bodies but sick minds. The Church has an almost unique opportunity. It can bring to bear religious faith to heal moral maladies which drugs, hygiene, massage cannot reach.

"Sin and the resulting remorse eat the heart. That is why the Catholic Church has found the confessional such an energizing agency. To establish mental health the individual must be in right relations with himself, with society, with God. Not until then will he find satisfaction in his life. It is not enough to fight against evil thoughts; they must be driven out with something else. The human mind is so constituted that it cannot entertain opposite views at the same time. We shall not deny the reality of pain, but assert that God's face is set immovably toward health. We invite you to lay hold on this truth. We shall not use electricity, but the grace of God. And we do not expect to work miracles."

The scientific and philosophical basis for this new school of healing was given by Dr. McComb in an analysis of Jastrow's "Subconsciousness." The greatest psychological discovery of modern times, Dr. McComb claimed, was the subconscious mind, the region of natural impulses, the place of storage of the stuff that "dreams are made on," the hiding place of lapsed memories.

THIS SUBCONSCIOUS MIND is stored with subtle powers, which, when highly excited, blossom into genius. It is the subconscious which is in closest relation with the religious life, and the uprush from it works so marvellously upon life that in common affairs we behold its performances as miracles.

Mental healing, according to Dr. McComb, is simply releasing these stored up powers by the way of suggestion. Man is a very suggestible animal, and from the subconscious region a wealth of dynamic energy may be obtained. It is useless to deny the reality of the physical body and its pains through deranged functions. "But the new psychology is saying that the mind has power over the body almost limitless," said Dr. McComb. "It is as difficult at times to pierce the sick man with this idea as it is to penetrate the moral despair of the sinner. If you haven't the key to open the subconscious we wish to give it to you by suggestion scientifically made. Behind this movement are the most scientific minds of New England. Reassure yourselves whatever is the form of your neurasthenia you can be healed."

After meeting there was a rush to register for admission to the clinic. Staid matrons and men of affairs elbowed each other, and young women who looked as if they ought never to have heard of nerves were in that forward press. Neurasthenia seems almost fashionable at the moment in Boston. Acquaintances looked at each other in astonishment, as if to say, "What in the world do you think ails you?" But no one gave up his place of vantage, or backed out from shame.

THE WEEK-DAY CLINICS are now established, and it is not an uncommon thing to see an excited knot around the doors leading to Emmanuel Church vestry.

The other day an insane woman was taken there in a carriage, and, escaping her keepers, ran wildly up the walk, creating a panic before she was captured. Another day a man plainly suffering from too much stimulation, whether of the alcohol or opium sort, did not develop, arrived at the vestry. He was led away by the sexton.

SEVERAL NERVE SPECIALISTS are employed by the church to hold conference with all who apply for treatment free of charge. These conferences are for the purpose of diagnosis, and are held in private rooms of the church. They take place on Wednesdays and Fridays, and while a general meeting is in progress in the classroom. There scientific talks are given, music and conversation follow, and after all the patients have had their talk with the physicians tea is served. There is a regular Wednesday night meeting also, at which testimony of progress and cures is given.

But the unique feature of the Emmanuel Church healing movement is not the scientific diagnosis at the hands of the nerve specialist. That departure from church work is astonishing. Yet it is safe to say that the dramatic moment is reserved for the conference with the rector. He it is who must get at the real cause of disease in the patient; he it is who must extract the decayed thought imbedded in the mind OF EVERY NEURASTHENIC PATIENT, and often it comes out with But that thought must be got at, and so some of the conservative members of the parish are horrified at the idea that a confessional is being set up in a Broad Episcopal Church.

THIS CONFERENCE, which the rectors themselves declare has nothing in the nature of a confessional, has elicited data more vital than any the doctors could obtain. Jealousies, rivalries, appetites, cowardices, passions, have been confessed. Sometimes it is a flirtatious stenographer, sometimes a morphine syringe, sometimes a bond at three per cent a month. Names are held sacred, but the rectors have acknowledged that these confessions show the necessity of READJUSTING THE PATIENTS' LIVES IN MORAL RELATIONS before a cure can be accomplished.

In the Confessional.

"In every large congregation," said Dr. Worcester, "there are numbers of persons suffering from melancholia, depression, suicidal tendencies. They are the most difficult of a pastor's parishioners to aid in the religious life. These persons suffering from moral maladies most naturally seek religious comfort, but it is almost impossible to persuade them to make a clean confession of their difficulties. They are vague, excitable, hysterical and often evasive. Even after an interview has been had with a clergyman he cannot properly look after such a patient, for usually the person is actually sick from nervous functional derangement. These patients suffer from religious doubt, moral disturbances, remorse, incompatibility, fixed ideas of a terrifying character. I have had as many as two hundred callers of this sort in a month, and you may be able to understand what a heavy burden this is upon a pastor with a large parish to look after, special philanthropic work to oversee and sermons to prepare.

"I DO NOT THINK, a clergyman has the right to avoid these duties. Whatever his church, whether he be a Methodist or Congregationalist or Episcopalian, his study must to a certain extent fulfill the requirements of a confessional." The confessions which come out of the pastor's study are seldom formal. They are vital, often tragic. It was because of the necessity of dealing with these parishioners intelligently in the first place, and second, because I have been for a long time a student of psychology and a most interested follower of the Nancy school, in which the names of Bernheim and Liebault stand forth so brilliantly, that the whole theory of suggestion has so long interested me.

"These forces were at work in my consciousness, the parish need and the scientific remedy. But they did not approach each other in a plausible scheme for action until last June. During the annual Convention of the Christian Science Church in this city, there was at the same time a national convention of physicians. The Christian Scientists opened their new Temple and Harvard Medical School opened its splendid new home at about the same moment. There they stood opposite to each other, yet each seeking the same end, the life of health.

"I attended certain sessions of the nerve specialists while the medical convention lasted, and I also visited the new Christian Science temple and attended one of the large 'experience meetings.' The Christian Scientists, without the aid of music, eloquence or famous names, held ten meetings on the same evening, and judging from the crowds unable to gain admission, they might have held fifteen. The service consisted only in simple and apparently honest accounts or recoveries from illness and death, escapes from great dangers and from ingrained evil habits, together with JOYFUL ASSURANCES OF SPIRITUAL PEACE AND WELL-BEING. It was not necessary for the speakers to lift their voices, for the great congregation, hushed and silent, hung upon the very word. Their appeal, of course, was immense and doubtless hundreds of converts were made that very evening.

"I SHOULD REJECT without investigation seven-tenths of the miracles recounted by the Christian Scientists, partly because no evidence worth the name was offered and partly because many of the diseases supposed to have been cured are not susceptible to mental treatment. I felt a deep impression, while conscious that fearful harm might be wrought by these unreasoning enthusiasts, of the power for suggestive therapeutics in the foundation of an absolute religious faith. Then this movement was suggested to my mind.

"I hope the public will keep very clearly in mind the distinction between what Emmanuel Church has undertaken and the cult of Christian Science. We are not denying the realities of this universe nor propounding any new doctrines of faith. Immanuel Kant said:—'A dream which all persons dream together and which they must dream is no longer a dream, but a reality.' As a scientist, and as a Christian, too, I know that the relations of the soul and the body are most intimate, and FOR EVERY CHANGE IN MIND THERE IS A CHANGE IN THE BODY. The mind has an immense power over the state of the body. And the minds of a number of people working together affect each other. A concourse of joyous-minded people has a tremendous curative power. That is why we design to bring together those who need social comfort and by testimony to set free the contagious suggestion which works for health."

Dr. Worcester has already carried on a remarkably successful work in combating the plague of tuberculosis in the tenement districts by co-operating with a specialist and organizing the church's charitable undertakings scientifically. He has secured results equal to the best consumptive sanitariums in the country. In Philadelphia Dr. Worcester conducted an industrial farm for the unemployed. He is no novice in sociology, and appears to have a genius for making new uses of the social machinery of the church.

AN AIM.

Give me a man who says,
"I will do something well,
And make the fleeting days
A story of labor tell."
Though the aim he has be small,
It is better than none at all;
With something to do the whole year through,
He will not stumble at all.

Better to strive and climb
And never reach the goal
Than to glide along with time—
An aimless, worthless soul.
Aye, better to climb and fall,
And sow, though the yield be small,
Than to throw away, day after day,
And never strive at all.

The Points Omitted.

How to Make the N. S. A. More Effective In Its Work, as Pointed Out by R. F. Little.

In the two preceding articles under above heading, I have endeavored to call attention to the fact that, owing to the rapid increase in the number of those who are becoming believers in, and supporters of, the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism, if we would gather up and mould into form these important elements and make the N. S. A. a national in fact, as well as in theory, some important changes must be made, both in structure and methods of propaganda.

In this, and probably the last upon this subject I wish to be more specific, and submit for consideration a definite plan—not to supersede, but rather to amend that through which we are now operating.

Allow me to say that in my judgment "Organization" is not only a help, but a paramount necessity, if what is valuable in our cult is to take definite form in shaping the dominant thought of the future. Two ways open before us. One, in which chance and experiment are to play the leading role; the other, along the lines of a well thought-out, and systematic united effort.

Given the right kind of organization, all will agree that the latter is preferable. Much depends upon the character and effectiveness of the organization, however. There are two sides to this phase of the subject.

Our National organization was born of necessity. It was a result rather than a cause. Its growth has been governed largely by the operation of the same law that brought it into being. It has followed, rather than led, in the main, conscience and the best thought possible, have been given to it, and much good has been accomplished through its agencies.

Nothing is plainer to my mind than that it must now prepare to lead, rather than follow; not so much in thought as method; not so much to enter the field for converts, but rather to gather and mould into effective use the converts already made, and those who are breaking away from the old and worn-out system of the past, and are earnestly seeking for the newer and better expression. I am not concerned with reference to leadership. I AM concerned in gathering together the potencies springing into activity all along the line, and fashioning them into concrete form.

In the past we have depended largely upon our annual gatherings, not only to show the character of the work accomplished, but to initiate measures for future use. This is a common method, and so far as it can be made effective is commendable; but experience has demonstrated the failure of delegate conventions to accomplish what is expected of them. I never knew one to do this unless its work had been previously arranged, or its action forced upon it by the logic of events.

In general the work upon which it is to enter is new to the delegates. Much of it is in crude form. To act intelligently and wisely under such conditions does not lie within the realm of probability, or, we might say, possibility; and allow me to suggest that none of the established organizations are attempting to do so.

Now, in our case, it should be noticed that we are attempting to cover a territory limited only by our national boundary, and to take notice of all the various phases known to the cult. Anything less than this discounts our claim as a National Association.

The means we are employing as a National body, are practically limited to our annual gathering, together with what can be done by our National Board, which is selected, of necessity, from different portions of the country, and whose members have personal or professional business of their own to attend to. The dynamic forces behind the real movement will outclass all attempts at organization under these conditions.

I am not overlooking the existence of local and state associations. These are factors that are necessary, and useful. Their interests, however, are local rather than general, and these should not be diverted from their natural functions.

The National has functions of its own that extend into every locality, and which cannot be fully met by local associations.

As before suggested, other organizations that have become really national; recognize the fact, and act upon it.

I do not wish the National to become an imitator, but what there is of good in other systems we can safely follow.

Our National government has found it advisable to group the several states and territories into 'departments," and some one person selected to look after the government's interests in that particular department, and report its success or failure. Its jurisdiction reaches into every portion of the domain at home and abroad. Its army and navy are governed in precisely the same way. It is possible that in this system we may find a solution of the problem.

The Methodist Church recognizes and adopts this system from the laity up. Even the Salvation Army has learned its value. Examination shows that no movement has become really national in effectiveness that has not followed a close parallel.

Now, we don't need any beating of tom-toms to call sinners to repentance. We are rather seeking to gather in the righteous (?) We do not need any military trappings. Our recruits furnish their own uniforms, and to a great extent their own rations, while the truth sweeping with tidal majesty "across the border" will furnish abundance of ammunition; but we do need a system by and through which the national can become conversant with any and every portion of the country, so that by the time our National gathering is held, the delegates can be made acquainted with the status of the movement.

If prosperous, we can learn the secret of its success. If the opposite in a given locality, we can learn the facts by one who has had the opportunity to investigate and initiate the assistance needed.

It seems to me that the necessity for this movement is apparent. With all my reading and other means of information, I do not know, for instance, why there are so few local and State Associations in the south and southeast portions of the country. I can guess, but I do not know.

I do not know why so many of our state associations in the North and north-central states are so ineffective as stated in President Barrett's last Annual Report.

Again I can guess, but I do not know, and at present I have no way of finding out. This, I believe I do know: That there are thousands like me, who would really like to know and assist in applying a remedy, if it can be done.

If it is not the function of the National body to obtain this information and furnish the same to delegates when assembled in convention, then I shall have to acknowledge myself mistaken, and I will cheerfully "go back and sit down," while someone points out a better agency to do the wark.

To sum up, then, briefly, the purpose of this article, we want to see the people known as Spiritualists, or the major portion of them, acting in unison, and we believe the following action will assist in bringing this about.

1. Our structure must be democratic; that is, rest upon the intelligence of the people as a whole, and not upon a class.

2. Our National President, Secretary and Treasurer should be located near each other so as to establish a center.

3. Select those methods that have been found effective with like organizations, and I know of no better plan than working through departments—grouping the states for that purpose.

I am inclined to think that some one can be found in each group that will undertake this work, if proper encouragement is given. Of course, the question of finance will intrude itself as it always does. It is a fact, however, that many of our most effective workers ARE WORKING FOR NOTHING AND BOARDING THEMSELVES, while few, if any, are more than covering expenses, and this in all parts of our jurisdiction. I don't like this system, but it may occur, and doubtless will, that where reasonable prospects of success are in view, the "willing workers" will still be found, and no portion of the country be put to expense that will be burdensome.

I believe the people will respond to the additional expense, in view of the additional benefit derived.

Let me conclude as I began: I am not a critic, neither am I a pessimist. I am as well satisfied with life and its experiences as anyone with whom I am equally well acquainted, and a great deal better satisfied than many, both within and without our ranks, who ought to be perfectly happy.

I believe in the ultimate triumph of righteousness, regardless of the frailties of human agencies. Within reasonable limits I want the best there is for myself or any movement with which I am identified. I believe also, it is time "we sat up and took notice," lest we fail—not only in our duty to our organization and our own time, but likewise fail in our relations and duties to the future.

IN MEMORY OF A BROTHER.

Another Spirit Added to the Band of Masters.

On January 11, 1907, the spirit of Moses Hull, our most honored and worthy brother, took its flight to those mysterious realms where the King of Kings and Lord of Lords reigns supreme, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. He passed into the great beyond fully prepared to continue the grand work he had commenced on the earth plane. For many years he has been the faithful advocate of our beautiful doctrines of Spiritualism. He was no ordinary person.

There was an individuality about him that made him distinguishable among men. Possessing the courage of his convictions, and being honest and brave, he has won many a battle for our cause. He had added to these traits of character a strong and vigorous intellect and a memory inexhaustible that served him well in the many discussions he had with the greatest religious prelates that ever graced the public rostrum, and he never failed to win.

Thrice is he armed who has his quarrel just. Taking the doctrines of Christ and the Bible from a Spiritualistic point of view, he could not fail to win, and like the Nazarene of old, his works were often spoken of as the works of the devil. He had a heart to feel another's woes, and never turned a deaf ear to the despairing wails and beseeching cries of the distressed and the afflicted. His hand was ever open to relieve the wants of those to whom fortune had been unkind. He was not one of those who with one hand put a penny in the urn of poverty and with the other take a shilling out; on the contrary his deeds and practices of sweet charity were unostentatious, and whatever of kindness he performed to lift up the heart and to assuage the grief of suffering humanity was done almost stealthily and as silent as the passing of the snowflake. Deep down in his heart there was an unceasing spring of pity that never went dry, and never failed to strengthen those who in the agonies of their distress cried for help and craved its waters to nourish the desert places of their sinking hearts.

As a friend none was ever more faithful, none was ever more loyal, and in all the relations of life he came up to the full measure of a true man's duty. Bravely and radiantly he fought the battles of life, and whether basking in the soft sunlight of prosperity, or shivering on the bleak and chilling shores of adversity, he was the same noble, uncomplaining patient and trusting man. No warrior ever fought on field, no plumed knight ever tilted at a tournament, who bore a braver heart. He certainly laid down his life for his friends, and the Nazarene said, "No greater love has any man shown than he who lays down his life for his friends," having worked for the glorious cause of Spiritualism to the end. It will be said of him, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of thy Lord."

My heart goes out to his faithful wife and helpmate, who for all these years has stood by his side to the last moment. She, too, will have an abundant entrance into the beautiful spirit land when her work is finished on the earth plane. May the spirit of her dear husband come and comfort her, as we know he will, is the wish of one who pays to her honored husband this loving tribute.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

THE BIBLE New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

Sheet Music. Three Beautiful Spiritual Songs.

"We Are Passing But Once This Way." Song and refrain, by P. O. Hudson; price, 25 cents.

"Satisfied." A reverie. By A. J. Maxham. Price 25 cents.

"The Light of Reason." English and German words; sung to the tune of "Lead, Kindly Light." Price 25 Cents.

Practical Methods to Insure Success.

A valuable little work, full of practical instruction in matters pertaining to physical, mental and spiritual health. Worth many times its cost. Price 10 cents.

AFTER HER DEATH.

The Story of a Summer. By Lilian Whiting. Pervaded with pure and beautiful spirituality of thought. Instructive and helpful to all who love and seek the higher and finer ways of spiritual experience. Price, $1.00.

A Conspiracy Against the Republic

By Charles R. Walte, A. M., author of "History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200," etc. Price, paper, 25 cents.

The Wonders of Life.

By ERNEST HAECKEL, Author of "The Riddle of the Universe." This book is confined to the realm of organic science, and treats of "The Knowledge, Nature, Functions and History of Life." Price, cloth, $1.50.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE

Is a most excellent work by Dr. M. L. Sherman, assisted by Prof. W. F. Lyon. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 230 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK.

Torture implements employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity, with pictorial illustrations. By George E. Macdonald. Price, 10 cents.

An Infamous Conspiracy. A pamphlet of 32 pages, compiled and published by the late Rev. J. G. White, author of numerous Anti-Catholic works. It contains disclosures relative to a villainous plot to overthrow our free government. Price, 15 cents.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

As Reported by James I. Mettler, of Helena, Montana—A Continuation of His Communication Began in No. 895.

These circles were held in Great Falls, Mont., then our home. We began to receive written messages, which we dated upon receipt, and find among the first the date of July, 1898, and the last, July, 1903. On the spirit side we found the medium's brother who died in an army hospital during the Civil war, and an old earth life friend of the writer, who was, as he said, attracted to me because he could when with me see the earth as he saw it when living. Up to the time we began getting written messages we were troubled with receiving many untruthful statements, until I became disgusted and said, "If you have nothing for us but a lot of lies, I am going to close these circles."

The medium's brother then wrote: "It's this way. Spirits come to us clamoring to know your people, and want to communicate, and we permit them to do so; and it is from that class the lies originate."

I then said, "You and Jim (meaning my old friend) take charge and keep everybody from communicating unless you know them or we can identify them." This was agreed to and rigidly enforced, and we had no further trouble from liars.

My friend Jim, before the medium could write messages, had told us there would be war, a short one and a longer one. I asked if the United States would be involved in these wars? He said yes. I could not believe him, but it proved true. Besides being apparently able to see in the future, Jim was a handy man in other ways. I could get him to hunt up and bring to our circle any one in spirit life I wished to see. He found a man in spirit life with my name, brought him to the circle thinking he might be a relative. He proved to be an uncle whom I had never met in earth life, and later became one of the ten who wrote messages by controlling the hand of the medium. He wrote a very peculiar kind of hand. He had a daughter in St. Louis whom I had met, and I wrote her asking her if she could recognize the message (which I enclosed in the letter in such a manner that upon opening the letter she would see the message first) as her father's hand-writing. She replied, the moment she saw the hand-writing she recognized it as her father's, and wondered where it could have come from, for he had been dead so long. I had no way of comparing the hand-writing of the other ten writers.

On one occasion there were some very loud raps on the table. I said, "Jim, do you see who that is making those loud raps? Find out who it is and let me know."

"Shortly the medium wrote, "My name is Sam Kenyon; don't you know me?"

A member of the circle said, "I do. Who was it killed you?"

"David, my own son," was the answer. This member of the circle said they never learned who killed him.

After I had been under medical treatment and undergone a number of surgical operations, the last having a limb amputated, and got so I wanted something to pass the time, I took th old messages, and read them over, and when I found San Kenyon's, I wrote a party at Black River Falls whose name I had seen in The Progressive Thinker, asking him what he knew of this case, if anything, and received this reply dated at Black River Falls, Dec. 14, 1905: "Something over twenty years ago Sam Kenyon was shot and killed one evening as he stepped out of his house. He was a farmer and lived about three miles west of this place. The murderer was never found out, but at the time it was believed that he was connected with the family. There was an inquest held, but the evidence did not show who did the shooting, and no one was ever arrested, and nothing was ever done about it."

Sam Kenyon came and wrote me several messages to induce me to expose the boy David, but I did not care to do anything, for I could not see as I could do anything and so told him; but you can see the spirit of revenge had not been lived down in twenty years of spirit life, and David must meet Sam, his father, face to face and settle that matter in the future, and it is my opinion there will be no Jesus to assist in the settlement or dictate the terms. Evidently the young man is still on earth, and the old man has been camping on his trail, and thought he saw an opportunity to punish him, which no doubt he justly deserved. There are no secrets in the spirit world. We had many cases where we were convinced of this fact, and in a future article will relate some of the cases that came to us at our home circle. JAMES I. METTLER.

A Christian Plaint.

To the Editor:—The writer has, with great care, read most of the communications of your correspondents in last issue, and has found all of them miss the real question, contradict authentic history, and either ignore the Christian Bible or treat it with irreverence and disrespect. Some articles contradict common human experience, notably that of Clarence Severance of California.

Let me remind the Editor that all the good in the world to-day, and there is much good in it, has come from belief in Jesus Christ, whom, from your writings, I observe, Spiritualists seem to ignore.

Note also the civil and religious liberty we all enjoy has its source in the bible only—in nothing else.

Further, I may say, "A scholar's Conclusions," are false history. We must all of us cultivate a docile spirit, wanting in some people at the present day.

May I respectfully suggest to the Editor, that if he and his correspondents would try to place themselves in the position of those on the other side of the fence, by which Spiritualism is surrounded, and think how these people, like myself, feel when they find the bible and Christian doctrine so roughly treated by Spiritualists. Can you wonder that such seekers after truth are discouraged, and often made to give up the search, when they find those who claim so much for Spiritualism as a religion, show so little of the spirit of religion?

I cheerfully subscribe myself a seeker after what is good in Spiritualism.

SPIRITUALISM.

What It Is, What It Stands For, Should Be Clearly Defined by Spiritualists.

We have scientific authority for the genuineness of certain phenomena associated with Spiritualism.

Minus any proof of genuine phenomena, Spiritualism at once hangs upon the slender thread of the imagination, a worthless vagary.

Are genuine Spiritualistic phenomena more frequently imitated, and is fraud in this connection more common than formerly?

Whatever may be said with reference to the present effectiveness of genuine phenomena in Spiritualism, it is absolutely certain that cause obtains for their imitation in greater degree than ever before, and we might expect, as a logical sequence, more fraudulent or imitative expression of them than at any prior time.

Obviously, fraud could find no financially profitable opportunity for operating in the spiritualistic field, until a general interest in Spiritualism created a demand for its phenomena.

Demand for any kind of pure food, forces the danger of its being adulterated. If money was neither a value nor its representation, there would be no demand for it, and consequently no one would attempt to counterfeit it. Value attached to any commodity creates a demand for it in the market and is an occasion for incentive to its adulteration or imitation.

When fraudulent imitations of spiritualistic phenomena are observed, some little comfort may be derived from the knowledge that their value to the world furnishes the only inducement for counterfeiting them.

Every government carefully guards against any vitiating or imitating of its currency. Strong and efficient organization obtains under government appointment to detect spurious money and, if possible, cause due lawful punishment to be meted out to the offender of law. Spiritualists, in many cases, have failed of adopting the government's policy with reference to keeping pure currency of its sacred phenomena, and furthermore, have held to the inverse of this principle, heeding rather the scriptural injunction to "Let both (wheat and tares) grow together."

WHICH IS THE BETTER POLICY? Each one will here speak for himself, but for one, we firmly believe that the government will be strongly upheld, in this relation, and furthermore, because of our estimate of the respective value of commodities in question, we claim that the purity, or genuineness of these phenomena merit even more careful watchfulness in order that they are neither imitated nor vitiated.

As Spiritualists, with common consent we agree that it is wrong to imitate these phenomena for the purpose of deceiving the public, but may we not go further and do all that is possible to prevent their being vitiated?

At a risk of seeming too explicit, we will explain, by illustration, what we mean by imitation and vitiation in this connection: When a boy upon an April Fool's Day, I picked up what I believed, in my childish innocence, to be a genuine dollar bill. Upon attempt to pass it I of course found it valueless as money, being but an imitation. Later in life I tendered a conductor a silver coin in payment of my passage which was refused because a hole had been bored in it and then filled with lead. The coin had been vitiated with a baser metal than was necessary to meet government demand in its pure coin.

Let it be carefully observed that we are referring to phenomena and not mediums, only indirectly. The currency of Spiritualism, if it has any standard value, will be found in pure, unadulterated phenomena and in the accurate and precise statement of its philosophy, religion and science.

If this standard is carelessly allowed to become vitiated, lack of any confidence in it is sure to follow. It is true that certain phenomena, as presented, has no other recommendation than simply that it is true. Can any truth coming from the spirit world fall of value? Proof that it comes from the spirit world would doubtless give to it the importance of a fact in nature, associated with communication between human incarnate beings, but the real force of the communication may be only in connection with the knowledge that it had its origin in the world of excarnate beings. Axioms frequently become trite although they may be always true.

However full of the realization of a truth a soul may be, precision of expression comes under the domain of a well recognized law, whereby all become amenable to the absolute necessity of careful research, study, contemplation and reflection.

Prof. Lockwood, J. Clegg Wright, Doctor George A. Fuller and a score or more of others among the lecturers and mediums for Spiritualism, are men and women meeting this sacred requirement, but with many this ability for even any evidence of a disposition to acquire it seems so lacking that the character of many of their utterances often vitiates the message, whether of Spiritualism's philosophy, or one given for the consolation of the depressed and sorrowing, in the form of a "test."

Is not the entire structure of Spiritualism daily vitiated and consequently misunderstood by the general public because of the lack of a clear definition of just what it stands for? If such a definition is to come from the National body, perhaps it should not be expected as its best, if formulated by the more or less promiscuous gathering constituting the delegate body of the National Spiritualists' Association in Convention.

There are at least two somewhat widely divergent views of just what Spiritualism stands for. Broad-minded, well-educated men and women are in the field of Spiritualism, who intelligently represent the radical and conservative aspects of Spiritualism.

We believe that Spiritualism would gain prestige as never before, if the National body would appoint, or cause to be appointed, a commission consisting of twelve or eighteen members, carefully selected, and who intelligently represent the cause of Spiritualism in its many divergent aspects, with instructions to meet, say at Washington, D. C., and there hold daily meetings for a week, or even two weeks, if necessary, for the purpose of formulating in precise and brief terms as possible, a statement of what in their judgment Spiritualism stands for, and then, if their report is sustained by the N. S. A. in convention, let the Association plainly and thoroughly inform the country just what Spiritualists themselves have decided that Spiritualism stands for.

No greater or no more valuable missionary work could be done by the National Association than this, and for one year let the money that is now being expended for missionaries be applied to the payment of this commission for its services, if thought wise, but at any rate meet the expense in such a generous manner as to impress the commission of the importance of its duty.

Certainly Spiritualists believe something, and it is due to Spiritualists and to the world at large to know just exactly what that something is. If now, any representative of Spiritualism is asked what Spiritualists believe, no one, not even the President of the N. S. A. can speak authoritatively or even at all, without the risk of contradiction by the next person to whom a similar appeal is made. Thus is Spiritualism being daily vitiated in the public mind. Such a commission should consist of fair, broad-minded members, void of all personal ambition to impose upon the public any personal littleness, and having only one object in view, namely, represent the truest and best in Spiritualism in all its bearings and aspects.

When determined just what constitutes Spiritualism, qualification necessary for being a Spiritualist is decided at the same time. Some of us are getting weary of being asked what Spiritualism really stands for, and of being forced to the admission that we do not know, or at least can only answer for one.

Without doubt there is a STANDARD SPIRITUALISM. Must we admit of an inability to define the standard? If we cannot adequately do it, may we not approximately do so? Some will say, "IT IS TOO BROAD TO DEFINE." This is but an admission that it is TOO BROAD TO BE UNDERSTOOD. If it cannot be understood, of what use is it to anyone until it is explained?

Time and noble endeavor have been given, we understand, in preparation of Spiritualism's history. When Spiritualists are properly organized, and become wise enough to stand together in expressing that organization, they will begin to make history that can be written; but the strongest and most forceful organization possible may as well be despaired of until Spiritualists come out and stand together upon some well defined platform, a platform broad enough to meet Spiritualism's every aspect.

It is obvious that the "Declaration of Principles" as adopted by the N. S. A. does not meet the requirements of this suggestion, for the six articles all woefully fail to state what Spiritualism stands for to the great majority of Spiritualists. These "Principles" are not strong, and bear the imprint of immature thought at almost every point.

We need a platform broad enough for every honest, intelligent Spiritualist (or who aspires to be intelligent) to stand upon, but with not so much as an inch upon which the ignorant advocate or one who boasts of ignorance as a virtue, the CHARLATAN OR DECEIVER CAN FIND A FOOTHOLD.

We are not asking for "Articles of Faith," "Creeds and doctrines." From all these, as generally understood, we would forever be delivered. We are advocating the necessity of a clear and logical statement of what the best thinkers in Spiritualism conceive to be the mission of Spiritualism in the world, the aims and objects Spiritualists seek to accomplish.

BOSTON NOTES.

Just a Piece of Cherry Pie—Dr. Dean Clarke and His Poems.

Chas. L. C. Hatch, of the Hatch Brothers, was able to spend Christmas with his parents at Boston, through a somewhat unpleasant circumstance. He was touring through the Middle West and just as he was about starting for his next engagement in St. Paul, Minn., he became violently ill with ptomaine poisoning from eating a piece of cherry pie. In four days' time his strength was so reduced that he cancelled his engagements and started for home, where he arrived the night before Christmas, and where he is rapidly recovering.

A familiar figure about the famous spring in Franklin Park, Dorchester, Mass., is Dean Clarke. People come to this spring from miles around to drink this delicious water, and to carry home jugs full of it. Dr. Clarke spends hours sitting near by and watching the men, women and children of all classes and descriptions.

He named the spring "Ponce de Leon," and wrote a poem which was published, together with his picture, in the Boston papers.

Dr. Clarke's brain is clear and active, and about a year ago, in addition to his other ailments, he lost the use of his hands, which deprived him of the luxury of reading or writing, and made him wholly dependent upon others. While he admits that his physical condition frees him from care and responsibility, and that he has many things for which he is grateful, yet he quotes Byron to prove that he would willingly exchange his forced inactivity for much responsibility: "Quiet to a quick soul is a hell."

When placed upon his feet, Dr. Clarke is still able to walk at times, though he frequently becomes "footfast," and is obliged to wait until some one assists him to start. He cannot rise from a sitting posture without help, and suffers greatly from sleepless nights, when he thinks—thinks—thoughts of which he cannot dispose by putting them on paper in the old way.

He feels, however, that he is being held in the body for a purpose; and that purpose, he firmly believes, is to place before the public his one hundred or more poems in book form.

Dr. Clarke has devoted his life to the cause of Spiritualism, and he has been a credit to it. His lectures and essays contain the result of clear, logical thinking. His poems are a part of the history of Spiritualism and should be preserved. One of these poems: "The Triumphs of Man," sold at the rate of a thousand copies in three months, through newspaper notices alone.

Are there not enough Spiritualists who are willing now to subscribe for one or more copies, at one dollar each, to justify Mr. Francis in undertaking to publish them in book form?

THAT REMEDY.

"For Fake Seances and Other Evils."

To the Editor:—In a late issue of The Progressive Thinker is an article from the pen of Dr. James B. Candy; he taking for his text the words forming the caption of this writing. The good Dr., no doubt, meant it for just what it reads.

But to the writer of this paper it appears rather drastic, for the purpose intended, as will be shown in my explanation. But I will first make a restatement of the Doctor's prescription. Here it is in full allopathic style:

"For the advancement of the truth of Spiritualism, we make this suggestion: If we are earnest in our desire as Spiritualists to advance its truths, its realities, its love for humanity, it becomes us now to adopt such methods as will banish all public seances.

"This can only be accomplished by a drastic measure: Let Spiritualists in each State unite as a society, or individuals, in a petition to the judiciary thereof, for a prohibition of all public seances. No seances in any case whatever, excepting those that are held privately at which those only are present as are known as Spiritualists."

Readers of The Progressive Thinker, the above is the plan, verbatim et literatim, laid down by Dr. Candy, for the advancement of our cause—the spreading of the gospel of Spiritualism, and its "Love for humanity," as well as for the healing of the moral maladies that apparently blighted its fair name and made encroachments upon its pure nature health. What do you think of the plan? Do you believe the prescription apropos? I have no doubt but a little therapeutic attention properly applied would be conducive to the advancement of our cause in its onward march to the true goal; but I am sure it will require a very different remedial agent than that of Dr. Candy.

Why, friends, the remedy as prescribed evidently shows that the Dr's. abilities are unequal to his zeal, so much so that he will have to be passed by as incapable to deal with the case. Why, listen! "We must petition for a prohibition of all public seances." I wonder how this would apply to our public schools of any and all descriptions, either as a remedy to purify them of the many mistakes and false teachings, or to advance the cause of knowledge and general education? Would it not be rather a means of repressing the cause of education and therefore, forcing every boy and girl seeking knowledge to stay at home and learn of their parents, providing they could teach the young scions how to shoot; and if not, then plod their way alone, grow up untaught and seek for bliss in sheer ignorance.

Again, if this is to be the remedy, then let us abolish our camp meetings, also, for our public speakers know nothing, absolutely nothing of Spiritualism except what they gathered from its phenomena as manifested everywhere over the lines of their travel, unless they chance to get it by inspiration direct; and even then it is a phenomenon which, to be of any great value, must be placed before the public; and not kept private. And this is just what has to be done in case of every humanitarian movement that ever comes within the domain of human thought.

See here, Spiritualists, you or I—any of us who know the blessings of Spiritualism and its divine truths, are wanting to extend the same to others of our kindred, must, to carry out Dr. Candy's plan, first petition the judiciary (whenever and whatever that may be) to establish or enact a law to prohibit us from doing that very thing we are striving for. That is, let none of our outside brothers and sisters into the seance room that they, too, may learn and with us enjoy the fruits thereof.

But let us turn back and take another view of the Candy medicine, and we will find when drank to the dregs, it means death, and only death to the one great, grand cause into which all truths ever discovered to and by man, as pertaining to Life, have culminated.

Listen, again: "No seances in any case whatever excepting those that are held privately."

What else, Dr. Candy? Why these private seances, "at which those only are present, as are known as Spiritualists."

Not a man, woman or child to enter the seance room except those who are absolutely converted! This would be disseminating the truth and knowledge of Spiritualism with a vengeance, wouldn't it? In the course of a generation the Spiritualists now known, will have passed on to the land of souls; and then there will be none left either to attend seances and learn, or to go out and teach. Remember, none but those as known Spiritualists are to see inside the school or seance room!

Well, then, good bye to Spiritualism.

I told you, Spiritualists, at the start, the Doctor's drastic measure was too drastic for the purpose in view. Oh, when will would-be teachers cease to pin themselves to the coat-tails of others, for fame and themselves for lack of true knowledge die at the game?

Spiritualism in its modern advent to the mortal plane was the result of a long, earnest, wisely studied plan of highly exalted souls of philanthropic men and women who had passed on to higher planes of being—had learned more of life, its possibilities and purposes, and losing none of their interests for their kindred left behind, they returned to them in the most befitting manner practicable, to carry out their plans for the uplifting of humanity, even to the establishing of the one universal religion, to-wit: The brother and sisterhood of the human race. Their plan was one of education, the unfoldment of life in all its relations to the full rounded out man and woman; to the end that they should be free and equal in all rights and opportunities for happiness. And woe, woe, woe, unto those who heedlessly or purposely stand in the way. "For their sins will find them out." Fraternally,

DR. J. H. MENDENHALL.

THE RICHES OF CONTENT.

I crave not riches nor the gems of earth;
I crave not gold nor palaces, nor lands;
I envy not the scepter in the hands
Of men who rule o'er men by chance of birth.
No man I envy in whose heart is dearth
Of human love, and all that love demands;
I envy none, save only him who stands
Calm, kingly and supreme in native worth.
I covet not a portion of the whole
Of wealth which some adore with worship blind;
Though sparingly his store may Mammon dole,
Well am I pleased if through my toil I find
The riches of a calm and peaceful soul,
The blessing of a sound, contented mind.

An Open Letter.

From a Scientist, Addressed to Spiritualists and Skeptics.

There comes to every man and woman a time in his or her life when they must decide for themselves the great questions vital to their life and happiness. The claims of Spiritualism and the beliefs of the truth asserted by Spiritualists are the most vital of the questions, and we all must sometime either recognize these truths and facts, or else in sublime ignorance deny them.

To me has come the time for making a positive assertion. I have been quoted often; sometimes incorrectly, again falsely. I have been unable to publicly deny all that has been falsely said, and I have been unable to publicly say just what I actually believed.

For years I have been investigating Spiritualism in a scientific manner. I have investigated in a materialistic way, until I found that you cannot measure the spiritual with a material foot-rule. I have had to comply with scientific logical laws in order to be a "scientist," which means "a fool-headed, materialistic unbeliever of all that cannot be weighed, measured with gauges or put upon the ice to be kept cool." Such are the limitations of a true scientist's investigations of any power or force of this universe. It is really strange to find scientists admitting that such a thing as ether exists, and can account for the wireless messages. For ether is unseen, unknown and unmeasurable to the ordinary laymen. But even scientists make a mistake and forget themselves, and admit something when it is proven to them. And this is really how I came to admit that spiritual communication is actually possible; for it has been proven to me.

When a scientist investigates spiritual claims and the usual phenomena, he is governed by set rules and regulations. He is supposed to be careful and accurate; precise in his measurements and truthful in his appreciation of facts presented. For this reason, and no other the assertion of a scientist relative to all popular phenomena is accepted by the lay mind, the newspapers and all those who are not interested enough to investigate for themselves. How readily the lay mind and the news editor will accept a scientist's article disproving Spiritualism, but how reluctantly will these people accept the truth or positive affirmation of Spiritualistic claims.

One of the logical axioms which a scientist must observe while investigating spiritual phenomena is that "nothing must be accredited to supermundane causes which can be accounted for by natural ones." This means that the scientist must never believe that anything was caused by spiritual means, or supernatural means, if the same thing can be accounted for or produced by natural, earthly causes. This logical axiom did not interfere with the spiritual phenomena, as there was no natural cause which could account for a medium receiving information which she had never learned or acquired through her objective conscious faculties. For this reason the scientists would have to accept the spiritual cause, or hypothesis. This would never do. They had to prevent it some way, and the result was that such men as Dr. Thomson Jay Hudson and others gave birth to the beautiful pet theory of "telepathic communication between living people." Lately they have had to stretch the possibilities and limitations of this pet theory to such an extreme that were the theory a rubber band the band would have long ago broken. However the scientists have beautifully shown us how telepathy can account for everything that happens inside and outside of the seance room. And yet the strange part of it is that these same men, notably Dr. Hudson, admit that they know "comparatively little regarding telepathy, its possibilities and limitations." If this is true, then how account for their fine adaptation of all spiritual phenomena to the possibilities of telepathy.

Long ago I found that telepathy could not account for all that I had seen and heard. There might be some other cause than spiritual to account for what I have seen or heard, but why speculate? It appeared to me to be a more logical axiom to say that the most simple cause for any phenomena is to be accepted in preference to one which is an endless chain of wild speculation. Does it not appear that the communication of spirits with those of this earth is more simple and easily demonstrated than that every human being is directly and indirectly en rapport, mentally, with every other human being on this earth? Does not the wild theory of Dr. Hudson, that "A can telepath to B and that B, unconscious of having received a message, unconsciously, subjectively, telepaths to C" seem to be beyond reason? Why have it that every human being is a wireless station, constantly attuned to receive messages, and that every human being can unconsciously communicate with any human being regardless of distance, time, condition or circumstances?

These were the questions which I, as associate editor of an "occult monthly" magazine, president of a Research Society, and otherwise placed in a "scientific" (materialistic) position had to answer to myself.

I found the answers, and at once decided that as a "scientific investigator" bound to the scientific axioms and logical conclusions, I could never learn the whole truth. I found that as a scientist I was blind. I have been told by expert magicians that they would rather have upon their platforms as investigating committees a body of "scientists" than a body of level-headed laymen. I found that the scientist with all his logical conclusions and deductive, inductive, syllogistical reasoning was the easiest fooled. He was blind to truth. He started to investigate with a pet theory thoroughly fixed in his mind, and he fitted every phase of the demonstration to work in harmony with his theory. What did not fit he ignored, and he finally came to the logical conclusion that his pet theory was right and that he had made a startling truthful discovery.

I was one of the blinded investigators for several years, and I am glad that I have not waited until I reached the future life to give my spiritual message; for I am going to give it now. I am glad that I have not had to wait until I became a spirit, to speak to others and admit that I "was wrong in my earthly life while investigating, for I find that I was a blind unbeliever." I make my admittance now, while I live, and although I expect that this admission will call forth comment and unpleasant notoriety, I am going to do that which hundreds of other scientists should do but are afraid to do. I am going to raise my colors, face the truth, and say that I HAVE FOUND PLENTY OF PHENOMENA WHICH CANNOT BE ACCOUNTED FOR BY ANY OTHER CAUSE THAN THAT OF SPIRITUAL COMMUNICATION AND SPIRITUAL INFLUENCE.

I have had my say. I have made the assertion which, I assure you has taken long and careful consideration and forethought. I have taken a stand contrary to that taken by those who are scientists, and as long as I live I shall stand ready to make this same assertion publicly or otherwise until the time finally comes whereby, through the unknown method, I can give this message to thousands who will never know of it otherwise.

Thanking our good Brother Francis for this opportunity of speaking the truth and here, publicly, thanking our good and faithful Sister Margaret Gaule, through whom I have become so thoroughly converted by her remarkable mediumistic powers, and wishing this paper, the Truth standard, a more prosperous and successful campaign of conversion, I ask for that peace that comes and has come through Truthful Knowledge of Divine Laws and Blessings.

A MODERN SERMON.

With Liberal Ideas and an Elevating Spiritualizing Influence.

"Providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord but in the sight of men."—II. Cor., viii:21.

The religion that will not stand the strain of modern business may have been good for some other age; but it is valuless in this one. The test of your piety is not peace in the pews of the church, but power and direction in the stress of the market, its adaptability to your activities as well as your meditations.

Religion is built for business, the only creed that is worth a moment's thought is a working creed, that is, one that gets into action. Religion is not the mere acceptance of a speculative philosophy of this and other worlds. It consists in principles, ideals, and motives which dominate conduct. It is more concerned with the kind of a world you are making here than with the conceptions you may have of a world beyond.

Religion is more than an institution; it is a course of life. It has to do with the church only in so far as the church serves its purposes. It is more concerned with what a man pays his employes than with what he puts upon the plate at the collection. The man who can put all his piety into the prayer-meeting and the services of the church never has enough serously to embarrass him under any circumstances.

If for your religion you have adopted principles of high living; if you have set the worth of the soul above all other things; if you have determined to frame your life according to the golden rule of the great teacher, and, with him as hero and ideal, are seeking to do good to others AND MAKE THE WORLD A BETTER PLACE FOR US ALL, WITH LESS OF SIN AND SORROW AND MORE OF JOY AND LOVE, YOU WILL MAKE YOUR BUSINESS AS WELL AS YOUR PRAYING THE SERVANT OF THESE ENDS.

But if you have said that you wish to do these things, that you wish to live the pure and beneficent life while in your heart your sole desire is to get riches, to gain fame, to secure power, then there is bound to be conflict between the religion you profess and the business that possesses you. The truth is that fortunately there always will be a conflict between a passion for the gains of business and a pretense of religion.

Everything depends on the purposes of living, on the things a man really and deep within himself sets first in his life; he will follow those things no matter what other professions he may make. BUSINESS AS A SERVANT DESERVES OUR ALLEGIANCE AND DEVOTION; BUSINESS AS A MASTER IS THE MOST EVIL AND SOUL DEVASTATING THING IN THE UNIVERSE.

There is the most perfect harmony; there is relatively easy settlement of problems and difficulties if but this principle be adopted: that you have taken as your chief business in life the ends of true religion, the development of character and the service of humanity, and, with this purpose, the daily toil, the opportunities and enginery of your trade or profession shall be made to serve these higher ends.

Religion then becomes the motive in business and business the manifestation of religion. A man serves the Most High in his office with the same devotion and elevation of spirit as a priest at the altar. He is doing a great work, because the spirit is great. In questions of conscience he can afford to lose everything except the great end; he will not sacrifice the lesser to the greater.

When our work all is done and our business weighed in the balances, our work is to be judged and our satisfaction insured not by having been sharp or shrewd or successful according to passing standards, BUT BY HAVING MADE THE WORLD RICHER, LIVES LIGHTER, HEARTS HAPPIER, AND WHETHER WE HAVE FOUND FOR OURSELVES THOSE RICHES OF WHICH DEATH AND THE GRAVE CAN NEVER DESPOIL US.

A Heart to Heart Talk.

To relate the facts in regard to the practical evil influence of Christian teaching on morality is to incite the anger of churchmen, and misrepresentation as to motive. Even truthful quotations from church workers are supposed to be garbled to make a point against religion.

In this great city of Chicago we have illustrations of the neglect of the churches to look after reformatory work. Let us resort to facts for proof:

Mrs. Arnold Heap, of the Civic Committee of the West End Woman's Club, shall be heard. She was one of a party which recently visited the Levee District, looking after the notorious resorts in that ill-reputed part of the city, and holding heart to heart talks with the inmates, with the view of curbing vice. Says an exchange in relating her observation:

"Mrs. Heap launched her philippic against churches after a day spent in thinking over the many things she saw in her trip through the 'red light' district.

"'Churches seemed flat, stale and unprofitable to me,' she said, 'when my eyes were opened to the awful iniquity going on at their doors. I have been a church and reform worker all my life, but I do not look with pride upon the reform work the churches are carrying on. The Salvation Army men and women are better Christians. They are working in the spirit of self-sacrifice which Christ teaches. The church members are moralists. They go to church and sit in beautiful pews and gaze at stained glass windows, drinking in beautiful music and the words of the pastor. Then they go home and eat a turkey dinner and sit around in their best clothes.

"All this time the worst imaginable sins are crying out near them, and dying souls are going down for need of some help and some words of cheer and comfort. I do not know what the women's clubs will recommend. The only thing spoken of was that if the mothers of the boys who frequent the district would go there more often, the boys would not go so much.

"'It is said church members own the buildings that are given over to this terrible traffic. I do not know that, but if true, it would be a good thing to investigate and put up to the church members for correction. I think many of these girls could be induced by a little work to leave that life.'"

Sophistry of Christian Politicians.

"As evidence of the wisdom of Almighty God," said the deacon, "he had noticed Providence had caused large rivers to flow past large towns."

Did not the same great power have just as much to do in setting aside a DAY for rest, as he had in making rivers flow past large towns? Good Christian reader, think of it: For what purpose did God make the nights? Was not day and night a fact millions of years in advance of man? Then was not man in his evolution adapted to the condition of things in nature, just as cities were built by large water courses for the convenience of the later tenant? It looks that way, does it not? Then why all this hullabaloo about God setting aside a day for rest? The day was originally set aside to exploit priestcraft under false pretenses, and the delusion has been perpetuated by the rehearsal of that same falsehood. The Progressive Thinker has no objection to a seventh day release from labor and the cares of business, but it does object to its observance on false grounds, the making of it compulsory and that without regard to the needs to the immediate contrary.

A Hope.

The Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in process of construction in New York, by Roman Catholics, it is reported, will require a hundred years at present rate of progress to complete. It is hoped in that time the church will be revolutionized along modern lines of thought, and scientific knowledge will take the place of its original paganism

A Crushing Arraignment.

"Christianity has retarded the progress of the human race by at least fifteen hundred years," said Dr. Oswald, lately deceased, in his "The Secrets of the East."

"The fruits of science and social reform, which our descendants will reap in fifteen centuries hence, might be enjoyed at the present moment, if the last sixty generations had not wasted time in disputes about the interpretation of idiotic dogmas, and in the attempt to gain the heaven of a future world by despising the blessings of the present.

"On the altar of her anti-natural idol, the Christian church has sacrificed the lives of eighteen millions of the noblest and bravest of our fellowmen. Two millions were butchered in the wars against the freedom-loving children of nature, the Saxons, the Sarmatians, the pagan Scandinavians; one million in the wars against the Arian heretics; at least five millions in the seven larger and four smaller crusades. The extermination of the Spanish Saracens reduced the population of the peninsula by seven millions. One million were slaughtered in the fifteen years' man-hunt against the Albigenses, the Thirty Year's War against Protestant princes, the massacres of the French Huguenots, the Waldenses, and the insurgents of the Netherlands. A full million human lives were devoured by the Moloch of the Holy Inquisition and the witch tribunals, which for nearly seven centuries infested all the principal cities of Christian Europe. To this number, we might add the twelve million aborigines of the New World, who in less than a century fell victims to the insane fury of their Christian conquerors and the unremitting persecutions of the Christian Inquisition. Many of the Inquisitors were men of spotless morality. Montfort, the butcher of the Albigenses, was a pious and righteous cavalier. Jean Bodin and Judge Sprenger, the defender of the witch tribunals, sincerely pitied the fate of their victims; but their horrible creed left them no choice. The blood of thirty millions of our fellow-men cries out against the nature-hating fanatic who inculcated the belief in the sinful instincts, the guilt of skepticism, and the possibility of Satanic incarnations.

"Christianity has turned whole nations of freedom-loving men into slaves and flunkeys. The precepts of self-abhorrence and passive submission to tyranny and injustice was a direct declaration of war against the manly self-reliance that is the basis of all true independence.

"The worst tyranny that has ever oppressed the children of earth was perpetrated in the name of God. When Charlemagne conquered the pagan Saxons, thousands of brave men were slain like wild beasts; thousands were transported to the slave farms of the Abbot Alcuin, or imprisoned in Christian convents; hundreds of widowed and bereaved mothers suicided; hundreds of children were scourged to death for resisting the brutality of their jailers, or in trying to regain their liberty. The Spanish Unitarians, the Jews and Moriscoes, the most industrious of the inhabitants, were hunted from province to province, and when, after centuries of horrible persecutions, a remnant of the fugitives sought refuge in Portugal, the Christian king was forced by priests to break his promise; the refugees were banished or dragged away to slavery in Catholic convents.

"Leckey, in his History of Rationalism, vol. 2, p. 270, says: 'The church abolished slavery in name and promoted it in fact. Her doctrine implied a divine sanction of despotism, and an entire disregard of man's natural rights. The slave-barracks of ancient Rome were temples of liberty compared with the dungeons of church torture-dens, where thousands of nature's noblemen vainly invoked death and madness to escape from the power of ecclesiastical demons.'" Tricks That Are Vain.

Sometimes in searching for the cause of things we have to go below the surface. A superficial examination will not reveal all the facts. Is not this the case when trying to learn why the great opposition to the Japanese in the public schools of San Francisco? The common explanation is: Because it is bringing cheap labor into the country to compete with white labor? It is the revival of the opposition to the Chinese, which resulted in Congressional legislation prohibiting their landing on our coasts. It is said:

"If the children of Japanese parents can be educated in the common of such children will come to support those children while in pursuit of those children while in persuit of knowledge, they will sell their labor at prices which will drive the white labor out of the country."

Was it not a fact that the clergy were the most violent in their opposition to Chinese immigration? And is it not a fact that this same class of "politicians," aided by the Christian press, are the loudest in hostility to the Japanese who wish to learn American ways in American schools, to the end they can carry back to the Sunrise kingdom our learning to engraft on theirs.

We stated in these columns some time ago that the Japanese government had made provision that after a term of years, we think six, had been spent in acquiring the rudiments of Japanese learning, the next four years of childhood were to be given to the learning of English. Where are the teachers for the millions of Japanese youth who are to be taught English to come from if not from English-speaking people?

But we apprehend the whole truth is not told. Those youth who wish to be educated in our schools are advanced in years. They are Buddhists, and it is impossible to convert an educated Buddhist to Christianity; but when American youth learn the truth in regard to Buddhism they will not view it in the light our preachers have taught. Instead of mere learners they will become teachers as well, and fill the place of Buddhist missionaries. There is the source of danger, and the cry of "cheap labor" is thrown in to divert attention from the real fact.

It is not alone the heathen Chinee who practice "tricks that are vain."

The scheme of nature, regarded in its whole extent, cannot have had for its sole or even principal object the good of human or other sentient beings.—J. S. Mill.

"The Great Work."

A Review, Chapter by Chapter, by Lyman C. Howe.

During the last few years there have been THREE important works presented to the world, which have created a most decided sensation all along the Spiritualistic lines of thought—"THE GREAT PSYCHOLOGICAL CRIME" and "THE GREAT WORK," by an unknown author, and "OBSESSION," by Dr. J. M. Peebles, one of our leading speakers. We were never requested by either of the authors that we in any way exploit prominently their respective works. We did this voluntarily, and of course WITHOUT ANY PAY THEREFOR, anticipating great good to result from the discussion that would naturally arise. "The Psychological Crime" and "Obsession" were THOROUGHLY AIRED, and GREAT GOOD was accomplished by the views of many prominent Spiritualists, and now it remains to consider in a comprehensive manner "THE GREAT WORK," that contains many STARTLING STATEMENTS of great significance and importance, if true.

The author thereof knows that Spirit Return is a grand truth, and he has daily intercourse with the Brothers of the SCHOOL OF NATURAL SCIENCE on the spirit side of life, and he is trying strenuously to raise the world to a higher plane along his line of thought.

The fact is, leading speakers and mediums DIFFER WIDELY in regard to one exceedingly simple question,—"Do animals live in spirit life," some asserting THEY DO, while others equally as prominent, asserting THEY DO NOT. Scores of other simple questions, exceptionally important, are also received with strenuous AFFIRMATIONS AND DENIALS; such being the case, Spiritualists should calmly and philosophically consider everything that relates to SPIRIT RETURN, especially when emanating from those in close touch with the spirit side of life.

Suspicion is well nigh universal. The best acts of life are almost certain to be credited to some selfish motive. If a man does a kindness to some needy one, the critic at once suggests that "he has an axe to grind." So universal is this tendency to suspect human motives, that a truly sincere effort for good subjects the best of men to evil suspicions and cynic scowls.

The prominence given to this new book, entitled "The Great Work," in The Progressive Thinker, is likely to evoke a suspicion that Editor Francis "has an axe to grind." That he is in league with the Indo-American Publishing House, with a mutual agreement to boom the book for money. Such was the charge respecting the "Great Psychological Crime," because The Progressive Thinker gave it such prominence, and seemed to endorse the author and the book. I am not in a position to testify, for I know nothing of the business relations, if any, between the two publishing firms. But I can testify that my part in discussing it with Mrs. Huntley had no money consideration in it, and no purpose to cajole the author or his reputed "science." Nor was there any intention to weaken the evidence upon which Spiritualism rests, or to compromise it in the smallest degree, or to surrender one truth that belongs in its history or philosophy.

The same is true of the present attempt to review this third volume in the Harmonic Series. But there are some claims made by the author which I would be glad to know are true. Every Spiritualist in the world, I think, would be glad to know that, by another method than special mediumship, a life after physical death can be and is scientifically demonstrated. If there were a hundred ways to prove that "Death is but a kind and gentle servant who unlocks with noiseless hand life's flower-encircled door, to show us those we love," it would not detract from Spiritualism, but rather, add to it.

In the face of all our knowledge, and the millions of experiences in which many thousands have been brought face to face with the denizens of the spirit world, there are yet many millions who know nothing of the proof that death does not end all. There are yet many who have witnessed phenomena which to others are proof positive, (and leave no doubt that the question is settled), who still hold the evidence insufficient, and remain skeptical.

Alfred Russel Wallace has said that "no more evidence is needed to prove Spiritualism, for no accepted fact in science has a greater or stronger array of proof in its behalf." Dr. Wallace is the peer of the ablest and best informed men of science in the world. But Dr. I. K. Funk, after thirty years' study of the subject, still expresses doubt. Did he doubt the account of the hand-writing on the wall at the great feast of Belshazzar, when he was expounding the bible to his church? Did he doubt that Jesus appeared alive after his crucifixion? Did he doubt that Moses and Elias talked with him on the "Mount of Transfiguration"? What more evidence had he that these reputed events really occurred as reported, and that the spirits that were said to appear were realities, than he has had a hundred times repeated in Modern Spiritualism?

These queries seem pertinent as showing the continued need of proof, more proof, more experience, more facts, more demonstration, more and better mediumship.

The extraordinary claims made by the disciples of the "Great School" will open the door to profound questionings, and to startling wonder, further on in this review. I may not be able to satisfy the reader, or myself, as to just what is true in these claims; but it seems to me if they are entirely true it should have been possible and easy to have settled the question of a future life for every intelligent person in the world centuries ago.

The author lays his foundation well. He analyzes and illustrates plainly. The first chapters are preparing us for the tremendous problems that confront us as we proceed.

Chapter II, or classification of data, divides them into four definite classes.

These he introduces with a few axiomatic statements, viz.: "Some things we know, and we know that we know them. Some things we assume to know, but we know that we do not know them. Some things we believe, but we do not know them, nor do we even assume to know them. All other things we neither know nor assume to know, nor do we even believe them."

That the reader may get a definite idea of the way our author uses facts and builds conclusions, it is necessary to extend quotations at the outset. Thus, in "classification of data, he presents the "First Class" as follows:

We know that we exist.

We know that other people exist.

We know that other things, besides ourselves, exist.

We know that fire burns and water quenches thirst.

(Query: Do we absolutely know that water quenches thirst? I have known thirst that water would not quench, and the more water swallowed the greater the thirst. If thirst ceases soon after drinking, do we know that it was the water that did it? Some hypercritics on Spiritualism class all tests of personal communications from incarnate men as coincidents. With as much reason may we not say that the diminution or cessation of thirst soon after drinking water is coincidence? Since it does not always follow, and sometimes water seems to aggregate thirst, instead of quenching it, can we truthfully say that "we know that water quenches thirst?" The scientific certainty of continued life after physical death is disputed by some critics of Spiritualism. To such I offer this challenge: Prove to me that water quenches thirst, and I will consider your denials of our evidence. I do not intend to be hypercritical in this review, but I do intend to analyze all statements and claims that do not seem to me to be well sustained. The claim of this book is to represent the "School of Natural Science," and this school is assumed to be far superior to any other as an interpreter of exact and comprehensive science. But to continue with things we know:)

"We know that we can think, and that we can convey our thoughts to others." (Query: Do we know that we can convey our thoughts to others? Circumstantial evidence is very strong in favor of this conclusion; but as the author claims—and justly, too, I think—that our own personal experience is the only means by which we can know anything, how can we know that we convey our thoughts to others? The experience of receiving our thoughts which we fancy we convey to others, belongs not to us who speak or write, but to the receiver. That we receive thoughts that seem to proceed from others, does not give us the personal, experimental knowledge that others receive the thoughts we attempt to convey them.)

Second Class.

"We assume to know that the earth is round. * * * But on a basis of actual test it is doubtful if one in a thousand of the human race as it exists to-day has ever personally demonstrated the truth of that assumption. * * * The very large majority of us do not, in literal truth, personally know whether the earth is round, or square, or cubical, or pyramidal. * * * We only assume to know. We assume to know how old we are. * * * We do not hesitate to go into court * * and solemnly make oath as to our respective ages."

"And yet in all human probability not one of those who read this page knows to a definite certainty his or her own age. * * *

"Indeed, if we but held ourselves to a rigid and strictly truthful differentiation of the data we employ, there is perhaps not one of us but would be greatly surprised, if not genuinely humiliated to find how many things we assume to know, which are in truth altogether outside the limits of our personal knowledge. We do not know them. We merely assume to know them, and our assumption passes current for actual personal language."

Third Class.

"Many there are who believe in a God, in the sense that the Great Creative Intelligence is a distinct and definite personality. But there are also many others who believe, just as firmly, that the Great Creative Intelligence is not a God, in the sense of a definite personality. It would seem, however, that among all of these there are few, if any, who could truthfully assert that the subject is one which falls within the limits of their personal knowledge. * * * There are also those who believe in the absolute inherent immortality of all mankind. Others believe in conditional immortality, only as a reward of individual effort. And there are others who believe, with equal earnestness, that immortality is only a pleasant dream, a comforting delusion, a fascinating fiction, and that physical death means total extinction. * * * All such beliefs, however, may be distinguished without difficulty, from definite personal knowledge, or even assumed knowledge, as these are classified and defined above."

Fourth Class.

"We neither know, nor assume to know, nor can we formulate a well-defined belief as to when time began, or when, if ever, it will end; where space begins, how far it extends, or where, if at all, it ends."

"We neither know nor assume to know, nor do we have even a definite belief as to where, when or how matter first came into existence, how long it will continue to exist, or what will ultimately become of it."

I think this statement is open to question. It may be true of the author, and many others, that they have no definite belief as to how matter first came into existence, how long it will continue," etc. But many thinkers have a very definite belief that MATTER NEVER CAME INTO EXISTENCE, and that IT WILL ALWAYS CONTINUE TO EXIST.

Others find scientific evidence that matter was evolved from pre-existing and eternal energy, and is still in process of evolving. And some recent experiments in chemistry and physics have given vitality to the belief that matter may be destroyed, and that certain states and conditions of it are continually passing away. That atoms are not ultimate, but compounds; and while the chemical stability of the atomic unit is persistent, and reliable as a working hypothesis, yet certain phases of matter seem to divide and sub-divide the atom, and the end is not yet. But all of this need not disturb the general idea which the author is aiming to illustrate. The purpose of the author in these classifications and illustrations seems clearly to be to draw lines of distinction between the sources of our knowledge, and to emphasize the importance of personal experience. This agrees perfectly with the claims of Spiritualists. Direct personal contact with nature, through our senses is, he insists, the ONLY MEANS BY WHICH WE KNOW ANYTHING; and to this Spiritualists will, I think, unanimously agree. But the author does not ignore the value of other helpful sources to guide us on our upward way. No one person can be a witness to all of the splendid achievements of science, or the experiences of human evolution along the upward leading lines of destiny that have molded into advancing types and slowly improving individualities the cosmic elements of nature. But we may all share the revelations that genius has evoked, and profit by the luminous testimony of science, as if we had each and all been personal factors in the fields of all discovery.

The author says: "Things we assume to know are in general, the discoveries and demonstrations of science, the data of history, the deductions of philosophy, and the great body of Spiritual Revelations." I find more in this chapter than can be included in this letter, without extending it beyond proper limits for a single issue of The Progressive Thinker, and will therefore leave it for the next writing. I wish to condense as much as is consistent with a thorough review, and make all clear to the general reader. The questions involved are of the highest interest to every Spiritualist who cares to know of life here and hereafter, and wants to profit by all the attainable knowledge that makes sure the foundations of faith and the demands of Nature that hold infinite promise in the guidance of truth.

THE GREAT WORK.

Words of Appreciation From J. C. Shafter.

To the Editor:—"Many men of many minds" might be paraphrased to read "Many books of many kinds," and in this multiplicity of number and kind, who shall help us to choose except it be those who have read, studied and enjoyed.

Regarding the new and delightful book, "The Great Work," which has been noticed in several ways in your paper for thinking people, may I add a word, as I believe it to be worthy of more than ordinary attention, for it is a book based on logic and reason, and not simply common sense, but uncommon good sense. It is a book which bears the STAMP OF TRUTH on every page, and is evidently the work of a man who has "made good" along the lines of thought and action on which he claims to know. It is a book which will last, because it appeals to "the progressive intelligence of the age" to whom it is addressed; because to read it is to be lifted into a higher condition of consciousness, and thereby be made a nobler, better and truer man. It is a book written along the lines of love and devotion to all that is GOOD AND PURE. It gives the key to many religious and scientific puzzles which have perplexed many a thoughtful man and earnest student. It is a book not simply to be read and laid aside, but one to be studied and lived. It gives in a practical way the key to the method of practice which will enable any with an earnest desire, to begin NOW to "live the life" about which so much has been written and so little has been told. I wish I might place a copy of the whole series of "Harmonics" of which this is Vol. III, in the hands of every thinking, aspiring soul.

The Unknown Life of Christ.

A New edition of the Unknown Life of Christ is just from the press, and we are able to supply all demands. For the benefit of new subscribers we have added thereto two remarkable lectures, one by Prof. Henry S. Olcott, and the other by Miss Elizabeth Harlow, on the "Dangers of Psychism," a very valuable, attractive and instructive addition to this excellent book, and which should be carefully read by every Spiritualist, investigator and occult student in the land. This book is gotten up in fine style, and the additions thereto will enable it to serve a double purpose. It is still sent out as an absolute gift to all who send in $1.00 for The Progressive Thinker one year, and 10 cents in stamps to pay postage on the book.

Annual Convention

—AND—

Mid-Winter Mass Meeting

—OF THE—

ILLINOIS STATE SPIRITUALIST ASSOCIATION

At Handel Hall, 40 Randolph St., Chicago.

Opening Tuesday evening, February 19th, and continuing all day Wednesday and Thursday, Feb'y 20th and 21st.

Business Session Wednesday Morning at 10 o'clock. Good Speakers; Excellent Message Mediums; and a Rare Musical Program, directed by Mrs. Carrie Crawford Pierce, at all Afternoon and Evening sessions. Remember—Come—Bring your friends. Watch for Programs.

IMPORTANT.

Spiritualists of Illinois Take Notice!

The annual meeting of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association will take place on the morning of Wednesday, February 20, at 10 o'clock, in the Blue Parlor on the third floor of Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street, Chicago.

The Annual Mid-Winter Mass Meeting or Convention of the State Association will also take place at Handel Hall, beginning Tuesday evening, February 19, and continuing through Wednesday and Thursday, day and evening sessions.

Noted Speakers and Mediums from neighboring states have been engaged for the occasion, and will be assisted by many of Chicago's best mediums.

The musical part of the program will be in charge of Mrs. Carrie Crawford Pierce, a noted and prominent singer and teacher of music in Chicago; thus assuring the Convention of the sweetest harmony in musical vibration.

Societies auxiliary to the State Association should bear in mind that the membership per capita tax dues must be paid to the secretary (Dr. H. A. Cross) on or before the morning of February 20, to entitle them to delegate representation at the annual meeting, when reports of officers and the election of officers for the ensuing year will take place.

H. A. CROSS.
Secretary Illinois State Spiritualists' Association.

NOTICE TO SINGERS.

All persons gifted with a good voice for singing, who, for the cause of Spiritualism, will volunteer their services for the three evenings of the convention of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, to take place in the large auditorium of Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street, Chicago, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Feb. 19, 20 and 21, are very cordially invited to attend a rehearsal for a grand chorus for each of the three evenings named. The rehearsal will take place on the 5th floor of Handel Hall on the evenings of Wednesday and Saturday, Feburary 6th and 9th, at 7:45 o'clock. Your friends are invited to come with you to this rehearsal. The music will be furnished you free of all expense. MRS. C. C. PIERCE,
General Director.

DR. A. J. DAVIS.

For special reasons, hereafter made known, we will cease for a time to secure subscribers for a full set of the remarkable books written by the great seer, Dr. Davis.

OLD SPIRITUALISTS PASSING AWAY.

"All Hail to the Workers of the Past, and Cordial Support and Encouragement to the Workers of the Present, but the Spiritualists Who Are Convinced, Satisfied and Who Attend no Meetings and Give no Help, Are Hardly Worth the Name of Spiritualist."—Letter From a Prominent Lecturer.

Although Modern Spiritualism has done a splendid work during the little more than half century of its existence, and its liberalizing effects are manifest everywhere, especially in the trend and class of thought taught by the modern church preacher, the old workers and those who made their work possible are rapidly going on, and the question naturally arises, what is the future of the cause, as a movement, to be? Within a year I have been called upon to officiate at the funerals of five of the oldest and most prominent Spiritualists of Willimantic, among them being George W. Burnham, long known as the father of Spiritualism in Connecticut, three more in Norwich, and two in New London; and now comes the word that Moses Hull has gone on to his reward, Sarah Byrnes having preceded him by a few months. Where are the young people to take the places of these aggressive, honest, courageous workers of the past? And they were aggressive, because they had to be. When I think of the burden they had to bear, of the courage they manifested, of the scorn, villification and contempt which as standard-bearers of an unpopular cause, they boldly faced and overcame, as a speaker of to-day I feel a deep debt of gratitude to all the early workers, lecturers, mediums and laymen. And we are told, and I believe, that their work will be carried on by them from the invisible shore. Well, it will if we find them the material to work with, and to work through, and in order to do so, WE MUST PAY MORE ATTENTION TO THE YOUNG PEOPLE; we must encourage lyceum work if we want to perpetuate Spiritualism as a Cause, "THE CAUSE" for which they dared all and gave all. ALL HAIL to the workers of the past, and cordial support and encouragement to the WORKERS of the present, but the Spiritualists who are convinced, satisfied, and attend no meetings, and give no help, are hardly WORTH THE NAME of Spiritualist.

A MASS-MEETING

Of Special Importance to Spiritualists.

The Spiritualists of Wisconsin are to hold a mass-meeting in Milwaukee, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 8, 9 and 10. The Friday evening meeting will be at the St. Charles Hotel, in the hall they have on the first floor. The St. Charles Hotel is on East Water street. The other services will be held in the Severance Hall, No. 421 Milwaukee street, Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon at half-past two; evening at quarter of eight. Dr. G. B. Warne of Chicago, and John W. Ring of Crystola, Colo., are to be the speakers. The Friday evening meeting will consist of short speeches by Miss Loebel, secretary, and others. A most interesting and enjoyable time is expected. G. H. BROOKS,
President.

New York State Association Mass-Meeting.

A fine programme is being arranged by the officers of the state association for the three-days meeting they are to hold at Elks Hall, 59th street and Columbus Circle, New York City, on February 14, 15 and 16. Among the eminent speakers and mediums who are to assist, are Mrs. Helen M. Russegue, Mrs. Margaret Gaule Reidinger, Mr. Geo. Fuller, Mrs. Nellie Brigham, Mrs. Henry Newton, H. W. Richardson and others. The lectures and spirit messages will be interspersed with beautiful soul-inspiring music under the direction of Madam Voight of New York City.

H. W. RICHARDSON,
East Aurora, N. Y. President.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

What Is Faith, and How Shall We Use It?

A Discourse Delivered Through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Sunday, November 25, 1906.

Perhaps there has never been a word more abused or more misused in the English or any other language than the word faith.

Love has been greatly misused, liberty has been abused and misused, but faith has had more subtle, unmeaning and more deliberate insults than almost any other word in the English language.

Faith, as defined by Paul, is "the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things unseen." That makes it a very inoffensive word.

Theology has insisted upon belief being faith, and has mistaken its various forms of beliefs for true faith. You must subscribe to this or that, or other belief; yet faith the redeeming quality always in the mind and spirit.

The agnostic and materialist have accused faith of being "blind," "unreasoning," and all that sort of thing, so familiar to those who understand the phraseology of agnosticism and materialism. Yet there is not one human being who could exist for an instant of time without faith. This boasted "natural law," which they have hard work in separating from intelligence, they have faith in; they have faith in their community, faith in one another, or they could not breathe. You destroy faith in banks—which is rapidly being destroyed—and there would be no commerce. Destroy faith in one another and you could not exist here for an instant.

"The substance of things unseen." Perhaps there is not a more invisible thing than abstract mathematics. Every high mathematical problem is a mental process, in the solving of it; the measurement of the stars, the distance of suns, every thing of that kind is mental. Until you know and have faith in mathematics, you cannot build a house, yet you decry faith as blind, mistaking it for belief. Faith is the flowering out of the spiritual knowledge of the world. It is the blossom of all that you know concerning the realm unseen, yet palpable.

Without other evidence than that of the senses there is no real knowledge. The evidence of the spirit is a great deal stronger evidence than that of the senses. You go to the prestidigitator's conjuring performance and he will make you doubt everything you see, simply because your senses deceive you. That which you see ordinarily is not only colored by your mental state, but by the limitations of the senses. If you have imperfect vision, which most of you have, no two see anything just alike. The whole process of deciding the reality, even of material phenomena, is a mental process; and the process of deciding between right and wrong, between the absolute principles of the universe is entirely a process beyond the senses and beyond reason.

You must know a thing thoroughly before you can reason upon it. You must have faith in it before you can use your reason upon it at all. Faith is born of knowledge, and knowledge comes from within. Therefore, the great lesson of true work and true spirituality is faith. Spiritualists, after they have the physical phenomena, think they have the foundations for belief, but when they have spiritual and mental evidence they have knowledge, and upon that all their faith in the future life is based. Yet, even so exalted a poet as Shelley railed against faith, because he mistook it; he mistook faith and its work for the belief in the theology of the day; yet no one had greater faith in all the exalted powers and forces of the universe than he.

The entire structure of the universe as revealed by astronomy is based upon this inner knowledge which could never be demonstrated to the senses. Just think how long it would take to count a million; just think how long it would take to count a billion, yet you can state the distances of planets in millions, billions and trillions of miles from this globe. You can solve the positions of these heavenly bodies by that process of faith which mathematics has given to the mind. When the spirit is just as certain of spiritual truth as the mind is of mathematics the entire problems of life are solved.

There are no two truths concerning any one thing. People talk about truth as though it were a graded school and the arrival at it is by a gradual process. Primal truths are just as certain as the bases of mathematics. There are no two systems of ethics. The truth is, that what is absolutely true in the realm of the spirit is always true. It is true for every age and clime, and conditions and class of people. "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another." There are no gradations. Some people love some people "worse" than they do others (as the little spirit control of one of our friends expresses it) which sometimes seems like hatred.

Love is the one affirmative, the one postulate. Wisdom is what shall be done, the love is that which perceives. There are no two ways of construing the Golden Rule. For instance, every effort of society, creed and dogma, and worldly-mindedness is simply not to construe it at all, not to "do unto others as you would that they should unto you." The acceptance of it as the highest standard of human ethics is because every nation beneath the sun has accepted it in some form of statement or other. The principle being the same in the far Orient: "Feel toward others as you would that they should feel toward you." Of course, if you feel right you will do right. So the essential principles of Christianity are right feeling and the right state of mind. But it is in this just like it is with the last ones who have new thoughts of truth thinking they have discovered it, the truth. Of course, every time one arrives at the state of perceiving a primal principle, that one thinks he is the "discoverer" of it. This is why there are so many "discoveries" of the truths of nature. This is why there is so much discussion of the priority of one or another in the discovery of a new planet. This is why there is often a dispute about a principle in science, as to who discovered it first.

But the question is not as to priority: Truth is prior. And the mind that is here on earth attempting to solve the problems of life, cannot solve them by anything less than the truth in relation to those problems. You have discovered that in mathematics, but you will not admit it in social science or in government. A government based absolutely upon individual liberty has never been fulfilled, for two reasons: One is there has never been a government founded upon it, and the other, and more important one, is that there are no people ready to avail themselves of it if there was such a government. Because absolute liberty means the absolute recognition of the rights of every other living soul. So when you have faith in freedom it is because you have knowledge that freedom can only come with the greatest enlightenment.

What the Russians are struggling for over there, and what they will obtain, is the measure of liberty or freedom that the oppression of the past, by contrast, makes them think is the perfect independence that they seek. Which, of course, thousands and millions are not ready to enjoy. But the great light of freedom that was set across the ocean more than a century ago has reached those nations of the East and caused them to seek to find, and to illustrate also the same light of freedom. What a beacon fire was this that Columbia placed before all the world! What a light, what a white light, was this!

If humanity did not have faith in the ultimate freedom, in the ultimate knowledge to humanity that freedom brings, there would be no such conditions as there now are in Russia. People say: "Why, they are doing nothing over there; all this talk about Russian freedom is a dream." Don't you believe it! They are doing more in their preparation than other nations have done in precipitating their revolutions. This great tide of thought will never go backward. No one knows so well as the poor prisoner (the Czar) in his palace what it means when these fires are set free within the mind to burn away the dross of despotism.

People talk about faith as "servitude" and "bondage." They do not know what they are talking about. It illuminates, it sets free all the attributes of the spirit in the realms of the spirit. "Thy faith hath made thee whole," Jesus said to the one who was ill and who simply touched his garments, or who simply called upon his name. "Thy faith hath made thee whole. I did not do it." This healing power that he possessed is in accordance with the divine plan. Whenever you set your faculties in harmonious action with this healing power, you must be healed. There is not only the direct action on you to heal you, which does not often succeed, but there is the conjunction of two requisites necessary; one is readiness to receive, and the other the power to give.

When anyone would be made whole by the healing power the first condition is readiness to receive, and it does not make any difference, even if it is the bread pills of the family doctor, you will be cured by them because you have placed yourself in harmony with the healing power. No class of people know better than the doctors, the experienced physicians, how little value there is in materia medica, and how much value there is in the conditions of faith in the mind of the patient. This is why many doctors prefer to take their own medicine with them instead of leaving a prescription; and this is why they want laws to "protect the practice of medicine," because in a little while there will be no business for druggists. What will be the value of a five years' study in a medical college, if some one is to come in here and tell you you will certainly be healed if you place yourself in accordance with the laws of healing? Then what of those laws, physical laws, hygienic laws, fresh air plants, good food plants, good exercise plants, if the adjustment of the spirit with the body is all there is to healing? All healing is adjustment. Sometimes it is done by a shock, sometimes it is done by a beneficent look of kindness, sometimes it is the beaming presence of the family physician with a little colored water in a bottle for you to take, sometimes it is one thing or another; but whatever the power is, it is because of your faith: the knowledge that the spirit can be adjusted to the habitation, the mechanism that it uses, and that knowledge, the more it opens up these higher chambers of the mind, the more is the power of that knowledge possible.

Faith is like a "grain of mustard seed." If you have had to contend with the wild mustard as the farmer has, you know where it once gets started there is no such thing as destroying it; it is worse than thistles. That little grain of mustard seed is precisely like faith. With true faith you can move mountains. Now mountains are not all material, but there was a very large (physically) lady in London who was a very good medium for the physical phenomena. She was often levitated in her seance room, and when once, as proven by the positive evidence of many reputable witnesses, she was borne rapidly from one place in London to another place two or three miles distant, it was called the "transit of Venus" by the daily newspapers. Was not that moving a mountain? So if you can place yourself in accordance with that law of faith in the unseen and invisible forces of the universe there is no more trouble in moving a mountain than there is in moving a table.

But it is not intended that these invisible forces shall do your physical work for you. Although in the house of Dr. Phelps, (the father of the Andover Phelps who denounced Spiritualism) more things were done than Hamlet ever dreamed of in his philosophy, things were carried by invisible powers from one room to another; dishes were brought from the kitchen into the dining-room, and articles of furniture were brought from other rooms into the parlor. But just as soon as the ministers came to pray it out of the house, of course, the family had to move. All this unseen force was a ministering power. Dr. Phelps had read the Bible enough to know that these things could be.

Now the reactionists. There are always reactionists in every movement. The reactionists are making people doubt whether there are any real genuine manifestations or not. You do not create faith by going into a bank and telling the cashier, "I believe you are a fraud; I think you are going to steal my money, but I want you to take it and give me an account book." That is not the way to establish confidence. Yet it is the usual way that people seek to investigate what they call spiritual phenomena. The attitude of the self-styled investigator is the attitude of the pre-determined doubter. Now we have not said this for the first time to-day; we said it twenty, thirty years ago. There is not a more unfortunate state of mind than the state usually described as the chronic "investigator," except it be the musical or dramatic critic of the daily press. But these states of mind do not affect the thing that is investigated. Because there is a different realm that takes a different reasoning process.

If a man is going to sail on the ocean and has only a sail boat he must measurably adapt himself to the winds and tides. Of course he has great faith in his craft, he knows how it is built, he understands the favoring winds and tides, he knows the dangers of the shores. But when it is a steam boat he does not have to be so careful about winds, or tides. By and by, when he goes in a boat propelled by still more subtle forces of nature, like electricity or those finer forces of ethers there will be still less need of heeding the winds and tides.

Now what has telepathy to do with winds and tides?

When the power of the spirit is let loose upon the world, through these spiritual forces, there is no limit to its power. But it is not coming to express its power by your rules, but by its own rules, its own methods. When Mr. Crookes, now Sir William Crookes, was investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism in his own house through the mediumship of Miss Florence Cook, he said the object of his investigations was to pursue the scientific methods, that he would dictate what the conditions should be, but he discovered, whenever he allowed the powers producing the manifestations to do them their own way, he had more perfect manifestations, and under better "test conditions" that he could have arranged. Which means, that if you place yourself in accord with the intelligences that know how to govern substance, substance will be obedient to you.

But, you ask, "cannot an investigator have any test conditions? Can he not be guaranteed that the manifestation will be genuine?" If you are intelligent enough to be called an investigator, your intelligence ought to teach you when you have good proof. So it is not a question of fraud at all, any more than real bank notes are a question of counterfeits. It is a question of faith in the powers unseen having larger influence and wider knowledge than you have. Now when you place yourself in accordance with those forces you have faith in their power. It is not "blind credulity;" it is not "belief" simply, it is not asking about your speculations or 'Change expecting a correct and profitable answer. But it is all the forces of the universe bent to the invisible power of that intelligence. When you are in accord with that your body is not only healed, but your mind is strengthened and secure.

This is why we have said that such a thing as the demonstration of immortality by mental methods or by the senses is an absurd proposition. Immortality is a perception; if you had it demonstrated every day it would be in time and sense, and would only be good for that day. But the real demonstration comes from within, and the perception that knows this, is able to judge of the manifestations that prove it. That is the only real kind of evidence, and that is from within the soul.

We knew of a certain learned man who was called upon to witness a demonstration of some unusual force in science in Boston; we think it was electricity. When he was asked to be present, he asked what he might expect to see as the result of the demonstration? Meaning that he wished to prepare his mind by knowing what he was expected to witness. An entire ignoramus on the subject might not know what was demonstrated when he saw it. So we do not think people are qualified to investigate psychic phenomena, as they call them, unless they have some mental and spiritual preparation. You cannot demonstrate to a materialist a spiritual proposition. You must educate his mind first. You can demonstrate unseen forces, but he will stop there, as all such minds do until the Psychic Research Society compels them to go one step further in the line of unseen and unknown forces in nature. But they HAVE NOT INTELLIGENCE ENOUGH TO KNOW INTELLIGENCE WHEN IT IS MANIFEST. If at either end of every telegraphic instrument there is no intelligence sending the message, or no intelligence receiving it, there would not be much use in the telegraph system. Wherever in the universe, whether from spirits within or out of the body, a message is sent and the message is received it shows that there is the same kind of intelligence sending and receiving the message.

So we go back to the primal point of faith, which is knowledge, that the universe is just as full of unseen, impalpable forces as it is of the visible manifestations of those forces. That all forces of the universe are unseen, the manifestation only is visible, and the manifestation is very often entirely unlike the force that produces it.

What people are most in need of, is not "blind credulity," nor simply "belief" that such and such things occur, or can occur, but FAITH IN THE IMMUTABLE SPIRITUAL FORCES OF THE UNIVERSE. Faith that they will do their work and fulfill their purposes according to the spiritual needs of the universe, and that when those spiritual intelligences through spiritual forces are manifested to the inhabitants of earth they manifest, taking the initiative because you do not know how to do it; and they manifest according to your needs, not at all according to your desires, very seldom according to your wishes; but according to your needs.

When the great spiritual movement was let loose upon the world sixty years ago it was when there was recognition that the faith of the inhabitants of earth had been trifled with; that theology had made people blind and deaf. And there was recognition through that faith that something higher and more perfect was needed. There had been the preparation through the liberal line of thought that had come down through the Quakers, the Shakers, the Unitarians and Universalists, and the light of the spiritual fires had never been quenched. When the new statement was needed here it came. It was not given to any human being to decide how it should come. If the "investigators" of the "Rochester Knockings" had placed themselves in accordance with the forces producing the manifestations, as they do with other things in nature, instead of the sapient conclusion of the Buffalo doctors that the rappings were caused by the "snapping of the toe joints" of the mediums, there would have been a more commensurate understanding of them. But it simply proved the lack of capability to conceive of spiritual manifestations through matter, so that was the only answer the Buffalo doctors could give.

Now faith as "the evidence of things unseen" includes all possible manifestations, includes every kind of demonstration when needed, not when demanded, not when called for capriciously. When Prof. Tyndall, after a derision of "faith cure," made the proposition to have one ward in the hospital set apart for the scientific methods, to prove the fallacy of the former, he was issuing a direct challenge to the invisible powers. Since when have divine forces been fighting duels? Or been responding to challenges as in the prize ring? This was a scientist's challenge to the spiritual forces of the universe: "I do not believe in you! I do not believe in healing by the power of the spirit! If you can do it, do it!" Of course, whatever the result was, we believe this proposition was rejected by the authorities, people have been cured by faith from time immemorial.

We well know that faith sets in motion all those forces of the universe that, according to human needs, will illustrate the power and ability of the healing of the spirit. We do not say that every individual prayer for every individual case would be answered, but we say that the healing forces of the universe are for the individual that is to be restored. We know this faith includes also the other side of the proposition, that some lives must go, that the next step of life is just as important as this step, and if you have the full measure of faith you will be able to grasp this proposition. There are plenty of people who have faith as long as things go the way they want them to, and how pleased they are to pat themselves on the shoulder and say, "I had faith." But let the shadows come, let there be a turn in the tide of fortune, let friends be taken out of their human sight and they rebel. But it is true faith that sees through the shadows, that extends beyond the walls of human life, and knows that the life beyond is the greater life. That is the faith that uplifts, glorifies and sets free. There must be no limit, no qualifications.

The "facts" of the universe prevent Love and Faith from doing their work. They (facts) are like mosquitoes: You live in a beautiful place, there are lovely gardens, and magnificent groves, but you cannot go out in the evenings on account of the mosquitoes. So your faith is always qualified by some little mosquito, or something in some other shape has limited your full belief or measure of knowledge in the absolute Love and Wisdom of the unseen yet palpable powers of the universe; the Love and Wisdom of God. Do you suppose that this little shadow that you are under has anything to do with that Love? Do you suppose that that love is diminished? You might as well say that the rain upon the very flowers that need rain is evidence of a lack of wisdom.

We assure you, that there is room in the vast and wonderful pavilions of the skies, not only for all the worlds and systems that move harmoniously there, but for all souls and all lives to the fulfillment of all that they need. And the unquestioning knowledge that everything in the universe, not only can become, but is governed by the Love and Wisdom that is supreme. That when you want to know it, and when you have arrived at the condition to appreciate it, you have but to set your face toward the light, and unfold the thoughts that reach in the direction that you wish knowledge, and there is at once the indication of this realm and of those forces that you would employ, and employ in accordance with that realm.

Whosoever seeks to unlock the storehouse of the kingdom of the spirit for mere selfish human ends will always fail. Whosoever seeks to unlock those powers of the spiritual universe for selfish greed and aggrandizement will fail. Whoever places himself or herself in accordance with those powers for the highest good of the greatest number of souls will always succeed, even though Calvary awaits him or her, even though the outer world persecutes and derides.

The Sermon on the Mount and the Golden Rule, the words of Confucius and Zoroaster, and of all Oriental philosophers and sages shine out through the night-time of the earth and the world is redeemed by them.

We have faith in these divine principles! Only by placing oneself in accordance with the Divine, can one know the limitless powers of the Divine.

What Is Coming.

Prophecies Concerning the Future of Earth and Man.

The world will soon come to an end, the heaven will take its place, when people understand the visions and wisdom given them of Spirits from far off planets. This will be arranged before the ending of the year 1925.

Whether or not the above prophecy will become a fact will be when the said time has passed. Most people will naturally think it to be impossible; but I have faith in it and will give some reasons why:

Things are to a person what they may impress upon his mind. Some man may take a stone into his hand and examine it, still by his best effort to search for its character, he can see no more about it than simply that it is a stone. Some other man may take the same stone, and to him it will unfold a history of creation, for it was formed as a gas out of the densest known substance, through its countless changes into its present stage, and he may continue to follow its stages up, see it pulverized into sand, where it may serve the plants for nourishment, and from plants it may go into and become a part of man's body.

The white race of people have, in a general way, through many generations accepted the words in the bible as the only authoritative description of heaven and earth, wherefore I will, for convenience sake, analyze my theory from that standpoint.

The same word may have different meanings to different people, and there is possibly no other word that conveys so many flimsy ideas as the word "Heaven" does. The orthodox believe it to be a place, located above the clouds, where some Almighty spirit is sitting on a throne of gold, with Jesus on his right side, where they are blessing or condemning the souls of the dead people, and whatsoever judgment it may please them to pass upon them, so their conditions shall be forever.

More liberal-minded people have arrived at the conclusion that the word Heaven means a peaceful and pleasant state of the mind, which in a way is to change the old that they cannot comprehend, into a shape where it suits their tastes. However this may be, it appears to be the more reasonable and substantial of the two.

Anything is to a person what it appears to him to be. This can not be contradicted, therefore the orthodox heaven is vanishing fast, because there are comparatively few people that in our days believe there is such a place, and those that do believe it are not counted among the brightest scholars. It is, however, a subject that requires much carefulness for anyone to affirm or deny.

If on the other hand, we accept the heaven to be a state of mind, then all there is to be done is to change the minds of the people on the earth into a state of peace and happiness, thus we have the earth shaped into a heaven.

The above theories can only be considered as parables, as they contain no sound foundation, and still they are factors that cannot be omitted.

The conception of a personal God is not without a foundation, although it has been misrepresented and misconstrued. We must admit that in all that is, there is but one principle life energy and we can reason out that the same power that is creating life on the earth, is also creating the lives upon all other planets, without exceptions to the distance they are from it. To personify this power, we must see it as a unit of individualized matter, defined and outlined within certain limits, although thereby its almightiness and omnipresence vanishes.

To describe this we have to deal with one of the greatest problems that can be laid before us, and yet it can be made very simple, when we do not go into too many details.

Any individual life consists of an organization of matter, and each has its own peculiar organization. There is one thing in common with all lives, and that is the life energy, also called spirit; this is the only true life. All manifestations of life are the doings of the one life force.

The life force is invisible to men; but its presence is manifested in uncountable ways: that is, the real life force does not manifest; but the material that it works upon, which still is invisible. The best known form of that is magnetism, and we will use it for this illustration as if it was the real, and say that magnetism is the cause of attraction and repulsion, attraction and repulsion is the cause for motion, and motion causes chemical changes of matter; this is all that creation consists of, and everything from the very smallest to the very largest is subject to that law.

As stated before, every individualized life has its own peculiarity which can easiest be distinguished by classifying them into plants and animals, and call all that is fastened to the earth by their roots for plants, and all that move about for animals.

All lives have come from the same source, and consequently have belonged to the same class; but have in time been shaped according to climatic conditions, which have made them grow into different classes.

As climatic conditions mainly have been the cause for the variations of forms outward, so it serves to cultivate the intellectuality inward. It is easy to se the different appearance of people who have been reared under different climates, and not only their outside look, but also their characters and abilities are much different.

As the climate changes from season to season, so it also changes year after year. There is a vast difference of the climatic conditions of the earth. If we could prove how it was a million years ago and then compare it to the present. The climatic conditions of a million years ago were only fit for rude kinds of animals and plants; eruptions were so frequent all over that even they had a hard time to keep alive.

All planets have their ages and changes, which goes on from birth to death, or from when they begin to form until they are entirely dissolved. If you, by the aid of reason can accept this as a fact, then, too, you will be able to understand that planets differ in climatic conditions. Some of the planets are many times larger than ours and some are considerably smaller. The size and age of a planet does not, any more than of a man, determine its character or its climatic condition.

Although the climatic conditions influence a man and to some extent shape his character, it is not a certainty by which to determine his ability and desire; because men do bodily inherit their character from their parents; but their spiritual and mental environment is inherited partly from their relatives of former generations and also from strangers, either spirits from this world or from some other planets, which purpose to serve as guardian angels. The spiritual influence, more than anything else, leads men to their destinations. The spirits are very determined and jealous of the man that they take upon themselves to guide through his earthly life.

The character of a spirit cannot be determined by what planet he has lived upon as a man. There are many spirits who have seen the growing up and the dissolution of several planets, without having the least recollection thereof, and many spirits do not even know that they at some time have been human beings.

A long life is not an eternal life; at one time those very spirits, who now have no recollection of themselves, were very bright; but the quality to maintain and to grow were not in them, therefore in time they will be dissolved into the eternal whole. From that you may see that inspirations are of very widely different character, ranging from the very least of intellectuality to the very highest standpoints of cultivation.

Those spirits who have the quality in them to maintain and to grow, and the more of that quality the better are their chances, they are the ones that should be consulted, and the only ones to take any advice from.

Their character is peculiar compared with all other grades: first, they have sympathy for everybody, wherefore they know of no special sympathy for anyone in particular; but are always ready to teach and help all whom they come in contact with, and do that to the interest of all, their object being to lift as many of humanity up to their standard as possible. By their superior knowledge they have the reins of most things in their hands, and lead as well what is called bad as what is called good; they work all with the one object in view, to elevate mankind.

The earth has so far produced very few men with that quality in them, and for that reason there are not so many who will understand us; but the time is at hand when the truth can be uncovered, and therefore we have commenced that part of the work.

Remarkable Invention.

"Actina" A Scientific Appliance for Relieving Defective Eyesight—Has a Record of Many Marvelous Cures.

If your eyesight is defective or you have some form of eye trouble which endangers your eyesight, you should lose no time in investigating "Actina." It is an instrument to be applied directly over the eyes and its potent action stimulates and maintains the circulation of the blood, thereby removing congestion and assisting nature to repair the defects and restore the eyesight to its normal condition. Hundreds of people owe the restoration of their eyesight to "Actina." Among them are the following:

Prof. T. S. Sligh, Mansfield, La.
Rev. J. M. Foster, Burton, Wash.
Rev. W. C. Goodwin, Moline, Kan.
Gen. Alex. Hamilton, Tarrytown, N. Y.
Rev. C. Brunner, Bridgeport, Conn.
Dr. Jas. H. Bell, 225 Perrine St., Dayton, O.
Mrs. S. A. Donnelly, Agt. U. S. Secret Service, Louisville, Ky.

Nine out of ten persons wearing spectacles might better be without them. Strengthen the eye by improving the circulation and it will not require an artificial lens. If you are interested and desire to know what the "Actina" is and what it is accomplishing, write to-day for our FREE TRIAL OFFER and OUR BOOK, TREATISE ON DISEASE. STARTLING FACTS,

OR

Deeds of Darkness Disclosed

This work devotes special attention to Auricular Confession and its relations to sacerdotal celibacy, convents, monasteries, morality and civil and religious liberty. It is intended to be an embodiment of facts and documentary evidence of the pernicious influence of the confessional; a trenchant showing up of Romanism, based upon standard Catholic authorities; an eye-opener concerning the methods and spirit, the moral turpitude and evil works of Romanism. Cloth, 75 cents.

There is not a dull page in either of these books, but each is a galaxy of the bright minds of the day and throw a new light on the Bible teachings relating to woman. Price of each, paper, 50 cents.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end it is chockful of stirring incidents. Price of this large volume, only $1.50 postpaid.

OGEANIDES

A Psychical Novel.—Price Paper, Cover, 50 Cents.

This great novel is written with a distinct purpose, to set forth certain phases of spirit life and experience, as related to the gifted and inspired author. The question of soul mates or of the united male and female constituting the completed ego or angel, is advanced as a vital truth of spirit experience in the higher realms. The work radiates a good spiritual influence, and is very interesting.

It is a spiritual book for Spiritualists, and interesting for everyone.

MARY ANNE CAREW

Wife, Mother, Spirit, Angel.—Neat Cloth Cover, Price $1.00.

This great work relates the experiences of a young wife and mother, early called to the portals of death. It is very realistic, and the narrative is charmingly natural, and beautiful in its tone of sweetness. It brings that other world very near to us; the comfort it brings to those bereaved of the dear ones of the home and family, is beyond one's power to describe. All readers will be charmed with it as well as spiritually aided and uplifted.

The Nemesis of Chautauqua Lake { This fascinating Book by the well-known Author and Scholar,

HON. A. B. RICHMOND,

Should be in the hands of every Spiritualist in the land. It is based on a historical fact, but through the narrative is woven a psychic line of thought in the style so natural to the great criminal lawyer that one can feel the author's very presence during its perusal. It is certainly interesting. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

A. F. Hill writes from Boston, Mass.: "Isetta B. Sears, Spiritual Evangelist, will hold services Sundays, 7:30 p. m. in Arcade Hall, 7 Park Square, to be aided by musicians, speakers and other good talent. We intend to continue these services till May, 1907, or to the end of the season."

On Sunday, January 27, Oscar A. Edgerly concluded a very successful month's engagement at Ayer's Spiritual Temple, Boston, Mass. On Sunday, February 3, Mr. Edgerly will begin a month's engagement with the First Church of Spiritualists, of Pittsburg, Pa.

Prize Masquerade Ball, given by the First German Spiritualist Society, at Gartelman's Hall, Corner Ashland avenue and 18th street, Saturday evening, February 16, 1907. Tickets, 25 cents a person. Given for the benefit of the Spiritual Old Home.

A Lamon writes from Cincinnati, Ohio: "The Lamon anniversary was celebrated Tuesday afternoon, January 22, at the home of Mrs. Hobelman, in Cincinnati. A dainty lunch of fruit and wedding cake was served. The psychic and musical demonstrations were highly appreciated. A Thomas Paine Memorial was held on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 29, at the home of Mrs. A. E. Kibby. It proved an interesting meeting. Chocolate and bon bons were served. Both affairs were arranged by Mrs. Dr. Lamon as a 'good-bye' to her Cincinnati friends."

Prof. Bearse writes from Wichita, Kansas: "One month made a change for the betterment of the cause of Spiritualism in this rapidly growing city. Hundreds who had not taken any interest in its phenomena or philosophy, now desire a better acquaintance. It is being talked of in the home, at the shops, and in the offices. In fact the name of Max Hoffmann is now coupled with Peace, Hope, Love. The First Spiritual Society has just closed its engagement with Mrs. Margaret Vestal. Her audiences were invariably well informed people. The hall was packed to overflowing. The Winfield society desires her ministrations the coming month. We commend her to any society as a true medium."

Louie Stanton, secretary writes: "Just a word from St. Joseph, Mo. W. F. Peck finished a very successful engagement with the First Spiritualist Society, serving us for two months and a half, beginning in October. Great interest was manifested and goodly audiences always greeted him. He is a convincing and inspiring lecturer and won many friends while here, who will be glad when he can come to us again. Mr. W. C. Jessup, the well-known trumpet medium and also our president, followed Mr. Peck a few Sunday evenings with messages which were highly appreciated, every one being recognized. Burdens were lightened and hearts made glad by the realization that loved ones live and do communicate to their friends. Mr. John W. Ring of Crystola, Colo., is with us for this month and lucky we are to secure one so wonderfully talented. He is a young man of striking personality, and has a most convincing way of expounding the truth of the cause which he advocates. He at once won many admirers and friends, and he is drawing large crowds. We have rented the Unity church for our mid-week meetings, and are making them a question and message service, and great interest is being manifested. We hope to fill the new year with renewed efforts to make our little society one of the strongest in the state."

Lucy S. Carroll writes from Washington, Pa.: "We have held two very interesting public meetings in the hall on Chestnut street. E. B. Gillard of Pittsburg has charge of the meetings. People are well pleased with her good work. The Ladies' Spiritualist Social Union held their second anniversary at Mrs. Annie Berg's. Twenty ladies were present. Good music, fine decorations. Mrs. Berg is a fine hostess and a charming entertainer. After a recitation by Miss Laura Gatfield we were escorted into the dining-room where there was a table loaded with everything pleasing to the sight and taste. At a late hour we all wended our way homeward, saying it was good to be there. We meet every Thursday afternoon from 2 to 5, as an aid to the First Spiritual church of Washington. We have readings and talks on different subjects. We also keep the society together at times when we are unable to have public meetings."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "On Sunday day afternoon, January 27, the services of the First Society of Fraternal Order of Spiritualists were largely attended. The circles held at 4 o'clock are becoming popular, many well known mediums participating. Our suppers are tempting, and at 5 o'clock all went down stairs to do justice to well filled tables. Our congregational singing commences at 6:30 and is participated in by all. At 8 our concert is a strong feature as the numbers are rendered by artists of ability. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond addressed us in the evening and gave us many gems of thought. This gifted medium will favor us again on Sunday evening, Feb. 17, and you and your friends should avail yourselves of this opportunity. The Hon. Chas. E. Hughes will give us another interesting lecture, Sunday evening, Feb. 10, that will benefit all. We will soon hold a public initiatory service and all desiring to unite with us should see our financial secretary at the close of Sunday's services. One dollar pays for one year's membership in the most popular organization of its kind in existence. Be one of the first. Come up and see us anyway. The Fraternal Daughters, an auxiliary, meets in Atlas Hall, same building, first and third Wednesdays of each month, afternoons at 2; supper at 6:30; evening social, etc., at 8 o'clock."

John W. Ring writes: "I am pleasantly located in St. Joseph, Mo., at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Warren Snowden, 113 N. 18th st. The First Spiritualist Society is made up of a lovely class of people, all of whom assist in making my ministrations pleasant, and I trust beneficial. Our meetings are well attended. Mr. Wilson C. Jessup gives messages at each Thursday night meeting, and because of their accuracy they are well received. Mr. Jessup's trumpet seances during the week are well attended, and many are being convinced of spirit communication and cheered by comforting words received. February 9 and 10, I will be in Milwaukee, Wis., for a state mass-meeting; 12th and 13th, Muncie, Ind. I would like to lecture at near points."

T. J. McFerron writes: "As previously announced in the daily press, this morning's conference was turned into a memorial service in memory of our dearly beloved arisen brother, Moses Hull, the services being led by his old-time friend and co-worker, Will C. Hodge, than whom no other could have expressed more beautiful thoughts. Others followed with glowing tribute, not only to our brother, but to his beloved and loving companion, our Sister Mattie, as well, which made it a very interesting and entertaining meeting. In the evening that grand, energetic worker, Sister Adah Sheehan-Patterson, talked to a highly appreciative audience. Our large auditorium was packed to its utmost capacity. So you see the First Spiritualist Society of San Diego, Cal., still lives. Mrs. Patterson is to speak for us again on Feb. 3, 8, 9 and 10. There will be held in our Temple under the auspices of the California State Spiritualist Association, a three days mass convention, and the week following that Brother W. J. Colville is to take up a three weeks' course of lectures, which we know will be a great treat. So we of San Diego are rejoicing over the many good things coming our way, and wish that the friends of the cause everywhere may rejoice with us."

Samuel A. Huntington writes from Malden, Mass., of the Progressive Spiritual Society, Louise Hall, 138 Pleasant street. In my hastily written report of the turkey supper, held on the 10th inst., I unjustly omitted a very important part of the program, which was the presentation to the president, Mrs. F. S. Sheriff, of a very beautiful bible and gold pen, by the first vice-president, E. J. Patch, on behalf of the members and friends of the society, and her very feeling reply. Sunday services Jan. 27, 1907, the president presided at both sessions. Sisters Carter, Morton and Brother Dean occupied the session at 3 p. m. in giving messages. At 7:30 p. m. the evening meeting opened with praise, reading of scripture and invocation. Mrs. M. A. Bonney of Boston was the speaker and message bearer. She prefaced her work by reading a beautiful poem entitled, 'I Cannot Think of Them as Dead,' and chose the same for her theme, giving a very feeling and interesting address, after which she devoted an hour to giving many fine messages. Prof. Graham of Boston, will be the speaker on Sunday evening, Feb. 3, 1907, and Mr. Chas. L. Willis of Boston, Sunday evening, Feb. 10, 1907. The Rev. F. A. Wiggin will resume his work again for the society on Thursday evening, Feb. 21."

Mrs. A. E. Sheets, president of the Michigan State Spiritualists Association, will be present as one of the speakers, and chairwoman at the mass meeting to be held at Jackson, Mich., February 8, 9 and 10.

Correspondent writes from Rockford, Ill.: "The Psychical Research of Rockford, Ill., met with a severe disappointment in the failure, on account of depressing illness, of Mrs. Bloom, of Chicago, to fulfill her engagement for a lecture and messages, on Sunday evening January 26; but the fine audience was well compensated with home talent. President McDougal announced the sudden death at San Jose, Cal., of one of our ablest champions of Spiritualism, in the person of Moses Hull, identified with the cause from its very beginning. He was followed with an instructive account of the life work of our departed friend, by the secretary, Mrs. Howe. She read an inspired poem, well adapted to the occasion. Both speakers enlarged on their subject and followed with really fine addresses. Dr. Booth and Dr. Hammond each gave short but excellent discourses along the general lines of advanced thought. All the speakers were generously applauded by the intelligent audience. The society has a large development class under the supervision of Dr. Hammond. They assemble in the parlor of their hall at 6 p. m., of each Sunday, and continue in session until 7:30 o'clock, when they adjourn for the general meeting which immediately follows."

John L. Frisbie writes: "I cannot possibly get along without The Progressive Thinker, each number of which to a progressive mind is a feast of reason and a flow of soul. I want to know what the angels and those that are not angels are saying through its columns from week to week. Many single issues of the paper is worth the cost of a year's subscription; and ought to be taken and carefully read by every person of an inquiring mind along the line of the occult or otherwise."

First Society Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, Dr. Alex Caird, president. Services at Hygeia Hall, 406 Ogden avenue, corner Robey street. Every Sunday, afternoon 2:30; circles, 4; supper, 5; song service, 6:30; concert, 7; evening, 8. Talent for February—Speakers, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, 3rd and 17th; Hon. Chas. Hughes, 10th; Geo. B. Warne, M. D., 24th. Platform message mediums for 3rd and 17th, Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. Barbara Hilbert, Mrs. J. Staner-Adams, Mr. Chas. Thompson. For 10th and 24th, Mrs. Alice Sexsmith, Mrs. A. W. Bloom, Mrs. Henrietta Liehtig. Prof. Joseph Singer, musical director, Miss Marian Gordon, pianist. Mrs. Myrtle Haschke, soloist. Mr. Robert Fessler, bass soloist. "Fraternal Daughters, an auxiliary to the First Society Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, meet in Atlas Hall, same building, first and third Wednesdays of each month. Afternoon, 2; supper, 6:30; evening, 8. All mediums cordially invited to take part.

Boston Meetings.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society meets in Appleton Hall, 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass., every Friday.

The Ladies' Lyceum Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, Boston, Mass., every Wednesday.

The Ladies' Industrial Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, every Thursday.

Miss Ada M. Came writes from Cambridge, Mass.: "The Cambridge Spiritual Industrial Society held its regular meeting, Friday, January 25, when a fine audience assembled to listen to Mrs. Katie Ham, who was unable to be present, on account of sickness. The society, however, was able to obtain the services of Mrs. Mamie Helyett, who ably filled Mrs. Ham's place. This society holds its meetings the second and fourth Fridays of the month, in Cambridge Lower Hall, 631 Massachusetts avenue. Mrs. James Scarlett, a former member, and a well known lecturer, will be the speaker of the evening, Feb. 8."

Laura Cummings writes: "The annual meeting of the Spiritualist society of Hardwick, Vt., was held at the home of Mrs. Booth, Saturday, January 26, and the following officers were unanimously re-elected: Mr. C. T. Jennings, president; Mrs. M. V. Booth, first vice-president; Walter Noyes, second vice-president; Maurice Jennings treasurer; Mrs. Glen Booth, secretary; Mr. Geo. Hill chairman of the executive board, Mrs. Sarah Jennings, Mrs. Sarah Noyes, Mrs. Glen Booth assistants. A very harmonious element was appreciated by every one present, and a new impetus given to the work to be done here in town and elsewhere. The president, Mr. Jennings is an untiring worker in the cause, and is the right man in the right place. He is always ready to give the wheel of progress another turn and with the kind co-operation of the other officers we feel that a genuine old revival of the truth that Spiritualism embodies will come to the faithful ones in this town."

E. J. Trott writes from Hamilton, Mass.: "American Psychical Research Society, Harvey Redding, president. An inspirational lecture was given by the president on 'Be Ye Not Troubled.' Mr. Redding's subject are based upon scriptural selections. He is a forcible speaker, and held his audience in extreme silence and attentiveness. By request, Cyrus, the Persian (through his medium, Mr. Redding), recited a poem in the Persian language. Mr. Osgood F. Stiles, vice-president of the society, gave some fine tests. Mrs. Osgood F. Stiles gave messages that were readily recognized. Mrs. Abbie Burnham, recording secretary, gave a fine address. She handled her subject fluently, and the audience listened earnestly. Mr. Redding gave some wonderful messages. Our Thursday evening meetings at the home of the president, 202 Main street, Everett, Mass., are still successful. He gives delineations. He is assisted by Mrs. M. E. Dean, Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Smith and others. We have very interesting meetings, and they are well attended."

C. F. Short writes: "Well do I remember when a boy in old Indiana, of asking my religious superiors questions respecting the state of the departed. They said like this: 'Oh, it is hard to say. For there are Hades, Gehenna, Tartarus, Heaven, Hell, Paradise, Purgatory, the lake of fire, the bottomless pit, and other cheerful localities; just which they now are in is not easily answered. Oh, the gloom that saddened my very soul; but oh, not so awfully as when I asked about their mental condition. I was told it was a state of sleep, a shut-in, dazed, comatose condition, a state of suspense, waiting for the second coming, the end of the world, the resurrection of the body, and the day of judgment. The gloom, the misery I suffered was past expression. But the spirits come. "Let me go, for the day breaketh. Sing unto the Lord a new song. They came, they come, they will come. Gloomy? No, radiant, bright, full of hope, love, alive, active at work, progressive, full of knowledge, and ready to solve life's great problems. The darkness is ended. The true light shineth. The mountains break forth into singing and all the trees of the field clap their hands."

C. F. Short puts forth a few thoughts that we trust our readers may consider with profit: "Allow me to inveigh against the evil of demanding messages all about earthly affairs, how to buy, sell, beat or cheat somebody, stocks, races, gambling, speculation. Now they are or should have done with these base, sordid matters; they why lower and degrade them by urging them to do it? Far better is it that we ascend to their exalted plane. This will make them a blessing to us and we to them."

Hattie F. R. Peet writes: "The third of the series of dances, under the auspices of the Illinois Sunflower Club, was held in Washington Hall, Monday evening, January 28. Those not caring to dance enjoyed themselves with progressive euchre. With fine music, dancing and lunch all passed a most enjoyable evening. The next party of this series will be held in same hall, Monday evening, February 25."

E. H. Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Daughters, an auxiliary to the First Society F. O. O. S., held their first tea party in Atlas Hall, 406 Ogden avenue, January 30, and are pleased to state that it was quite a success. Commencing at 2:30, supper at 6:30 and an entertainment from 3 to 9:30, presided over by our president, Mrs. A. Sexsmith, and the following persons took part: Dr. Alex Caird, Mr. Warner, Mr. C. A. Thompson and Mrs. Squires, who made some very encouraging remarks along the line of our Fraternal Order. Mrs. A. Sexsmith and Mr. Zimmerman gave us vocal solos, and Miss Knapp rendered a piano solo, after which our meeting came to a close. We will continue to hold these meetings the first and third Wednesdays of every month. All are cordially invited."

Harry J. Moore used flowers in the christening of five children in the San Diego, Cal., Spiritualists Temple, Sunday, January 6. On Sunday, Jan. 27, he participated in a memorial service to Moses Hull. Brother Moore writes that he has under course of preparation two more character lectures. One on the life and work of Major Bitters, who passed away at Rochester, Ind., and the other from the life and work of Moses Hull.

S. M. Tucker writes: "We have had quite a revival in spiritual matters in Wichita, Kans., this winter. Max Hoffmann has held seven or eight meetings here, and has given general satisfaction. Mrs. Maggie Vestal, trumpet medium, has given ten public meetings for trumpet work in the light. Her meetings have been well attended. She has given three or four seances each week. All of her work has given general satisfaction. Of course, there are some wise ones who can account for anything, without spirit intervention."

Wanted by a business woman, free modern unfurnished housekeeping rooms, with liberal-minded people, or small flat. Address 40 Loomis street, Chicago.

Mary P. Clapp writes from Norwich, Ct., "From time to time there have appeared in your columns notices of the meetings held weekly by our society, the First Spiritual Union of Norwich, Conn., indicating the good work being done for us by Mr. A. P. Blinn. At a meeting of the committee on Speakers held recently, it was strongly felt to be for the best and highest good of the society to retain Mr. Blinn for the coming season, and a motion to that effect was passed unanimously. It is with pleasure that I announce that Mr. Blinn has consented to accept this offer and will be our resident speaker for the season of 1907 and 1908. I cannot speak too highly of the good work done by both Mr. Blinn and his good wife, for us during the past two seasons. Our society has increased in numbers, a growing interest is felt in our philosophy, and our standing in the community has been greatly strengthened by the dignity and influence gained for us by a settled speaker. At present, Mr. Blinn's mother, Mrs. Annie E. Barnes of Boston, who is with him, is very ill. We hope she may recover at least a portion of health and strength, and she has the devoted and loving attention of her good son and daughter-in-law, and the earnest desires of many loving friends for her speedy upbuilding. The ladies of the Helping Hand have organized a sewing circle which meets every two weeks on Thursday afternoons, and on the alternate Thursday nights are held the usual fortnightly suppers of the ladies' society."

Louise E. Zimmerman writes: "It is some time since Elmira, N. Y., has been heard from, and she seems to have dropped into the shade, but the work is going on, even though services are not being held in the church. Parlor meetings are held at the homes of the members where local talent and developing mediums are doing good work. On January 27, with the mercury hugging the zero mark, a goodly number attended meeting held at the home of President E. F. Evans, at the close of which, it being his birthday anniversary, a surprise was presented to him, in the form of a very handsome substantial oak combination and rocking chair, as a token of esteem and appreciation of his efforts in behalf of the church and Spiritualism. A short time was spent in congratulations and surprise number two was sprung in an invitation to adjourn to the dining-room, where a table, groaning under its spread of good things, which had been prepared by the good wife and hostess, invited all to be seated and feast the inner man. The evening was spent in happy social intercourse and receiving messages from the loved ones; time passing all too quickly when good-nights must be spoken, the departing guests wishing mine host many happy returns of the day, and voting host and hostess royal entertainers. Thus an afternoon and evening passed away, which will always remain a pleasant memory in the hearts of those present."

Dr. Geo. B. Warne writes: "Two of our Chicago mediums, Mrs. Mary Weaver of 46 DeKalb street, and Mrs. Susie Thompson of 769 West Van Buren street, rendered efficient aid at the Eighth rally on Sunday, January 27. Their message giving, thoroughly enjoyed by all present, was noticeable for its unassuming directness which led to very general recognition by the stranger recipients. Neither one of the ladies made any attempt to ape the method of the sensational mediums in the same phase, who for notoriety's sake do stunts in the name of the spirit world as startling as double somersaults in the sawdust ring. It requires confidence in the guiding intelligences to attempt the giving of messages before an audience of entire strangers without a particle of previous preparation for the part. Success under those conditions arouses interest, leads to investigations and final conversion. All hail! to every such worker and there are many of them. Ask some of the stars in this phase of platform work to face on a moment's notice either a circle, or a hall full of strangers, and study the responses made."

J. E. Coe writes: "On Sunday evening, January 27, the society of the Golden Star Center had for its speaker, Brother J. C. Burgess, president of the Chicago Spiritualists League, giving us one of his practical talks, and illustrations followed by Brother McLane with remarks and messages. Our speaker for Feb. 10, will be Brother Clarence Tisdale.

Mrs. Frances A. Koehler was suddenly called to New York State at the bedside of her father, who is very sick with pneumonia. He is some better at this writing.

Jennie L. Stevens, Secretary, writes: "At a meeting held December 23, at Seaside Hall, Field street, the Spiritualists of Belfast organized a society known as The Seaside Spiritualist Church, of Belfast, Me. There are thirty-two charter members; president, Orin J. Dickey. Our cause here in Belfast is interesting more people than ever, as we have local talent of a fine order, and we are expecting a season of satisfactory success."

Rev. Albert P. Blinn writes from the First Spiritual Union, Norwich, Conn.: "During the month of January this society has held very successful meetings with unusually large attendance at each service. As pastor, I have spoken upon a variety of topics among them being, 'The Great Mystery, Life,' 'Religion and its Effects,' 'Facing the Future,' and 'Evidences of Immortality.' Prof. Dowsett's splendid rendition of classical music upon our new pipe organ has been a treat each Sunday, and the solos and quartette numbers by members of our choir are a feature of the services. Good music is appreciated with us. On Sunday next we are to have Mrs. A. J. Pettingill with us as message bearer. Since our meetings opened last October, the philosophy has been expounded each Sunday by the writer, and twice we have had message bearers follow the addresses, Wellman C. Whitney and Annette J. Pettingill, and both did excellent work. Through sickness Mrs. May S. Pepper was unable to be with us to give a week evening seance during the past month, but we expect her in February. In spite of bad weather our suppers and socials have been largely attended, and goodly receipts netted."

Letters will now reach Helen Stuart-Richings at the present time if addressed in care of General Delivery, Boston, Mass.

S. S. King writes from Hamilton, Ontario: "I am pleased to report our society here in a very prosperous condition. We have a frequent change of speakers. In October we had Lyman C. Howe, and Mrs. Ripley for November and December; Mrs. Travis for January and February, and next comes Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn. With such exponents of the truth, the most confirmed orthodox hearers must admit that they have been groping in the dark."

Mrs. A. Metcalf writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "The Progressive Thinker has been my constant companion for sixteen years, and I know it would be doing violence to my feelings to be separated from it now. May it ever prosper, as it should, and go on giving the glorious truths which make us feel that life is worth living."

Mr. G. H. Brooks is actively at work in Wisconsin, and it is sometimes difficult to locate him. However, a telegram or letter will reach him if directed to his home, 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill., or to 202 North avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., will be forwarded at once.

C. L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society met as usual with the president, Mrs. Mattie E. A. Allbe, in the chair. Although the weather was extremely bad, a large number were present and a most delicious supper was served, and a pleasant social time was enjoyed. The following talent took part during the evening: Mrs. Alice S. Waterhouse; Mrs. Hattie C. Mason, who has been so ill at the hospital, was able to be present once more, and give cheering thoughts; Mrs. Maude Litch of Lynn, gave an interesting talk and voiced many messages. Mrs. Frye of Beverly gave messages, as did Mrs. Seers-Hill and Mrs. Dinen. Mr. Samuel Graham gave two selections upon the violin, accompanied on the piano by Miss Alice Waterhouse, granddaughter of Mrs. Alice S. Waterhouse. Both selections were much appreciated. Mrs. Lovering was the pianist for the congregational singing. Next Friday we hold our Snip Sale, and Friday, the 15th we have a valentine party. Thanks are extended The Progressive Thinker for reports of our meetings."

Please send me a list of your members, and the name of your lyceum. For some time I have been waiting anxiously for a list of all our lyceums. It is most important that we should have an authentic list of your lyceum, its membership, and address of its officers. Will you not give me this assistance?

The Banner Contest list will remain open through the month of January, so any school that has not reported, send in report at once; but even though you may not desire to enter the competition for a prize, please send report of your membership. The lyceums that have reported are as follows: Los Angeles, Cal.; Parkland, Pa.; Chesaning, Mich.; Pittsburg, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Decatur, Portland, Galveston, and a partial report from three others. We trust by the close of this month to have a full list of every working lyceum in the United States.

Yours for the children,
ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA.

Spiritualists of That State to Have a Grand Mass-Meeting.

The State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota will hold the annual midwinter mass-meeting in St. Paul, on February 22, 23 and 24, at Odd Fellows Hall, corner Wabasha and Fifth streets, with an all-day session each day, beginning at 10:30 a. m. Mrs. Catherine McFarlin of LaCrosse, Wis., will be the principal speaker at all the meetings. All the local talent of the Twin Cities will also be present, and take part in the exercises. Programmes will be mailed to any one on receipt of address.

F. E. IRVINE,
Secretary S. S. A. of M.
904 Hastings Ave., St. Paul, Minn.

GRAND RALLY.

A Mass-Meeting of Spiritualists and Liberalists.

A mass-meeting of Spiritualists and Liberalists under the auspices of the New York State Association of Spiritualists, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, February 14, 15 and 16, 1907, at Elks' Hall, 59th street and Columbus Circle (Pabst Bldg., next to Majestic Theatre—present meeting place of First Association of Spiritualists, Sundays at 3). Take Subway train to Columbus Circle, or 6th or 9th avenue "L" to 59th street; also all surface cars, North and South, transfer to 59th street crosstown cars to Columbus Circle.

Sessions 10:30 a. m., 2:30 and 8 o'clock p. m. Morning session free. Afternoon and evening sessions, 25 cents. Eminent speakers, renowned phenomenal mediums and excellent music, under the direction of Madame Louise B. Voight, will make these meetings most interesting and attractive.

Each and every worker in the Spiritualistic field and in the field of progressive thought is invited to unite with the state association in making this convocation a glorious success. State associations are of vital importance in various ways to both local societies and individual members, notably because they stand between them and the state legislatures to prevent the enactment of unjust laws, curtailing the liberty of religious thought and action—such as are constantly being attempted before the various statute-making bodies throughout this land.

It would therefore seem a duty for every lover of Truth, Liberty and Justice to support this mass meeting, thereby encouraging and aiding the state association in its battle for the rights of human progress. "In unity there is strength."

By order of
MASS-MEETING COMMITTEE.

Mrs. L. A. Holt, West Potsdam, N. Y., Chairman, (Director N. Y. S. A. S.); Harvey W. Richardson, East Aurora, N. Y., (President N. Y. S. A. S.); Miss Sarah A. Woodruff, Colden N. Y., (Secretary N. Y. S. A. S.); Mrs. Milton Rathbun, Port Washington, N. Y., (Treasurer N. Y. S. A. S.), Chairman for Greater New York.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

To Be Held at St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 27 and 28.

Our annual convention will be held at St. Louis, Feb. 27 and 28. We hope to have with us on that occasion Elizabeth Harlow and other visitors of note, beside our local talent, Brother Grimshaw, Mrs. Hary, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Price, also Mrs. Stephens of Kansas City, and your humble servant. Every Spiritualist in Missouri is invited to be present and bring their friends. To be held at the Temple of Spiritualism, 3015 Pine street, St. Louis, Mo. PAUL McARTHUR, President.

"The Religion of Cheerfulness," By Sara A. Hubbard. An excellent book for the culture of health and spirituality. None can read it without pleasure and profit. Price 50c.

The World Has Never Seen the Like!

At Great Expense we have secured the copyright of Mr. Ghandi's translation of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." It is to be sent forth as a gift to our subscribers, as set forth in the following:

It is an absolute fact. We are enabling our subscribers to form a valuable library at a nominal cost. One of them writes:

"I have your THIRTEEN premium books, which if I had bought in the open market at the usual price would have cost me at least $15. Sending each year for one copy at the cost of 25 cents, the whole thirteen volumes have cost me exactly $3.25. As you paid the postage thereon, which amounts to not less than $1.40, all you receive for the Thirteen copies I have, is exactly $1.85, causing you to lose in the aggregate each year a large amount of money in order to benefit your subscribers."

The above is an accurate estimate. All we have received for the thirteen premium books when they have been ordered one at a time for thirteen consecutive years, is approximately $1.85, a little more than the price of a single book.

We now offer as a GIFT OUTRIGHT, one of the most valuable books of the present age—THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. In order to obtain this book, you must send TEN CENTS in stamps to pay the postage thereon, and ONE DOLLAR for The Progressive Thinker one year. Your library is not complete without this remarkable book. Every Spiritualist should have it for study and reference. Every orthodox Christian should read it, and thus learn the whole truth in regard to Jesus. Remember it is a GIFT to you on the TERMS MENTIONED above. We expect to distribute at least Twenty Thousand copies as GIFTS.

Have You Read OUR PREMIUM BOOK OFFER?

Truly, the world has NEVER SEEN the like before. Search the annals of history, ANCIENT AND MODERN; critically examine the history of Spiritualism; look here and there, in every nook and corner of the world, and you CANNOT find a parallel to the offer made in reference to these THIRTEEN remarkable PREMIUM BOOKS. They constitute a wonderfully valuable Spiritualistic and Occult LIBRARY, and are furnished at a nominal sum. All are substantially bound and neatly printed, and those who purchase them are DELIGHTED WITH THEM.

We have now THIRTEEN magnificent PREMIUM BOOKS which you can select from.

GEMS OF THOUGHT, by SEVENTEEN leading authors, is our last Premium Book.

Any one of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 25 cents. This is the price, remember, when you order only one book in connection with a yearly subscription. The paper, one year, and one Premium Book, $1.25. But if you order more than one Premium Book the price is as follows:

Any two of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 70 cents.
Any three of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.
Any four of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.
Any five of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.75.
Any six of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.05.
Any seven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.
Any eight of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.65.
Any nine of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.
Any ten of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.10.
Any eleven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.40.
Any twelve of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.85.

Lastly, all of these THIRTEEN Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for 4.15, something never before equalled in this country or Europe.

Bear in mind that every order for a Premium Book must be accompanied with a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker, which is $1. We repeat that the world has never seen the like of it before.

"TWO IN ONE"

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books comprised at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

W. L. Allen: Q. Are any of the advertised remedies for making the hair grow—I include the mechanical contrivances as well—of real value?

A. Without any reservation, as for the restoration of hair that has fallen out, the promises of all preparations and mechanical methods are delusive. Dandruff, a fungus growth at the roots of the hair, is almost the exclusive cause of its falling out. It may be destroyed and the health of the hair preserved if taken in time. After its work is done nothing can restore the bulbs from which the hair springs. There are preparations which give gloss and color to the hair, and stimulate its growth, but none that reproduce on a surface from which the hair has fallen because of the death of the bulbs, or roots. It is well to remember when reading the eulogistic advertisements of these preparations, that they promise results impossible to obtain; which no physiologist with a reputation to sustain would declare possible.

A. C. Kellogg: Q. Is not the belief in a devil and hell as clearly expressed in the orthodox creeds of the present, as a century ago?

A. Creeds embody the ideas predominant when they are made, and to be authoritative must be received as infallible, and hence changeless. A creed does not change. Parts may wither and die but they are not lopped off, or decently buried. They are embalmed, and the living members have to carry the dead. The existence of a personal devil and literal hell stand written largely in the orthodox creeds. Only a generation since they were chief stock-in-trade to force frightened sinners into the fold. When pastors receive ordination, they are asked if they believe the creed of the church into whose ministry they propose to enter, and although this includes these mumified beliefs, they vow they do to the letter. After the callow stage has been passed, after they learn more than to repeat the platitudes of the reverend professors, they give no sermons on these beliefs. The devil and hell are ignored, and if they are again brought to play the active part as of yore, a red-hot evangelist is imported to bake sinners over the coals of eternal wrath.

No minister having a reputation, dares preach these once cardinal dogmas. Even the hymn-books have ruled out the once popular doctrinal hymns. There are some of them in the books especially prepared for revivalists. The hymns in common use are more songs than hymns, and there is a wide interval between them and the old long metre scare hymns.

The difference in the hymns and music show the advance that has been made. The old pessimistic wailing has given place to optimistic joy.

In my boyhood I shuddered at the awful words of "Hark, from the tombs," and I remember the horror which filled my mind at the singing of another hymn which was a favorite of the itinerant minister who on his circuit made my father's house a station. I give a part of this hymn, which to sing now before children would be little short of criminal. I cannot divine what pleasure the pioneer people derived from the singing, but as I remember they entered heartily into the performance. Perhaps there was something responsive in their hard and strenuous lives.

Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,
Justice has built a dismal hell
And laid her stores of vengeance there.

Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
And darts t' inflict immortal pains,
Dipt in the blood of damned souls.

There Satan, the first sinner, lies,
And wails and bites his iron bands;
In vain the rebel strives to rise,
Crushed with the weight of both thy hands.

There guilty ghosts of Adam's race,
Shriek out and howl beneath thy rod;
Once they could scorn a Savior's grace,
But they incensed a dreadful God.

Tremble, my soul, and kiss the Son;
Sinner, obey thy Savior's call;
Else your damnation hastens on,
And hell gapes wide to wait your fall."

That was a hymn sung in doleful long meter, that was not an opiate for a sensitive child before his retiring, and if it had been realized by the singers would have driven them mad. No more of these lugubrious hymns—false, cruel and blasting. Church choirs now sing of Christ's love, of angel presence, and scores of hymns in words and inspiring music are unobjectionable to the most radical thinker. Prof. Edgar L. Larkin, the astronomer, who has made himself famous from his watch of the heavens at the Lowe Observatory, says, "Man has only been free for the past ten years." What depths of superstition, what ignorance, what mental enslavement is written between the lines of such hymns.

It may be a coincidence that the real breaking of the chains began at the advent of Spiritualism. May we not with more plausibility say that a new light dawned on mankind at that time, and that the spirit world has taken an active part in this emancipation?

"Askalon": Q. Is there a sect called German Catholics? Also German Baptists?

A. In 1844, in the turmoil of the political storm which has received the name of the "Revolution of '48," there was a secession of discontents from the Catholic church, led by Ronge and Czerski. Various heterodox doctrines were introduced and the usual dissension of religious bodies absorbed the strength which should be given to vital issue. The government interfered, and after the revolutionary fever had subsided, the sect was absorbed into the orthodox denominations.

The German Baptists or Dunkards, also called Dippers, and better known as Brethren, are another sect, split off from the mother church, because of some fancied points of doctrine. They were expelled from Germany in the early part of the last century and came to Pennsylvania, from whence various colonies have been sent to western states. Their custom of washing each other's feet before the Lord's supper has perhaps given them more publicity than any other. Why it should be made a subject of ridicule by other sects is passing strange, for it is strictly a Bible usage.

They believe and practice "triple baptism," anointing with oil, and laying on of hands; take the Bible as supreme authority, and love the simple life. They are honest, industrious, thrifty and densely ignorant, superstitious and bigoted. They do not believe in war, hold aloof from political life, and form communities almost independent of the people around them.

"HOW SHALL I BECOME A MEDIUM?"

It is fully answered in "Mediumship, and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation," by Hudson Tuttle. Price 35 cents. Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

From the Spirit Side of Life.

A Spirit, Through Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss, Discusses the Divorce Evil—Harmony Seems to Be the Cure.

At a recent meeting of the Psychic Research society, of Sandusky, Ohio, Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss of Toledo, was the speaker. In accordance with her usual custom, the audience was requested to furnish subjects for the address to be given under the inspiration of her spirit guides. One person suggested "The Divorce Evil, and How to Eradicate It," while a lady gave as a subject "Harmony." Mrs. Schauss spoke in part as follows:

Harmony—that one word encompassing all that would make peace and plenty and satisfaction and contentment, all over the universe, and into every heart and home. You will ask us to speak upon the evil of divorce and its cure, and we answer you in that one word "harmony."

It is the cure, and we would ask a question in return, is divorce at all times an evil? Are there not sometimes cases that come under your observation that seemingly are justifiable? Are there not instances where you may say and would say that it is better to live apart in peace THAN TOGETHER IN WAR? True enough. But why should we in this enlightened age, be confronted with such conditions as that? Why is it that so many of those who enter into the state of marriage or matrimony, seek separation one from another? To what is this state of affairs due, and how shall we cure it? Why cry out to you "harmonize the people, teach them to become harmonized within themselves, that they may be harmonized unto others?" then there will be nothing to cause a desire for separation or any of the many evils that we are confronted with at the present day.

WE NEED MORE HARMONY; we need a great deal of exemplification of harmony in societies, in congregations, in homes, if you please; but where shall we begin. Where must we begin, in order that we may establish harmony and thus do away with many of the evils that society of to-day is afflicted with? And we say to you at all times, "There is no need trying to adjust and better the conditions, by enacting laws." "There is no need of trying to erase the effect so long as no attempt is made to reform the causes." "There is no need to try to polish over or whitewash an unclean surface." It may look better for a time, but the knowledge of it remains underneath. The corruption and the knowledge of that fact brings the thought that some day the corruption will burst through the polish and come forth and be visible again.

HARMONY MUST ALWAYS, in all instances, begin with self-culture. We talk harmony to others. We may admonish them, but that is all idle talk and for a moment perhaps, a short time, may have an effect upon the individual and keep them for a time in a sort of submissive condition, so to speak. Therefore, we say to you, when you wish to teach harmony unto others, begin first by exemplifying it, for never should anyone forget that the most effective lesson that can be offered to any person or set of persons is that lesson which is contained in the example of your own individual life, and if you have learned how to balance your own force, how to harmonize your own self so that you can arouse others, and throw them into a pitch of excitement, and be so kind as to tell them how you aroused your own curiosity, by saying kind words, tell them only things that arouse great excitement and curiosity.

LEARN FIRST TO harmonize yourself. It is absolutely necessary, in order that you might give to the people the remedy, the cure that you learn and know, and possess the ability of knowing how to place yourself in other person's positions, no one has a right to sit in judgment upon another. No one is called upon to pass judgment upon another or to convict another, or even to try to convict that other, unless he is perfectly capable of placing himself in that other's position and place, and then to ask himself the question in that place with such conditions, "What would I do?" The answer to that question will, as a rule, cause him to go home and think it over. But in a general sense, there must be something that can be done in order to take away some of the existing evils of the divorce court. And we say to you that we believe in the course of human development, we shall arrive at a state where persons will question themselves thoroughly as to their qualifications before entering the matrimonial state, where people will forget themselves and give up and sacrifice rather than make another unhappy. But how to arrive at this stage of the game is yet a problem.

There is but one way, and that is to teach each and every individual to turn the searchlight upon himself, find out his duty and go forward with the light. But in study, thought and foresight, we find a solution of the problem. But what studies do we find in the curriculum of our modern schools? Instead of more practical studies along the lines of physical, mental, moral and spiritual development.

WHEN WE THINK OF IT—that in many of our high schools, much of the time is spent in classical recitations of Latin and Greek, it seems almost a sacrilege that the time of the growing youth should be exhausted in that sort of a way, and all other practical and useful studies eliminated. When you enter the high schools of to-day, and go over the curriculum of their studies, what does this education in reality profit the youth in after life to know Greek and Latin phrases, when or where it was testified with regard to the flatness or roundness of the earth? This will not help them toward being real useful men and women, or true citizens.

It is useless to have taken a classical course and passed through the studies of the high school in that direction and unless they are fitting themselves to become teachers of the same they have actually no use and derive no benefit of that lot of study. If they come across an English, German or French phrase in some book, they are able to know what these sentences mean, but what help is this in life's battle?

WE NEED TO STRIKE at the root of the evil. We need reform in our school system. The teachers must bring forth what is in the children, and it is through the daily study and routine of study that the development comes on. And with a lesson each day that would tend to harmonize the individual being, that would tend to develop something of that, we venture to say he would be quite well balanced mentally, physically, morally, and spiritually, and would be able to know where he is at.

The great fault to-day is that the majority of us, however, do not know where we are at. Through personal magnetism many young people are attracted to each other by peculiar attractive force, but so long as nothing happens to disturb that element, all is well, for before disturbed they are at peace with one another. But the very moment that the spell is broken, there comes a clash, because of a lack of understanding, and the result is the divorce court.

Too many such cases there are in existence. Too many people enter into the matrimonial state before their perfect understanding and congeniality has been proved and tested, and therefore the individuals or contracting parties do not know really what they are doing.

BETTER EDUCATION, a system of learning that would enable them to develop the spiritual side of self and would place them in a balanced condition, is what we need. It is possible by proper attempt to adjust one's self to every instance, but it is only accomplished through discipline and self-denial. And thus it is, if you wish to be balanced and harmonized within yourself you must not seek to avoid those things that would tend toward your growth. On the contrary, you must go courageously forward and overcome them. It is necessary if you would overcome them that you must go forward.

Let us say, for instance, that you are to perform a certain task. The task would not be so very difficult were it not for someone, knowing that you are determined to master that task doing everything they can to make it just as hard as possible for you to accomplish that task. A natural feeling of rebellion rises in you. You are not going to undertake any such conditions. You are not going to waste your plans on anything which is made so hard for you.

My friends, the moment that you take that stand you have fallen in the estimation of yourself and of everyone else. But then, if, on the contrary, you will achieve, look over the task, see what it means and determine within yourself that, even though it means sacrifices of self-esteem, perhaps, it may be said that you have won the greatest kind of a victory.

But what is victory? Is it the victory over self? Yes, it is the victory over self. The determination within yourself, which is eager to perform that difficult task and be master of that situation. When you have done that you have won the victory over self.

There is hardly a person on the face of the globe who at some time or other does not find himself in a like position. For instance, by allowing a brand to rest upon themselves, they are able to save another person from the ridicule of the remainder of the community or society where they may be.

IF SUCH CONDITIONS came to you how many are there of you who would be willing to do what is right? Now, we say to you, those of you who have found yourselves in this position but who have not found it within your power to go ahead and do what is right, sacrifice yourself! The contemptible condition in which you have placed yourself by trying otherwise would never bring you peace. It may be a long time before you can see it—it may be a long time before you can realize that it is through just such sacrifice that you attain peace, and only in peace do we find harmony. Such acts from kindliness, from such little charities we come one step nearer the development of a harmonious being, and until we become harmonious beings within ourselves it is an impossibility for us to be harmonized with others. And another thing that we must do is, we must not wait for someone else. Let someone say something that does not please me, shall I withdraw or hold myself back simply because someone in that society has done something I do not like? To do anything like that, why, what a narrow state of mind I must have, of character and of the great object of life. Because of the opinion of one, two or a dozen I have withdrawn myself from things I know and the community in which I live know to be right.

Now, my friends, there is something that we each can take home to ourselves—how to harmonize ourselves. When we sometimes catch ourselves doing these very things of which I have just spoken, that is the thing we must avoid. When we catch ourselves doing these things, resolve that it shall not occur again. Resolve to place a penance upon yourself. Sometimes people laugh at the idea of doing penance, but we say actual doing of penance is based upon scientific principles. It is not merely to expiate an error but is based upon a scientific basis.

EDUCATION IN THE RIGHT direction, along the right channels, is the solution of every problem. Education of our girls and boys from childhood up in the uses of their latent powers within them, will bring about the solution and cure of the divorce evil in young and old. Teach them to use their forces and balance their natures. More evil is wrought through ignorance than a desire for wrong-doing.

Years ago in the day schools that existed, we used to find there were separate rooms for the girls and boys. We found that they were held apart. They must not be allowed to mingle one with another, but, in time the schoolroom was arranged so that the boys and girls could become better acquainted with each other, and much of the evil and wrong was eradicated, which shows that in the solution of this problem we need classes in the study of natural laws.

THERE WAS A TIME when books written upon that subject were considered obscene and were held up to ridicule and the publication suppressed, but to-day we find our public libraries flooded with books that treat upon that subject, for it is these things alone that will bring to us the solution of the questions that confront us. We must teach the young people the truth. We must let them know. We must teach them that there is something more in life for them than to be merry. That they are here for use and not abuse. We must teach them these things, and the books written by Mary Wood Allen should be in the hands of everyone. We advise mothers to speak to their children, to teach them at home.

Then there would be more of happy marriages; there would be less of unhappy marriages and the divorce evil would die away. Harmony will bring the solution, education will harmonize.—Sandusky (Ohio) Register.

TEXAS CAMP GROUND.

A Stirring Appeal to Spiritualists for Their Aid.

Dear Spiritualist Friends:—Fully realizing the need of help from those who should feel the need and importance of a State Camp Ground, I hope I may not weary you by asking a little help of you.

I am not a begger, nor was I raised to beg, except only from the orthodox God to have mercy on me and save my unworthy soul from an eternal fiery pit of punishment. But, good friends, the deliverance of my mind from that terrible thought has been already to me worth more than the wealth of nations.

How many are truly thankful in their real souls for the knowledge that their friends who have lain aside mortal form can come to them and prove to them that they still live and love them?

Money and material wealth must fade into nothing compared to this great knowledge of the continuity of life and love of the soul after the demise of its material form.

Oh, dear friends, there are thousands hungry and thirsty for this knowledge. Can we as true Spiritualists sit and let those who would be as happy and thankful as we were for this knowledge, when we have the power to co-operate with one another and bring this great light to the many hungry and thirsty souls?

Oh, dear friends, we who are true to Spiritualism will never rest so long as we have the privilege and love for it, to sit idly and dumb and let those thirsting perish when we can give them drink.

I, as one, love the cause of my religion. I am going to do what the loving angel world will help me, and if I should fail in doing the work of making this camp ground a true success, I am sure my reward will be none the less for my hard and sincere efforts in this direction. Now, I know I can't do the work of erecting a camp ground by myself, and I feel the need of all those who have this work at heart, to help. I received very few orders for the views of the grounds. I suppose, possibly, many who read my letter did not realize the importance of this work at this place.

And possibly some did not have the $1.25 to spare. Friends, I must tell you that the profit on those views is very little. Now, there are at least 4,000 Spiritualists in the United States, who will read this letter, who can send me 55 cents and never miss that amount. I am spending much more than this at this work, I work all day and work till 11 o'clock at night making those views.

All my heart and soul is in this work, and I want it to bring forth much fruit.

We want to have a glorious meeting here this summer, so, dear friends, now put your shoulders to this work and we will surely succeed. I am not going to ask you to give me the 55 cents. I am going to give you more than the worth of 55 cents to you. Now I want everyone who feels that they should help to build up a great camp ground here, to send the amount to me and I will send them a large, beautiful photograph of the grounds and a valuable recipe for making one of the finest liniments I have ever known. It will cost you only about one-fourth as much to make this liniment as the common liniments on the market, and I know of no liniment that is its equal. This recipe has never been published in any paper or recipe book, and is worth many dollars to any family. So, dear friends, let me have your help and we will meet here at this place when we get our grounds in condition for a meeting and have a grand, good meeting.

With best wishes to all and hoping that we will make a success of this work, I am always for the cause and help of truth.

WE HAVE LOST MUCH.

A Tribute to the Memory of Moses Hull.

To the Editor:—Having just learned through Brother Harrison D. Barrett, that Brother Moses Hull has passed over where the innumerable dwell:

"What is time?
I asked an aged man, a man of cares,
Weary and worn and white with hoary hairs.
'Time is the warp of life,' he said, 'oh! tell
The young, the fair, the gay, to weave it well."

Such was the reflection of one who wrote over a century ago. The people's cemeteries of departed centuries remind us we are but transient upon the stage of life, and that very soon we, too, must give place to the unborn generations of men.

When I first met our beloved brother in Buffalo, N. Y., some eight years ago, I loved the man for his kind and ever pleasant face. I have been exceedingly helped by his works and by his profound earnestness for truth. Those of us who knew him well, knew him but to love him. Have lost much, those of us who knew the life of our departed brother, his intellect, his soulful nature, his comprehension of every obligation that rested upon him, his high endowments in all thousand elements that go to make man the greatest of all created beings.

We feel and know his lot will be an exalted one in the Land of Spirit, and we, his students here, have met with an irreparable loss. The silken thread binds many men and nations together. The jewels men grown old, and growing old, hold priceless in the securities of their memories, are earnings of their self-denial, and of their self-sacrifice, the fruits of which enrich the mind, and added strength and fortitude to their character, and overflows into the lives of others.

There is no reward which outlasts life and sweetness, all life, save that one in the deep privation in hard struggle, in pursuit of a standard set higher than the personal ambition. We prize those things which cost us dearest. We knit ourselves into other lives, as we make those lives our life. The way to glory is the humble way of service. The shining way is the way of sacrifice, and the retrospect lights up radiantly in a measure of the heroism, the patriotism, the love in which hope always kept company in the struggle through the years by day and by night; all recompense in living for self is in living and doing good for others.

There are no riches comparable to the riches of character. It is the right of man's immortality, the life that is of true nobility is the life of service, not of self, not a life of scheming for personal gain, through false pretense. The life that is of true nobility is of honest service to mankind.

I know that the cause that we as Spiritualists hold so dear, has lost so far as this life is concerned, one of the brightest gems in the Casket of Modern Thought. His life was love; his every act so far as known to me, was of the best; he gave the best, the best could give no more.

I was waiting to see his kindly face again in our city, but alas! and to our bereaved sister Mattie Hull, you have my heartfelt sympathy for you will miss our brother, we all know, the most.

"Yes, it is hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps it will cost a sigh, a tear,
then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time, say not good night,
But in some bright clime, bid me good morning."

A PLAIN TALK.

With Suggestions Having a Special Adaptation.

I will ask your attention for a few minutes, and I will try to point out some of the fruit grown in our Spiritual Orchard, for, "By their fruits ye shall know them." I will ask you to go with me into our Orchard and sample the fruit, for that is Spiritualism, to investigate.

Now, in a recent talk I tried to show you how Spiritualism has loosened the chains of superstition, and established a line of message bearers between the two worlds or conditions, converting the Jewish Jehovah God into an ever-present and all-pervading principle or spirit of harmony, love and truth, or Our Eeternal God, and closed the gates of a local hell, and utilized its brimstone and fire, and annihilated the personal devil.

All who investigate or partake of its fruit will know that life is eternal; no faith, no belief, but a fact that we do survive the shock called death. Stop and think, friends, what that stands for to the one who believes this life ends all, or to the one who hopes for a hereafter.

When Robert G. Ingersoll stood by the grave of his dear and much beloved brother, with whom he had lived, loved and worked until youth and young manhood had passed, and they had grown almost as one soul, but to be torn apart by the monster death, Robert's very soul cried out, and he said, "Let us hope for a hereafter." Had he tested this spiritual fruit he would have known that he and his brother would again meet and again take up the work they had not finished, and continue that work and love on to infinity.

Think, if you can, how much it means to the materialist, when he stands by the grave of the one he loves even more than his own life, to know that life is eternal and cannot die regardless of what we may believe or what we may do, and that there are many bridges and innumerable wires connecting this life with the one beyond, over which communications are passing continually, and that all the communications from that unseen world agree, and that as in one voice, they teach us that we are here to work, to cultivate and improve, and enjoy this life, for in so doing, we are beautifying, and perfecting that home we are preparing for ourselves in the next and more real world or conditions. They teach us the influence of environment, and the force and power of thought, the effect of envy and jealousy, the misery and heart-aches caused by the tongue of slander and spite, and that we must move on either upwards or downwards, for we cannot stand still; and that to live right, is to die right, and to enter the other world well prepared for the work, the joy, and gladness awaiting us; to live wrong, is to die wrong and to enter the other world as the prodigal son, hungry, naked and alone, there to learn what we should have learned here and to fully realize the meaning of "time lost is lost forever." That if the door of communication between earth and heaven was open two thousand years ago, it is more widely open to-day; that if the spirit world was interested in reaching men with instructions, warnings and comfort in the earlier days, a greater number are anxiously waiting to aid, comfort and help humanity now.

To deny this would be to deny the law of evolution; it would be to turn the dial of human progress backward and to reverse the law of progression.

Now, my friends, I do not believe there is a Spiritualist present but what will accept as a truth every statement or claim I have made in favor of our beautiful, reasonable and scientific philosophy.

I will now call your attention to some of the grafted fruit or grafts found in our orchard, that we must cultivate up or out. While we have helped all religious organizations to get rid of many of their old and outgrown superstitions and ism, while we have brought joy, happiness, and gladness to many homes, and illuminated the cold materialistic halls of science with our spiritual light and demonstrated facts, and we might, I think, truly say that our philosophy and phenomena have cast their rays of light and hope over the entire world. But what have we done for ourselves as an organization? We have most surely failed in that, and why, is the question. Is it because we are too free, too broad, too progressive and too individual, to be held together by any known rule of ethics; or is it because our leaders and teachers have become so accustomed to pulling down or exploding old superstitions, creeds and dogmas that they neglect the building up of their own philosophy on a broad, scientific foundation? Or have we, as individual Spiritualists, become so accustomed to seeing or looking after the mote in the other churches and societies, and the other fellow, that we have entirely neglected to look after our own manner and mode of doing and living?

Do we ask ourselves, are we bettter men and women because of our religion? If we are not, then indeed as far as we are concerned, our philosophy and religion is vain, for any belief or knowledge that does not help to raise the standard of goodness, justice and love towards their fellow-men, is not beneficial to men. Or is it because we as Spiritualists have no open and declared declaration or standard of principles? I am inclined to believe that this is the real and only reason why we have not succeeded in building up good, strong societies in every part of our country, and why our state organizations and our national organization have not been more of a success for good. And also in a pecuniary way it seems necessary and acknowledged so by all organizations from the government down to local societies to have a Declaration of Principles which each and every person must subscribe to and register their name thereto before becoming a member thereof.

With us as Spiritualists we entertain, practice and believe any thing a sane or insane mind can conceive of, and call it Spiritualism. The result is that we, like the chain, are tested or measured by the weakest link, and we have weak links in our ranks as well as other organizations; but they cite you to their declaration of principles, not as individuals, while we refer you to the fruit we have borne and try to explain the weakest link.

We will examine into the working of our societies and ask if it would tend to grow, develop and inspire the good, and elevate mankind. I was told by a member of, and an officer in, the Iowa State Spiritualist Association, that when they held their election to elect their officers to represent our beautiful scientific philosophy, that should be sacred to all that believe in it, that he, an officer, when he went to counting noses (a phrase in politics) he found that he did not have votes enough to elect the one he wished, so he went down town and hustled around and got forty people to come to the meeting, pay their dollar, and become members and have a vote. The organization got the forty dollars, and they got the forty votes, but I ask, did they get forty desirable members; or did they get those that tend to make Spiritualism unpopular. Remember, this officer said that he paid for the vote, and again in our society at Mt. Pleasant Park I have noticed that we have from ten to twenty new members added to our list on the day we elect our officers, presumably for the purpose of electing some special friend, or by request. These are cold facts, and you will agree with me that it is time that all true Spiritualists woke up to the fact that we must devise some means whereby we can raise the standard of our morality and regard, respect and love for our fellows. To me, I will say again, there seems no better way than to establish a Declaration of Principles, and require all persons to subscribe to and affix their names thereto before they become members of any Spiritualist society. After they have thus complied with the declaration, and become members in good standing, they will be supplied with a visiting card that will admit them into any other society and the card will be to them a voucher for a worthy member. I would have that platform broad enough, and high enough, so that all Spiritualists can endorse and subscribe to the following declaration:

"I believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; I believe that the existence and personal identity of the individual continues after the change called death; I believe that we do communicate with the so-called dead; I believe that the highest morality is contained in the Golden Rule, "Whatsoever ye would that others do unto you, do ye also unto them." I do hereby and in this presence promise and obligate myself to live and do in accordance thereto, and to be and to live a good and faithful Spiritualist in so far as is possible for me to do."

With the foregoing declaration of principles for the rock on which to build, and stand as the spiritual banner under which each individual could formulate their own creed, devise their own religion, which like their clothing will be suited to their own individuality, and will feel at liberty to change it from time to time, and will be independent of the thought, and authority of others, and feel free to be religious in their own way, using whatever means or methods their judgment suggests as best adapted for their nature, so long as they find themselves growing in sincerity, love of truth, reverence, sympathy and charity and in harmony with the declaration of principles they have subscribed to, just as each state has its own constitution, but all subject to or in harmony with the national constitution.

With such an organization and declaration, a Spiritualist would not be called upon to explain or apologize for his religion, or rather for what it stands. Should we find with us "Wolves in sheep's clothing," practicing deception, living in open violation of the declaration of principles they have subscribed to, our duty should be to reform them if possible—if not, part company with them. They, therefore, would cease to be members of the society or organization, or recipients of any of its benefits; their cards demanded and their names stricken from the record.

I submit these thoughts for your consideration, as you all well know there must be some good reason why we as a society, as an organization, have not grown, or why it has not taken its just and legitimate place in the hearts and minds of the people and the public press. There must be and is a cause for it, and it is time we were finding the reason and removing the cause. J. W. CHAMBERS.

PHOTOGRAPH SPIRITS.

A Scientist Declares It Can Be Done.

To the Editor:—The writer has read with deep interest the article you quote from the Buffalo Enquirer in your issue of the 22nd ult., headed as follows:

"To Photograph Spirits—Prof. Lockwood, the scientist, declares it can be done as consistently as photographing the invisible plants."

You say, "One of the deepest thinkers in the country is Prof. W. M. Lockwood, and as an investigator of psychic phenomena probably no man in America is better known."

"Can you take the photograph of a spirit, an invisible form?" you ask. I do not say I believe we can, but I say emphatically, I KNOW we can.

"The speaker then told of his experiments in photographing the invisible, and of the astonishment his discoveries had caused among some eminent scientists of the world. He declares that under proper conditions it is as easy to photograph the invisible as the visible."

I will not quote further from that interesting article. I have been an investigator of the spiritual philosophy for fifteen years and have developed considerable of the psychic gift. One morning about three years ago, on awaking I heard a voice say "I will show you your mother's lost birth present." At that instant, about 18 inches from my face, I saw something that did not seem larger than a ten cent piece, and I watched it closely, and discovered it was increasing in size, and it materialized into my youngest brother's face. As soon as I recognized who it was it disappeared. This brother is the youngest of eleven children, members of our family, and at that time was living at Texarkana, Texas. It seems, from my limited readings that there are very many thinkers and psychics who believe that every human being and every other animal has a spirit, and that when the life cord is severed the spirits tend upwards. It has occurred to me, if this is true, that Prof. Lockwood could prove to the thinking world at least, that the continuity of life after so-called death of the body is a positive truth, by photographing the spirits of the animals murdered at the slaughter houses in Chicago six days out of seven.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE GREAT WORK THE CONSTRUCTIVE PRINCIPLES OF NATURE IN INDIVIDUAL LIFE.

Vol. III of the Harmonic Series—by the Author of The Great Psychological Crime—Text work of The School of Natural Science—and vital addition to the Philosophy of Individual Life. Over 425 pages—beautifully bound in silk cloth and gold. Price $2.00.

This much anticipated and long delayed work of Exact Science, Psychical Research and Moral Philosophy marks a crucial period in the Extension Work of the Great School, and opens an entirely new and impressive theme to its Students, Investigators and Critics.

THE GREAT WORK is an exhaustive exposition of The Constructive Principle of Nature in Individual life, covering the Ethical Section of the Scientific Formulary for Independent Spiritual Self-Development, with an explanation of the "Technical Work" and of certain subsidiary Disciplines and Exercises.

It defines and explains the School of Natural Science and for the first time in history furnishes to its Origin, Character, Methods and Purposes.

The work nears the close with "The Mark of the Master" and a scientific analysis of "The Transition Called Death" carrying the reader to the doorway of the succeeding volume—in a final chapter entitled "The Passing of the Master"—from the plane of Earth into and beyond the dark "Magnetic Field" outward and upward through "Nature's Brilliant Barriers" into the dazzling splendor of the "Real Spiritual World."

Because of lateness of publication we are urging our friends to send Holiday Orders without delay—and to accompany them with cash payments—by P. O. or Express Orders or Bank Draft. Price, $2.

Letter From an Old Time Worker, Now In England.

To the readers of The Progressive Thinker:

I have often thought I might interest some of my old friends and acquaintences scattered up and down the Middle West, by writing a few lines occasionally from this side the great Atlantic. It has been quite a long time since anything from my pen has appeared in the columns of The Progressive Thinker, although at one time I was a frequent contributor. Times have changed, however, with me, and from being an itinerant lecturer, traveling up and down the country working for the cause of truth, as I believe (for the devil as my orthodox friends believed), I am now rather an active business man, with my time pretty well filled in various ways, so that my time for writing letters to newspapers is very limited. I am doing fairly well in my business, but my mind often wanders back over the field I formerly traveled, and I remember many pleasant days spent among friends in several states.

One of my last trips in the interest of our philosophy was through Northern Minnesota, and I often think of friends I made in the lovely park region, as it is called. One of the pleasant remembrances I have of that trip was a few weeks spent at Wheaton, a little out of the park region, it is true, but where at that time a good strong interest in our philosophy prevailed. I am somewhat afraid, however, that many of the best workers have left that point, an outbreak of Canadian emigration fever having broken out among them.

Two earnest workers, Mr. O. F. Brown and his esteemed wife, moved away to Washington soon after my visit, to try their fortunes in that far off western region. I hope they have prospered, for they well deserved success. They were of the right stamp of Spiritualists. Many others I remember, though some of the names I do not readily call to mind. Eagle Bend, Alexandria and some other points I visited, and I trust there is still a good interest in that section.

One thing made a vivid impression on my mind while traveling in Northern and Central Minnesota, and that was the preponderance of the German Catholic element. It was my ambition to get in as many lectures as possible, for I thought I saw a great need. In small towns I noticed very large churches with two spires or towers instead of one, buildings which must have cost a large amount of money, and must have been a great burden on the farming communities which constituted the principal part of the population. Fat, clean-shaven and well-dressed priests were plentiful on the trains, and these, too, must have taken a good proportion of the fruits of industry to support them.

I contrasted their condition with my own at the time. While every town had a large Catholic church, spiritual societies (much less Spiritualist churches) were few and very far between. At every small town the priests could gather a good congregation and be assured a hearty welcome; the Spiritual worker had to make long journeys and take mighty slim chances sometimes when he did stop.

Wheaton, with its own church and active society was like an oasis in the desert of Sahara. I hope it is still doing a good work, and I should very much like to hear from any of the friends I became acquainted with there.

To all my friends and fellow-workers in Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois and Indiana, I would say that although I am out of the public work at present so far as giving lectures on Spiritualist rostrums, my sympathies and best wishes are with all those who are in any way helping to crush out priest-craft and make better conditions for the poor, spiritually or otherwise; to rid the world of the war-spirit; to build up a better system of government in all countries; to help humanity onward and upward to better and brighter conditions.

I look to the new liberal government of England to help wipe out the evils of a State Church, and to the New Education Act which will soon be passed by the English Parliament, to do still more for England's people.

BOOK REVIEWS.

True Spiritualism. By. Rev. R. Swinburne Clymer.

The reader of this book will concede that it is very radical in its thought on various subjects, some of which do not seem to be exactly akin to Spiritualism. It is a trenchant reply to the works of one John E. Roberts, who undertakes to demolish Spiritualism. Published by the Philosophical Publishing Co., Allentown, Pa. Price $2.

Baby-Craft, or Just What to Do for the Baby. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D., Chicago.

Wise practical suggestions and directions for the care of babies, adapted to help and guide the mother in her important duties toward the helpless little ones. Neatly bound in Fairfield linen. Price 25 cents.

Parental Rights and Economic Wrongs. By Virginia M. Butterfield. Stockham Publishing Co., Chicago.

This book appeals to all possible parents, and will also be read with interest by all students of economics. Price 50 cents.

"New Testament Stories Comically Illustrated. Drawings by Watson Heston. With Critical and Humorous Comments upon the Texts." Heston's drawings are incomparable, and excruciatingly funny. Price, in boards, $1.

Forest Home Camp, Mich.

The beautiful white mantle that now covers the earth in our locality, and the pinch of the frost king that nips and nips, does not suggest camp notes, but we know in the course of Nature's movement the time will come when it will sound more appropriate, so we venture to speak of it.

Forest Home Camp will open August 4, 1907, with a fine corps of platform workers. We hope to see our many familiar faces, and many new ones, at our pleasant little camp in Northern Michigan. Many times I have elucidated its beauties and advantages, so that the many readers of our loyal and instructive columns of The Progressive Thinker must be quite familiar. If there are those that would like more instruction they are at liberty to write the secretary, who will promptly respond.

The Aid Society Auxiliary to the association will have a Bazaar in connection with camp, and we kindly ask of personal friends of members of the association and friends of the cause of Spiritualism at large, to please donate some useful, beautiful and attractive pieces to our supply, that will be gratefully received. Now is the time to make something.

THE PATHWAY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT.

Or, the Pathway of the Spirit Traced.

By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

ASKING FOR ENLIGHTENMENT.

Although aware that the old straw of religious controversy has been many times thrashed with little outpouring of wheat, I still would be glad to see "giant thinkers" cross swords in friendly combat and awkaken the masses from mental lethargy, and this in renewing subscription to your valuable and unique paper, through which you exert great effort in extermination of some concepts of Deity, I implore further enlightenment from logical writers in both radical and orthodox-Spiritualist ranks in regard to the practical utility of substituting "Duty and Justice Performed" for the advancement of harmonious conditions, in place of "religious ethics." That is to say, if duty and justice are the web and woof in daily acts performed towards the spiritual development of humanity at large, religion, (which is made synonymous in power with junior gods that play in the drama of salvation), will in time become wholly obsolete.

But, let me say first, that I am not attempting to formulate infallible postulates—and, second, that I am seeking friendly criticism and clear-cut arguments in the interest of disproving if possible, the truth of any statement I may make in the following questions:

1. Is religion, as taught, actually necessary for moral growth?

2. Would not the masses be greatly benefitted spiritually if compelled to do their duty and give equal justice to all, instead of admitting the weak, proxy element of religious enthusiasm as a factor of moral upliftment?

3. Can so-called religious principles alone develop the soul to its highest possible attainment?

4. Is it logical or proper to consider religious ceremonies equivalent in power of purification of the inner life, to moral acts and immanent duties performed in the arena of everyday life?

5. Can genuine moral principles, as defined or accepted as the foundation and embodiment of true soul character by the highest influences, be safely intermixed with the (sometimes) very uncertain qualities of "religious" ethics? Will they work in union and each prove an equal factor for the development of soul qualities?

6. Is not "religion," in its native heath, the outgrowth of ghostly superstition and irrational concepts? Does it not stand in the same relation as substitute for duty and justice performed, as does Vicarious Atonement and imaginary Saviors in the minds of unreasoning multitudes?

7. Is not the study of the Principles of Nature and living up to its obvious dictates a more interesting equivalent for the promotion of the ethical status of the soul-life than cruciating gods and the worshiping of mythical mediators that ever stand ready in imagination to shield the enthusiastic hypnotic from the penalty of criminal acts?

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Price, $1.

"Longley's Beautiful Songs." A new edition comprising in one volume the four parts heretofore published, to which is added part five, also a number of the author's most popular songs, including "Only a Thin Veil Between Us" and its "Companion Piece." Cloth, 75 cents. Boards, 50 cents.

"The Spiritual Significance, or, Death as an Event in Life." By Lilian Whiting. One of Miss Whiting's most suggestive, intensely interesting, spiritual books. It is laden with rich, thoughtful spirituality. Price $1.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood. Professor Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents in succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. Price, 25 cents.

SOMETHING'S HAPPENED! FOR WOMEN'S SAKE. SOMETHING KILLED!

READERS LISTEN SHARP, DON'T MISS—BEST THING EVER HAPPENED!

Hundred years coming, here at last, full grown—so startling will say it's impossible—but wait, don't worry—Ladies, Your Prayer Answered.

Washing machine: swallows wash boards.

THERE'S NO MORE WASH DAY!—IT'S DEAD! LAID AWAY! WIPED OUT FOREVER!

The world's watched for the man to cut wash day in two. He lives—taken more than half—left only minutes—cut so much wash day's all over, changed—there's new way cleaning clothes—different from anything known—new principles, ideas, methods, NEW EVERYTHING. Wonderful, but true, family washing cleaned with no more work than getting a simple meal, less time—no rubbing, squeezing, pounding, packing, pressing, no injury—no drudgery—that's post-Good-bye wash boards, washing machines, tub-mangles—throw them away—the EASY WAY is here to bless humanity. Women have prayed for death of wash day—for clean clothes without rubbing—rubbing health, looks—when they could wash, get dinner, see friends, indulge in recreation without fatigue—when women thought no more of washing clothes than to get a simple meal. That glorious day has come. The world's full wash boards, so-called washing machines, yet wash day same as ever—still long, dreary day—no easier, no shorter, no better. Use wash board or washing machine, its drudgery, long hours, hard work—backache—a day no woman forgets. Invention that killed wash day, named EASY WAY—name tells whole story—easy on clothes—easy used—kept clean—handled—easy on women—makes washing easy—easy to buy and sell. Not called a machine—powers inside concealed—caution the way it gets dirt—has awful appetite for dirt—increases more it gets—goes after all the dirt in all the clothes at same time—little, but mighty—silent, but powerful—uses no spirits, yet works in darkness. OPERATED ON STOVE—move knob occasionally—that's all—scarcely anything to do but wait between batches—child can do it. All iron and steel—always ready—sets away on shelf. Entirely unlike old methods. Verily, wash day is dead—EASY WAY settled that—woman's joy and satisfaction. Less than an hour cleans washing which before took all day—cleans all clothes, finest laces, curtains, etc., in about one-tenth time without rubbing, scouring, pounding, pressing—without chemicals to injure goods. Saves $2 days drudgery yearly—makes woman's hardest work easiest household duty—saves clothes, labor, fuel, health, looks. Surprises all—sounds strange, is strange, but listen, it's no experiment, going on daily. You can do it.

Blessing the Inventor.

J. McGEE, Tenn., writes:—"One young lady cleaned day's washing by old method in one hour with EASY WAY. Another in 45 minutes. Everything as clean as could be." E. CRAMER, Tex., writes:—"Received Easy Way. Gave it a thorough trial. After ten minutes

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 35 CHICAGO, ILL., FEBRUARY 16, 1907 NO. 899

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM?

What Is Its Mission Here on Earth?

What is pure Spiritualism?

What is its mission here on earth?

Or, has it fulfilled its mission, and is it now to lose itself in the doctrine of Theosophy?

It is said, "By their fruits ye shall know them." What are the fruits of Spiritualism to-day? We find gifted writers and speakers. There is truth and error expressed in beautiful language. There is diversity of opinion and faith, leading to discussion and controversy. There is spiritual phenomena, and there is a kind helped along by fraudulend mediums. There is the doctrine of reincarnation, and this, in the most unpleasant and unpalatable—the most insidious growth of all.

While the Salvation Army and some other denominations; the Temperance Union and different societies are working for a purpose, are doing good in the world, the Spiritualists are building up a sort of Tower of Babel, and all the earnest efforts of Mr. Francis or the influence of The Progressive Thinker cannot save the Cause or even a fragment of pure Spiritualism, unless there is greater harmony of thought and unity of effort and purpose among believers in Spiritualism. This is only a little of what has been in my mind of late.

In the years agone, I often wondered why Spiritualists were not proving their superior wisdom, and demonstrating their professed kindness and charity towards mankind by striving to create better conditions, and by founding homes, asylums and building temples of learning; yes, I have been doing a deal of thinking, wondering and criticising, and that is about all I have been doing to help the cause along.

There is a change. Now, I am going to do something, even if it is only to add another misshapen bit of material to that already tottering tower the Spiritualists have been building. Much depends upon The Progressive Thinker, for I know that Mr. Francis is interested in humanity as well as in the success of Spiritualism, and I hope to make it clear that I am working for the welfare and happiness of the children of earth while in this life and in the life to come.

I deeply regret that there should be any difference of opinion among Spiritualists, and it is with feeling of sadness that I find myself in direct opposition to the thought of some of my favorite writers and speakers. This is in regard to the, to me, horrible doctrine of reincarnation. Think you that I am making it too strong when I say that this hideous doctrine, even with all of its "brotherhood of man" teachings, will not harmonize with our spiritual philosophy, and if it gains a foothold it can only mean the death blow of Spiritualism, or rather the destruction or blotting out of the name Spiritualism?

A few more words before I leave you. Oo-night while reading The Progressive Thinker I seemed to have a special interest in its columns. I am always interested, but this time I seemed to be feeling that I must search closely or I would miss something of special interest, and when I found Miss Harlow's article, calling to Spiritualists, and urging them to unite on some question or work, and had read about the organization, or rather the rally call of Dr. Alex Caird, I thought I must have found what I was seeking, for I am in sympathy with their thoughts and efforts to accomplish something and to establish harmony in the ranks, and then all at once came a strong impression—and I am not at all visionary—and this impression seemed so clear that higher intelligences were in charge, that a spiritualizing process is taking place on earth which would separate the wheat from the chaff. The dawning of a new day is near, when the spiritualized, irrespective of creed or faith, will unite in their works of charity and their crusade against sin. May the powers that rule hasten that day, for it has seemed that the world was drifting into a hopeless state of indifference to fraud, dishonesty, corruption and selfishness. Have Spiritualists a part in the work for mankind?

Yours for humanity and onward progression. C. CURTISS GARDNER.

CHARACTER BUILDING.

Beautiful thoughts make beautiful lives,
For every word and deed
Lies in the thought that prompted it,
As the flowers lie in the seed.

Back of each action lay the thought
We nourished until it grew
Into a word or into a deed,
That marked our life-work through.

Gracious words and kindly ways,
Deeds that are high and true;
Slanderous words, and hasty words,
And deeds we bitterly rue.

The garden of Life it beareth well,
It will repay our care,
But the blossom must always and ever be
Like the seed we're planting there.

"Keep thine heart," the Life Guide saith,
"With daily, diligent care,
For out of it are the issues of life,"
Be they foul or be they fair.

On things that are pure and of good report
Our hearts must daily dwell,
If we would see Life's garden full
Of blossoms that please us well.

For beautiful thoughts make beautiful lives,
And every word and deed,
Lies in the thought that prompted it,
As the flower lies in the seed.

There is a poem hillsides repeat,
Copied by hedges, sung on the street.
How rhyme the colors, purple and gold
We're by the poet told.
Two good neighbors dwell in harmony,
Two good neighbors we rejoice to see,
Bright purple aster, bright goldenrod.

The Search of Science
For Light Upon a Future Life

THOUGH A MAN DIE SHALL HE LIVE AGAIN? SINCE THE BEGINNING OF ITS HISTORY HUMANITY HAS BEEN ENDEAVORING TO PIERCE THE DARKNESS BEYOND THE GRAVE, SEEKING LIGHT UPON THIS QUESTION OF THE AGES.

TO COUNTLESS MILLIONS FOR CENTURIES THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL HAS BEEN AN ASSURED AND COMFORTING FACT, THE LIFE BEYOND AS CONFIDENTLY EXPECTED AS THE COMING OF THE MORROW'S SUN. BUT MERE BELIEF DOES NOT SATISFY SCIENCE; IT ASKS, "WHAT IS THAT LIFE, AND WHERE IS IT SPENT?"

"ARE THERE SUCH THINGS AS REVELATIONS TO MAN FROM THE SPIRIT WORLD?" "CAN A DEPARTED BEING COMMUNICATE WITH ONE STILL IN THE FLESH?" "ARE SO-CALLED GHOSTS REALITIES?"

FOR TWENTY-FOUR YEARS THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH, WITH HEADQUARTERS IN LONDON AND A MEMBERSHIP EXTENDING THROUGHOUT THE WORLD, HAS BEEN DELVING INTO THESE MYSTERIES. ITS WORK HAS ATTRACTED MUCH MORE ATTENTION OF RECENT YEARS AND HAS BEEN CONDUCTED WITH CONSIDERABLE ENERGY, AND YET ITS BRIGHTEST MINDS SEEM UNABLE TO LAY HOLD OF A SURE THREAD RUNNING BEHIND THE MYSTERIOUS CURTAIN THAT CLOAKS THE FUTURE.

SUMMING UP RESULTS OF INVESTIGATIONS, HOWEVER, A LEADING MEMBER ASSERTS THAT "THERE IS A BASIS OF FACT IN MANY STORIES OF HAUNTINGS AND APPARITIONS," THAT "THERE IS EVIDENCE TO PROVE THE CONTINUITY OF INDIVIDUAL LIFE AFTER DEATH," AND THAT "COMMUNICATION DOES TAKE PLACE BETWEEN THOSE IN THIS AND IN ANOTHER CONDITION OF LIFE."

From the North American, Philadelphia, Pa. Copyright, and published by Special Permission.

During the twenty-four years' career of the Society for Psychical Research its work on this side of the Atlantic has been conducted by an American branch, which has included some of the leading scientists of this country.

Connected with the organization either as officers or corresponding members have been Professor William James of Harvard, once president of the general body; Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University; Dr. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University; Dr. W. R. Newbold, of the University of Pennsylvania; Professor E. C. Pickering, of Harvard, and Professor J. H. Hyslop.

Recently, however, the American branch was discontinued as an integral part of the general, or British society, and some of its members have organized the American Institute for Psychical Research, to work along similar lines.

"The new institute," stated a news item, announcing its formation, "exists for the purpose of finding out, scientifically, all there is to be known about 'spooks.' Members are expected to contribute actual facts about apparitions, telepathy, clairvoyance, mediumistic phenomena, visions of the dying, coincidences, illusions, hallucinations and the like."

Professor James H. Hyslop, one of the moving spirits in the formation of this new society, asks an endowment of $1,000,000 with which to carry on the work. Investigations of psychic phenomena are expensive, he states. Twenty years' study of Mrs. Piper, a celebrated medium, cost, probably, $75,000.

Careful investigators, called by some frivolous persons "ghost detectors," have long been employed in nearly all parts of the world by the English society. They run down every case of apparition, ghost walking, materialization, ghost photographs, telepathy and the like of which they hear.

It doesn't make any difference how long a time is required to investigate an alleged case of ghostly appearance. The investigator is after facts, and he follows the trail until he unearths every particle of evidence. The characters of witnesses are looked into as carefully as the stories they tell.

When a case has been fully worked out and all data bearing upon it secured, a full report is written and forwarded to London. This is full of signed statements and circumstantial detail.

It is gone over by experts, and if they find anything in it worthy of preservation it is filed away in the archives, together with reports made by hundreds of other investigators.

Over twenty-one large volumes of research work have been published by the society, and it has, in addition, bales of records of investigations made by its members and agents.

A. J. Balfour, formerly prime minister of England, was at one time president of the society, and the Bishop of Ripon is a vice-president. Among other members are leading scientists in all parts of the world.

Since the organization of the society, half a dozen or more of its most intelligent and enthusiastic members and investigators have died, including several former presidents and secretaries, but these, it seems, have been unable to bridge the mysterious gulf between the known and the unknown worlds, as no tidings of enlightenment have come back from the "fathomless shores."

Even the society, as such, will venture no official opinion regarding the data it has collected, although its members are free to express their conclusions at will.

Gathering and carefully substantiating all the evidence in a single case, the society says, simply, "Here it is; these are the facts; form your own conclusions."

For instance, among the notable cases preserved in the society's archives is the following, furnished by a gentleman of Boston, whose character and word are beyond question:

"In 1867 my only sister, a girl of 18 years, died suddenly of cholera in St. Louis. My attachment for her was very strong, and the blow a severe one to me. Later I became a commercial traveler, and it was on a trip in 1876 that the following happening took place.

"I had 'drummed' the city of St. Joseph, Mo., and had gone to my room at a hotel to send in my orders. They were unusually large, and I was in a happy frame of mind. I was not thinking of my dead sister, or in any manner reflecting on the past. The hour was noon, and the sun was shining cheerfully into my room.

"While smoking a cigar and writing out my orders, I suddenly became conscious that some one was sitting at my left, with one arm resting on the table.

"Quick as a flash I turned, and distinctly saw the form of my dead sister, and for a brief moment or so looked her squarely in the face.

"So sure was I that it was she that I sprang forward in delight, calling her by name. As I did so the apparition instantly vanished.

"I was near enough to touch her, had it been a physical possibility, and noted her features, expression and details of dress. She appeared as if alive. Her eyes looked kindly and perfectly natural into mine.

"Her skin was so lifelike that I could see the glow or moisture on its surface, and on the whole there was no change in her appearance otherwise than when alive."

A remarkable confirmation came later when the young man related the experience to his family. When he stated that he had seen a bright red line, or scratch, on the side of his sister's face, his mother almost swooned, and declared that there could be no doubt that the apparition was indeed that of the young woman.

It appeared that no one but the mother was aware of the scratch. In preparing the body of her daughter for burial the mother had accidentally scratched the side of the face with a pin.

Not wishing others of the family to see the slight mutilation, the mother had covered it with powder, and she alone was aware of its existence. Certainly the brother knew nothing of the scratch.

A number of cases as remarkable have been investigated, every effort being made to substantiate them as far as possible, and to determine the reliability of sources. Indeed, it is only after the scientists of the society are thoroughly satisfied as to the truthfulness of any case that it is permitted to go into the archives.

Especially interested in this branch of the work was Professor F. W. H. Myers, of England, now dead. He collected a large number of instances of recognized apparitions occurring more than a year after death, and in commenting upon them wrote:

"Instead of describing a 'ghost' as a dead person permitted to communicate with the living, let us define it as a manifestation of persistent personal energy—or as an indication that some kind of force is being exercised after death which is in some way connected with a person previously known on earth."

This force or influence, he thought, "may be some residue of the force or energy which the person generated while yet alive."

That might account for an ordinary wraith of shadowy outlines and speechless presence, but how about a ghost with so much of the energy of life that it is able to speak?

A Ghost That Spoke.

Such a case was reported by Mrs. P——, of an English town. On Christmas eve of 1869 she and her husband, with their little child, retired to their bedroom before the usual hour in order that they might start upon a journey early the next morning.

Mr. P——, who had seemed in failing health for some time, and was moody and dejected, at once went to bed, but Mrs. P—— simply lay down on top of the covers, expecting the baby to awake in a few minutes, as was its custom.

"About 9:30 o'clock," wrote Mrs. P——, "to my great astonishment I saw a gentleman standing at the foot of the bed, dressed as a naval officer and with a cap on his head.

"From the position of the light in the room, the face was in shadow to me, and the more so that the visitor was leaning upon his arms which rested on the footrail of the bedstead.

"I was too astonished to be afraid, but simply wondered who it could be, and instantly touching my husband's shoulder—his face was turned from me—I said, 'Willie, who is this?'

"My husband turned, and for a second or two lay looking in intense astonishment at the intruder. Then, lifting himself up a little, he shouted, 'What on earth are you doing here, sir?'

"Then the form, slowly drawing himself into an upright position, said in a commanding, yet reproachful voice, 'Willie,' 'Willie!'

"My husband, greatly agitated, sprang out of bed, when the figure moved calmly and slowly toward the wall and disappeared, as it were, into the wall.

"Mr. P—— seized the lamp and searched the house, without finding any one. Upon returning to the room he told me that the person or figure we had seen was his father, who had been dead fourteen years.

"Some weeks later my husband became very ill, and confided to me that he was in financial difficulties, and, when his father had appeared to him, was about to take a step that might have led to ruin, perhaps worse."

Next is a case in which the apparition was not seen by the person most interested, but by another, who could have no motive for deception:

Mrs. Clarke, of London, writes: "One afternoon in August, 1864, I was sitting reading in the veranda of our house in Barbadoes. My black nurse was wheeling my baby in a perambulator in the garden.

Apparition Seen by a Nurse.

"I got up, after some time, to go into the house, when this black woman said to me, 'Missis,' who was that gentleman that was talking to you just now?'

"'There was no one talking to me,' I replied.

"'Oh! yes, dere was, Missis,' she insisted; 'a very pale gentleman, very tall, and he talked to you, and you was very rude, for you never answered him.'

"I repeated there was no one, and got rather cross with the woman. She begged me to write down the day, for she knew she had seen some one. I did, and in a few days I heard of the death of my brother in Tobago.

"The negro woman had never seen him, but she described him accurately, stating that he was leaning over the back of my chair and seemed anxious that I should speak to him."

Recently the experience of a well-known Boston lawyer was submitted to the American Society. In 1889 this man made a solemn compact with a college mate to the effect that when either died he would, if possible, make his subsequent existence known to the other.

Ten years later, or in 1899, the lawyer's friend died suddenly, but it was only a few weeks ago that the incident occurred which he regards as a fulfillment of the promise.

Sitting in his apartments, in full possession of his faculties, the lawyer, without experiencing any transitory state, suddenly found himself in a strange city, upon a greensward filled with sunlight. Approaching him was his dead friend, who smiled, extended his hand and attempted to speak, but could not.

When the lawyer stepped forward to grasp the hand of his lost friend, he found himself once more in his library, wide awake and with his brain perfectly clear. The next night the vision was repeated.

Upon his strange excursion the lawyer seemed to be accompanied by another friend, who was still living, although in another city. Shortly after the visions he heard that this friend had been strangely ill, and during the forty-eight hours in which the visions occurred had been unconscious.

A great number of similar cases of "appearances" have been collected by the society, and the persons witnessing the phenomena were found, in the majority of cases, to be entirely reliable.

All of which leads Edward T. Bennett, formerly assistant secretary of the society, to conclude that "there is evidence—small though it may be in amount—which is sufficient to prove the continuity of individual life after death, and that communication does take place between those in this and in another condition of life."

"I believe," said Prof. F. W. H. Myers, "that telepathy—the transference of thought through other than sensory channels—exists both as between embodied and disembodied spirits.

"There is, I hold, a continuous series of manifestations of such power, beginning with thought transference experiments and hypnotism at a distance, proceeding through experimental apparitions and apparitions coincident with crises of death, and ending with apparitions after death—the results of the continued exercise of the same energy by the spirits of the departed.

"'Ghosts' must, therefore, as a rule, represent, not conscious or central currents of intelligence, but mere automatic projections from consciousness which have their centres elsewhere."

Such a "projection" of consciousness from another world—taking a recognizable shape—may have been the following case to which the scientists of the society attach considerable importance:

A well-known physician of Philadelphia purchased a new home in a desirable locality, and had it handsomely furnished. His mother, then dead ten years had frequently advised him to settle in that neighborhood, stating that, if permitted, she would return from the other world to witness his prosperity.

One afternoon, soon after the new home was accepted, the physician's wife and two daughters were seated in the parlor. Suddenly they became conscious that some one else was in the room, and then saw an elderly woman standing in contemplative attitude before one of the handsome pictures on the wall.

The physician's wife recognized the figure as that of her husband's deceased mother. Nothing was said, although all saw the figure plainly, and in a little while it vanished.

Says Her Father Reappeared.

Another instance is that of a young English girl who lost her father and was left without a near relative. Of religious training, the girl was tortured by fear that her father had not entered a state of bliss in the other world, and prayed long and earnestly that if he were in peace and happiness his spirit should be permitted to appear to comfort her.

One afternoon, when she was lying upon a couch in an agony of doubt, she saw the form of her father beside her. He looked upon her with a happy, reassuring smile, made a gesture indicating that all was well and faded away.

A teacher, spending the night in a Swiss chateau, was surprised to see an old man seated at a table in the room, some time after midnight, busily writing.

When he spoke to the landlord about it the next morning he was informed that the famous Voltaire had done much of his work in that room, and had been seen by several other persons.

"We may suppose," said Professor Myers, "that the incarnate intelligence may project a picture into some living mind without being aware that he has done so, and, moreover, that this picture, as realized by the living person, may differ considerably from the picture existing in the discarnate mind."

Much of the society's investigation has been along the lines of Spiritualistic manifestations through mediums, such as "spirit rappings." Once the Rev. W. S. Moses, one of the original members and a medium, was stopping with some friends on the Isle of Wight, when a manifestation occurred as they were seated around a table.

The message purported to come from one Abraham Florentine, who said he had died shortly before at Brooklyn, N. Y. None of the party had ever heard of the man, so his communications were carefully written down. He told them a number of facts concerning himself.

Dr. Eugene Crowell, of Brooklyn, was written to and asked to make inquiries regarding Florentine. He did so, and found that every statement made by the "spirit" was correct.

There had been an Abraham Florentine; he had died when stated, and all the events of his life which had been related to the Isle of Wight gathering of strangers were fully substantiated.

Dr. Richard Hodgson, secretary of the American branch of the society, made a careful investigation of manifestations that came through a famous medium, and gave this as his conclusion:

"I cannot profess to have any doubt but that the chief 'communicators' are veritably the personalities that they claim to be; that they have survived the change we call death, and that they have directly communicated with us, whom we call living, through the medium's entranced organism."

Such conclusions, however, are those of individual members. The society itself has never attempted to formulate an official opinion. In fact, of two lines of investigation, Mr. Bennett wrote:

"A few cases of 'haunted houses,' some of them quite recent, afford evidence of phenomena of sight and sound incapable of normal explanation.

"As to determining the source of such phenomena, or the means by which they are produced, no progress seems to have been made.

"In the case of apparitions, the position is similar. The reality of apparitions, both of the 'living' and of the 'dead,' apart from all possible explanation of illusion or delusion, or any kind of imposture or fraud, appears to be incontestably proved in hundreds, if not in thousands of cases.

"Here again, however, as to the nature or source of the phenomena, we are quite in the dark."

BABYHOOD AND MOTHERHOOD.

What is sweeter, what is dearer than a pretty little miss
That invites your very spirit to a coddle and a kiss?
What is better, what is purer than the nectar one's soul sips
When the soul is in the sipping, from a pair of baby lips?

What is richer than the feeling of a mother for her child,
As it lies upon her bosom, seeming wholly reconciled?
What is nearer to the heaven than the harmony and peace
In the thought that life eternal need not let this sweetness cease?

What would all this world be doing without mothers everywhere,
Loving, hoping and producing for herself a life of care,
And expressing through her being baby spirits from her own?
What would be the worth of living in a world of men alone?

But alas! no man to being could unfold upon this plane,
Without Nature's every function; without spirit's vast domain;
Without Mothers, Fathers, Babies, Love and Heaven here and now?
Blessed Mothers, Blessed Babies; unto you we make our bow!

DR. T. WILKINS.

A VALENTINE.

In these days one little memory,
Softly doth my heart entwine;
And of other years I'm thinking,
When I was your Valentine.

Violets grew along the pathway,
In the grass beneath our feet;
Was it but prophetic that we Often crushed their graces sweet?

Would your life have been lived better
Had I told you "I am thine;"
When in youth's glad spring you asked me
"Always be my Valentine?"

Ah! I know not, but when weary,
Filled with longing and regret;
You are bravely struggling onward
'Mid earth's noisy din and fret;

Then, sometimes, I steal beside you,
Clasp your tired hand in mine;
Whisper "o'er death's shining river,
Love will find its Valentine."

IN MEMORIAM.

Moses Hull has gone from sight,
To live within the realm of light.
He lingers near in spirit life
To cheer his sad and lonely wife,
And loving message he will give,
While in the body she may live.
Oft our sister will rejoice,
While listening to his loving voice,
In sweet communion with her soul,
While time goes on in endless roll;
And when he speaks, her life to cheer,
We know she'll feel his presence near.
And know that with his last drawn breath
His spirit did not end in death.
His hallowed love, his love divine,
Our sister dear, we'll e'er be thine
Until he takes you by the hand,
In welcome to the spirit land.

THE CHURCH VS. SPIRITUALISM.

As Expressed by an Ex-Catholic—"Many strong believers in this Catholic faith have drifted out into the ranks of Spiritualists, and they make the best kind of Spiritualists, because from infancy they have been breathing the very atmosphere of spirit manifestation. Their lives have been so intertwined with the mystic and supernatural, that they fail to see any dividing line between the church and Spiritualism, when Spiritualism is hedged around by spiritual safeguards."

By the church I mean the "Roman Catholic," for the other so-called orthodox Christian churches are but offshoots at best.

The church says: "Give me the child until it is ten years old and you can have it afterwards," and again it says: "Once a Catholic, always a Catholic;" in other words, "As the twig is bent, so the tree is inclined.

The church is largely right in this so far as all Protestant denominations are concerned.

The Catholic, grounded in the faith, rarely leaves the "Mother church" for any of its offshoots; but the church reckons without her host when she discounts Theosophy, Christian Science, Spiritualism, etc.

That the church bitterly opposes Spiritualism goes without saying, and no doubt this feeling is largely engendered by the fact that there are so many men and women in the ranks of the Spiritualists posing as mediums and GRAFTING FOR MONEY, without one jot or tittle of mediumistic power, who give to the public nothing tangible, nothing practical, nothing trustworthy, who feed like leeches off the broken hearts of the gullible and those other who exercise NO JUDGMENT WHATEVER IN SIFTING THE TARES FROM THE WHEAT.

The study of the occult is very appealing to the Catholic who permits no priest or bishop to do his thinking for him, and the church, while bitterly opposing Spiritualism, is yet so very closely allied to Spiritualism that it is the easiest thing in the world for the educated Catholic to slip the leash that binds him to the old faith, and enter into the study of spirit manifestation and power, and finally become an ardent devotee of Spiritualism, when Spiritualism is truly spiritual, and when those claiming to be specially gifted with mediumistic power tread closely the border line of righteousness in living.

Let us see wherein the church and Spiritualism run parellel lines.

In the creed we read, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints," etc. What is this but a tacit acknowledgment that those of us on this side of the grave can communicate with those gone beyond?

In the "Litany of the Saints," we pray to the saints. "Saint Michael prays for us. St. Catherine prays for us," etc:

What is this but an appeal to the spirit world for help and guidance, and an acknowledgment that the spirit world can hear, understand and help us. A Catholic lady who lived in Spain for some time, told me that a Spanish priest told her to burn incense in her home Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and pray for a blessing on her home while she burnt it, and that a blessing would follow.

The church believes in the changing of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ on the altar during the sacrifice of the mass, and the church may be nearer right than scoffers know. Spiritualists surely could admit the truth of the belief of the church.

The church believes in praying for the repose of the souls of the departed, quoting from Paul that "It is a whole and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from their sins."

This passage, I believe, has been cut out from the King James version.

Does not the good Spiritualist also believe that those who have gone on before can be helped by their prayer?

The Saints of the church saw visions and talked with the dead, and because of this power given them they have been canonized by the church and counted holy, and in favor with the Lord; but if you or I outside the pale of the church, should enter the claim that we too, saw visions and talked with the so-called dead, the church would call it blasphemy on our part and bitterly denounce us. I wonder where the church got the right to claim that only under its banner men and women were endowed with the divine gift of mediumship?

What right has the church to claim that saints only dwell within its fold? It is presumption of the highest order to make this claim.

At one time I was relating to a religeuse my experience in a haunted house where I walked into the spirit of a man, and this worshipful nun folded her hands on her lap, rolled her eyes up to the ceiling and said, "Oh, it was the devil, the devil, who appeared to you in the form of a man;"

Now, mind you, if she or any other member of her order had my experience, they would have claimed it was a vision sent by God; but because I was outside the pale of the church it was the devil's work. Why, I wonder?

There is no virtue in negative virtue, and the woman out in the world alone and poor and taking life's hard knocks and still protecting the honor and dignity of her womanhood, is surely deserving a thousandfold the credit due the nun protected by bolts and bars and religious surroundings.

And there are thousands of just such women living beautiful lives in the midst of almost total depravity; but this good sister pats herself on the back and thinks she is holier than her sister out in the world, but she is not.

Many strong believers in the Catholic faith have drifted out into the ranks of the Spiritualists, because from infancy they have been breathing the very atmosphere of spirit manifestation. Their lives have been so intertwined with the mystic and supernatural, that they fail to see any dividing line between the church and Spiritualism, when Spiritualism is hedged around by spiritual safeguards.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

And the Excellent Results That Flow Therefrom.

I promised the readers of The Progressive Thinker I would report the progress from time to time of our circle.

We still are getting the lights, only if anything they are becoming more brilliant. As we progress, the rappings are becoming more pronounced, and are given from different localities.

We have a little telegraph sounder without any wires or other connections whatever; it sits on the table in the center of the circle. A brother of one of the circle, who has passed out, and was a telegraph operator, does the manipulating, and the way he works that sounder at times is a caution. We are now looking for a telegrapher to catch what he is saying.

Our trumpet work is becoming more pronounced, and our whole work is progressing finely.

But what I wish to report is the remarkable experience of one of our circle, while controlled by an Indian. The reason for this is, there is quite a story attached to it, and I thought it might be interesting to your many readers.

The one who is controlled I shall call Brother B, for convenience. B. never saw his father, for he (the father) left his home before B. was born.

The father got the Pike's Peak craze in the year 1859, sold out his business, fitted himself out and started west. The family heard from him from time to time, until after he arrived at the Peak, and he, finding nothing there, started south, and was last heard of at Pueblo, Colorado. That must have been forty-five or six years ago.

Now you might say the first installment of the story ends.

The first time they got control of B's. organism, a brother of B. tried it first, but could not get very good control, so he withdrew. Then an Indian got hold of B. and the story was told by the Indian in a broken way, with a good deal of Indian talk mixed with a little English, about a white man named Zack. It appeared Zack befriended the Indian by getting him from under a dead pony that had fallen on him, and broke the Indian's leg; and from this on the Indian became greatly attached to Zack. The Indian gave his name as Gray Wolf, a Cherokee. He says "him no chief, only big Indian."

It seems Zack, in his ramblings, wandered away off into Mexico in his search for gold (yellow sand, as Gray Wolf calls it) up among the Yaqui Indians, who captured him, and were going to burn him at the stake, but Gray Wolf, with some other Indians made a dash and rescued Zack from the Yaquis, and got him away out of that country. Zack, it appears from what the Indian says, got in with some other white men, and they must have struck it rich, somewhere in Colorado, as we understand the Indian.

There was one of the white men whom Gray Wolf calls bad pale-face, wanted Zack's gold, watching his opportunity shoved Zack off a high cliff, some hundred of feet below. The Indian, missing his friend, and suspecting things were not all right, went in search of him, and found his body at the bottom of the cliff. The Indian to revenge the treacherous act, killed the bad pale-face, and as he says, scalped him.

The first time B. was controlled the Indian gave no name to the white man. But B., in his entrancement, took on the conditions and went through the experiences of the white man, and it surely was remarkable. The Yaquis had him in a cave with his hands tied behind him, his legs lashed together. They had him prepared to burn at the stake. He was taken out of the cave to where there was quite an assembly of Indians. They had a fire prepared, to carry out their intentions of burning him, then Gray Wolf with his Indians rushed in and rescued him. The cave B. was in was filled with stalactite columns. He also saw a large drove of ponies in his wanderings, and dark looking men in a field that seemed to be a cotton field. B. saw the white man lying at the bottom of the cliff after he was pushed off.

When B. came out of his first trance his wife asked him if he recognized the white man. B. said he could not, but his countenance looked quite familiar; he had heavy whiskers all over his face, and thought he might have seen him somewhere, but could not place him.

B's father's christian name was Zachariah, but was generally known as Zack, for short. When the name Zack was mentioned by the Indian, B's wife knew it was her husband's father the Indian was trying to tell about. When B. was a boy about everyone who was acquainted with the family noticed a great resemblance of the boy to the father. No doubt it was this resemblance that caused B. to think he had seen him before.

When B. came out of the first trance he was so used up he could not stand for quite awhile. He said he felt as if he had been pounded with a club, and he was so tired.

Gray Wolf says he will try and get the white man Zack there so he can control his son B. When that time comes we expect to get the full particulars.

They have been trying to get control of B. for three years, but could never accomplish it before. R. BAYLES.

TRANSITION.

Great mount of transition and splendor,
Where the glad soul in its beauty will rise,
In that celestial where love will engender
Most of the joys that our earth-life denies.

When from this earth, transmigrating to beauty
Immortal, with glory, our souls will ascend,
Transfixed with love that will prompt us to duty,
True love, like eternity never will end.

Transplendent with beauty the angels are waiting
To welcome us home to that bright, shining shore
Where millions triumphant from earth-life migrating,
Where sadness and sorrow are dispelled evermore.

ST. ANTHONY'S SERMON TO FISHES

Everyone has heard the legend of St. Anthony's preaching to the fishes, but few may have read the sermon which he is said to have delivered. As this sermon contains more sense and less error than is commonly heard in discourses by preachers of the Romish church, we give it at full length as translated from the Italian by a great master of English, Addison.

Traveling in Italy, he met at Padua with the "Life of St. Anthony," "the great saint," he says, "to whom they here pay their devotions. He lies buried in the church dedicated to him at present, though it was formerly consecrated to the Blessed Virgin. There are narrow clefts in the monument that stands over him, where good Catholics rub their beads, and smell his bones, which they say have in them a natural perfume, though very like apoplectic balsam: and that would make one suspect that they rub the marble with it; it is observed that the scent is stronger in the morning than at night."

So much for Addison's visit to the tomb of St, Anthony. Now for his version of the celebrated sermon to the fishes, prefaced by the following explanatory statement:

When the heretics would not regard his preaching, he betook himself to the seashore where the river Marecchia disembogues itself into the Adriatic. He here called the fish together in the name of God, that they might hear his holy word. The fish came swimming towards him in such vast shoals, both from the sea and from the river, that the surface of the water was quite covered with their multitudes. They quickly ranged themselves, according to their several species, into a very beautiful congregation, and, like so many rational creatures, presented themselves before him to hear the word of God. St. Tntonio was so struck with the miraculous obedience and submission of these poor animals, that he found a secret sweetness distilling upon his soul, and at last addressed himself to them in the following words:

"Although the infinite power and providence of God, my dearly beloved fish, discovers itself in all the works of his creation, as in the heavens, in the sun, in the moon and in the stars, in this lower world, in man, and in other perfect creatures, nevertheless the goodness of the Divine Majesty shines out in you more eminently, and appears after a more particular manner, than in any other created beings. For notwithstanding you are comprehended under the name of reptiles, partaking of a middle nature between stones and beasts, and imprisoned in the deep abyss of waters; notwithstanding you tossed among billows, thrown up and down by tempests, deaf to hearing, dumb to speech, and terrible to behold: notwithstanding, I say, these natural disadvantages, the divine greatness shows itself in you after a very wonderful manner. In you are seen the mighty mysteries of an infinite goodness. The Holy Scripture has always made use of you, as the types and shadows of some profound sacrament.

"Do you think that, without a mystery, the first present that God Almighty made to man, was of you, O ye fishes? Do you think that, without a mystery, among all creatures and animals which were appointed for sacrifices, you only were excepted, O ye fishes? Do you think there was nothing meant by our Savior Christ, that next to the paschal lamb he took so much pleasure in the food of you, O ye fishes? Do you think it was by mere chance that, when the Redeemer of the world was to pay a tribute to Caesar, he thought fit to find it in the mouth of a fish? These are all of them so many mysteries and sacraments, that oblige you in a more particular manner to the praises of your Creator.

"It is from God, my beloved fish, that you have received being, life, motion, and sense. It is he that has given you, in compliance with your natural inclinations, the whole world of waters for your habitation. It is he that has furnished it with lodgings, chambers, caverns, grottos, and such magnificent retirements as are not to be met with in the seats of kings, or in the palaces of princes. You have the water for your dwelling, a clear, transparent element, brighter than crystal; you can see from its deepest bottom everything that passes on its surface; you have the eyes of a lynx or of an Argus; you are guided by a secret and unerring principle, delighting in everything that may be beneficial to you, and avoiding everything that may be hurtful; you are carried on by a hidden instinct to preserve yourselves and to propagate your species; you obey in all your actions, works, and motions, the dictates and suggestions of nature, without the least repugnancy or contradiction.

"The colds of winter and the heats of summer, are equally incapable of molesting you. A serene or a clouded sky are indifferent to you. Let the earth abound in fruits, or be cursed with scarcity, it has no influence on your welfare. You live secure in rains and thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes; you have no concerns in the blossoms of spring or in the glowings of summer, in the fruits of autumn or in the frosts of winter. You are not solicitous about hours or days, months, or years, the variableness of the weather or the change of seasons.

"In what dreadful majesty, in what wonderful power, in what amazing providence, did God Almingty distinguish you among all the species of creatures that perished in the universal deluge! You only were insensible of the mischief that had laid waste the whole world.

"All this, as I have already told you, ought to inspire you with gratitude and praise towards the Divine Majesty that has done so great things for you, granted you such particular graces and privileges, and heaped upon you so many distinguishing favors. And since for all this you cannot employ your tongues in the praises of your benefactor, and are not provided with words to express your gratitude, make at least some sign of reverence; bow yourselves at his name; give some show of gratitude, according to the best of your capacities; express your thanks in the most becoming manner that you can, and be not unmindful of all the benefits he has bestowed upon you."

He had no sooner done speaking, but, behold a miracle! The fish, as though they had been endued with reason, bowed down their heads with all the marks of a profound humility and devotion, moving their bodies up and down with a kind of fondness, as approving what had been spoken by the blessed father, St. Antonio. The legend adds, that after many heretics, who were present at the miracle, had been converted by it, the saint gave his benediction to the fish, and dismissed them.

Anxious to Purify.

The Writer Thinks Rules Should Be Formulated Applicable to the Seance Room, which will Protect the Honest Investigator, and Thereby Remove the Loathsome Part Connected with Spiritualism, and which is Recognized as Fraud.

A great deal is said in regard to the lack of interest taken in Spiritualism, laying a great deal of blame at the door of the National Association, minor organizations and individuals as well.

We may be very frank and at the same time very sincere, in placing blame on the shoulders of others, the burden may be already very heavy, our frankness may add very much to the volume of its already heavy load, still we are sincere but altogether unjust.

Let us not lay blame at the door of anyone, for all try to do for the best as they see it, and as things become unfolded to us we will all do better.

I feel as though we should be thankful to all contributors to progress, spiritual thought and unfoldment. The editor who gives impartially the thoughts of these contributors, as varied in their likeness as the faces of men, should have our unceasing gratitude.

The Progressive Thinker, so different from the ordinary, standing out firmly for truth and purity; it comes to us each week, a gentle, refreshing shower of refined thought, causing us to bud out and develop into fuller and higher spirituality.

It would seem to me Spiritualism has a three-fold task to perform or difficulty to surmount, for the reason that all other religions are beliefs founded for the most part if not entirely on theory, whereas, Spiritualism is founded on fact and fact alone, it leaves theorists to theorize upon the fact, but the fact remains.

The sun shines and gives us light and heat, there may be many theories as to how far the sun is from the earth, how large it is, whether it is inhabited or not, etc., but the fact remains that it is the sun, and that it is from that source we have our light and heat.

Many theories have been advanced from time to time, as to the cause of the various phenomena upon which the belief of Spiritualists has been founded; phenomena are a fact, however, and therefore Spiritualists' belief is founded on fact.

Theorize as you please, the sun shines and gives light and heat, it might be a theory that it is a reflection, but without it we know we could not live in our present condition.

Spirits manifest intelligently, by different phases of what we call phenomena, and it is as absurd to presume they are imaginary, as to presume the sun is imaginary, and I have no doubt that if the spirits were withdrawn from their duties here, it would be as serious a matter as if the sun were to cease to give its light and heat.

The narrow path to heaven broadens very much to those who read and study all sides of religious faiths and theories; it is no longer the straight and narrow way, but rather the broad and blossoming fields of love and humanity, where the work is done which brings its reward in an inheritance of happiness and satisfaction beyond the veil.

Love and humanity to mankind, and not only to mankind, but a true nature of love, condescends to love and kindness to animal-kind as well.

A poet says: "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

I would like to add: Might mankind do no needless harm, to nature's ugliest worm.

Many persons may have as many different theories, but the one who proves his theory is up to his neck in hard work, disappointments and ridicule, until he has accomplished it by practical demonstration and application, then the fellows with the other theories will fall in line.

That is where Spiritualism is to-day, it is not a theory but a fact and it has got to be proven to individuals, by demonstration applied in a practical way.

The three-fold task of awakening interest, and gaining popular if not universal favor of our cause I wish to divide into three divisions.

First division, by overcoming stubbornness and awakening a desire for spiritual knowledge and manifestation; overcoming superstition, by reasoning the naturalness of what we term spiritual life, which is really and naturally a continuation of this life, and as real and natural as life on this planet, and by the unfoldment of spiritual philosophy, awakening the dormant spiritual faculties to a perception of the realities of life outside the routine of the usual happenings of every-day visible life.

Superstition, stubbornness and ignorance of the philosophy of Spiritualism are the first barriers in the way of individual investigation and development of the spiritual senses.

Do not misunderstand me, for I do not mean that because a person does not believe in Spiritualism he is ignorant in the broad sense of mental development, for on the contrary among the unbelievers in Spiritualism are the brightest of men and women, who have an abundance of knowledge, although, they may be very ignorant of spiritual philosophy, as it is understool by the development of the spiritual senses.

There are also many who experience manifestations of a spiritual character, who are superstitious and stubborn in shaking off the shackles of inherited creeds and doctrines. It is encouraging to note the number of men and women of broad knowledge who are investigating the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism joining the rank and file of and contributing to its onward and upward progress.

No matter what a person's belief is he certainly believes what he thinks is best for him, if he did not he would change his belief forthwith. That is not saying that he is right or that he is wrong, so let us never be so frank in our comments as to offend one, for remember they are all doing the best they can according to their unfoldment, and we are doing the same.

It remains the duty of Spiritualists sowing and reaping in the broad fields of human progress, to set the example of liberal thought, by practicing it ourselves and teaching others to read, think and consider all things, and work out their own salvation, through their own unfoldment.

To teach brotherly love, good will, liberality of thought, and salvation to every soul that has ever lived, by its development to perfection in the process of time and eternity, such is a grand and ennobling teaching.

Hell and damnation has never brought the world to a higher state of development, and never can, it only creates a feeling of selfishness and malice. There can be no love where one sect seeks after the high places of heaven, by the air line route of their own belief, and preach hell and damnation as the place of consignment for the balance of humanity.

May organizations form upon the principles of brotherly love, and with these teach liberality of thought and soul development for all souls; teaching men and women all the virtues of goodness and purity, because it is good and soul elevating; not because they will go to hell if they don't live that way, but because it is good for the body, soul and humanity, to be good seven days out of the week, fifty-two weeks in the year, all the years of their life.

Second division-vital: When the spirituality of a person has been aroused, and he goes seeking for proof, by manifestation of life outside the five senses, he almost invariably runs up against fraud and over-credulous believers, who take everything in the seance room for good and truth, never questioning the variety of the medium or the security of the surroundings. The anger of these over-credulous persons is often kindled to white heat when some cool head tries to point out to them, how they were deceived and taken in.

On account of fraud and the over-credulous, the conscious investigator often turns away in disgust.

As a lady said to me one day when talking of Winans, she said: "My husband says he is genuine, although at one of Winans' seances in our house, his control took me in the room where Winans the medium was supposed to be in a trance for the purpose of convincing me that Winans was in his place, while Jimmy, the control, had materialized and was able to converse and conduct me into the cabinet in the form of a tangible, solid body; but while the control had me by the hand, which, by the way, was Winans himself, he says to me, 'Now, feel the medium in his chair, while I am standing here by you." The suggestion did not work; I felt the medium in his chair all right, and with the same free hand I followed the hand that had hold of mine to the arm and body of the medium in the chair, I had already surmised that he, after giving the suggestion, had with cunning, slipped into his chair and I found it to be so; still my husband insists that I was mistaken and that Jimmy was genuine and that Winans was in his chair all right, so I let him have his way."

I myself know of several on whom this trick was worked and they were just credulous enough to believe that the medium was in his chair while a materialized spirit had them by the hand.

Now, is it not evident that something should be done in the way of formulating some set of rules applicable to the seance room, which will protect the integrity of honest mediums, and thereby remove the loathsome part connected with Spiritualism, namely, fraud.

I am not saying whether there are genuine demonstrations of phenomena through those who practice fraud, or not, for I do not know, but we do know that no one has ever been able to catch a spirit in a seance room yet, but lots of supposed-to-be mediums have been caught dressed up in material togs.

Whether these fraudulent mediums ever give anything of a truthful nature or not, could only be proven by their conforming to certain rules laid down to govern the seance room and make it a fortified fort against the attacks of the fake medium, or, I may say the fakes of a medium, if so be those who practice fraud have any powers as spiritual mediums, as some claim.

How long will it be before the National Association, local societies and home circles will formulate and adopt some set of rules governing the seance room, and thereby elevate the principles of Spiritualism above the ban of trial and public ridicule?

Will someone recognized as authority on conditions and requirements for the seance room, draw up a set of rules and regulations, so that there will be no more controversy between those forming a circle and the medium?

Such a set of rules formulated in such a way as to be agreeable to the honest medium, or I should say in such a way as could not be otherwise than agreeable to an honest medium, and at the same time of such a formidable nature as to surmount and make impossible the tricks of the sleight-of-hand, legerdemain performer in the seance room, and thus secure the harmony, peace, safety and conscience of the honest medium and investigator, whereby such a medium and investigator might participate in a seance with a consciousness of holiness and purity.

A set of rules formidable as to preclude all possibility of fraud, gotten up in a cheap pamphlet form, so that a quantity of them might be secured at small cost, and distributed by advocates of the cause, and if all will co-operate in the adoption of such a guide, and require the rules to be complied with to the letter, without deviation; we shall have made one long, grand stride toward gaining popular favor, pure phenomena and honest mediums; we shall have closed the door to fraudulent mediums and their accomplices, and protected the honest medium and investigator against public ridicule and indignation. Will someone conversant with the requirements formulate a Guide for this purpose?

Third division: The maze of conditions productive of spirit demonstration are so complex and confusing, on account of our not being able to understand and control them, that even believers are often confused and stand on the precipice of doubt, not knowing which way to turn. We look beneath and around us, and only behold the deep tempest-tossed waters of time and superstition; we look above and beyond into the vastness of infinite distance and time.

How beautifully has Brother Edgar L. Larkin portrayed the vastness of the universe to us, although it is as far beyond the comprehension of the intellect in its present state of development as the computation of the figures he gives us, would have been to the scientist in his infancy.

It would be useless to dwell on the condition of things on the other side, as each individual must for himself come into a spiritual development to comprehend the situation even in its picturesque sense, let alone its reality and naturalness.

You may compare an infant shut up from birth in a house from which all the outer world is obscured; he has grown into manhood in this condition, he has never seen the green grass, the trees, the flowers, the hills and valleys and all nature as it lays in its profusion is only as a dream, as a maze to him.

Ask yourself if you could convey to that man any idea of the reality of the outer life, of the life outside of his environment, you will readily answer that it would be impossible to convey to his imagination a picture of the surroundings.

Spiritually a person may visit the life outside of this and see things in as natural a way as he sees things here, only they are as far developed beyond the surroundings here in beauty and naturalness, as the outdoor life is beyond the silitary and limited confines of a room from which all outer life is held in obscurity.

Let us, by a good development of our mental and spiritual faculties, fed by the strong facts of pure and truthful phenomena, reach out into the universe of infinite knowledge and learn something of the country whither we are bound.

LIGHT ON DARK SUBJECTS.

A Spirit's Explanation of the Jehovah Idea of the Jews.

In reading the many phases of thought upon the subject of bible, bible authority, bible characters, etc., I begin to feel it due my fellow-students and seekers after knowledge to give to the pages of The Progressive Thinker the substance of a narrative given through my medial powers some two and a half years ago. It throws light upon a matter of history, and is an explanation of at least a part of the God-of-the-Jews idea, Jehovah-wise at least.

The narrative was given by the individual most nearly concerned in it, and ran thus in substance; phraseology I never can recall.

The grandfather of Abraham was by name Jud, a Chaldean. He was a man of powerful characteristics, able to exert great influence over others. When he passed to spirit life all his faculties sought action under the acceleration of the higher state, and learning what could be done he turned back to earth to see what he might accomplish to give expression to himself as a leader and constructor.

He conceived the idea of founding a new nation which he would guide into ways of power and of progress; a nation that should in time absorb all other nations. To this end he chose a grandson of great mediumistic powers as his instrument of effort.

Here we begin Hebrew history. Jud called Abraham to go from his home in Uz, of the Chaldeans to the land chosen for the beginning of the new nation and the country was to be called Jud-ea, not Ju-dea, as pronounced to-day.

I am not intending to follow along the history, each can read for themselves. Substantially it has been preserved. The plan was carried into effect by bands of powerful spirits who were taken into the work and directed by one who was always a guide of Jud, one who understood the ways of operating and who fostered the new nation idea.

Among prophets in the spirit world were those who were inspired by the world builders under whose care this planet had grown and evolved and these gave out predictions concerning one who should come to be in the fullness of time a teacher and a leader of thought. These foretellings spiritual in nature, were seized upon by the Judean faction as indicating one who should become a national deliverer and king of the peoples through whom he had come to be. So the prophecies became mixed. All readers of the old Testament are aware of the two lines of prophecy which applied to Jesus.

By highly unfolded prescience the Teacher of Nazareth was predicted, and by those eons-old toilers for the planet Earth, was intended and developed as a psychic for the promulgation of Truth, of the principles underlying all creative and evolutive activities, the basic facts of being, and his unusual work was clearly limited at.

To make assurance doubly sure for the safety and growth of the nation the Jud-ean idea was that this wonderful man should also become king and deliver the people from Roman and all other powers, and they tried to carry out this plan, but we know how signally they failed, and we know that this was the real cause of the ignominious death of the great medium teacher.

These few direct and correct facts I give to the world that new light may be thrown upon the God of the Jews, the Jehovah personality, and the inspiration of the Nazarene.

Between the lines all may read, but they must keep in mind the fact of the intelligences from that far sun system, the third older than ours, who have in charge this planet, and who, from time to time select mediums to give to the dwellers of the spheres and earth the truths of life, its significance and its laws as they in their immortality have been able to learn and discover them.

Many a brain has received an impetus from them and many more will as sensitiveness increases, until all shall know, "from the least to the greatest."

Be patient, then, without dogmatism. Be aspiring for absolute truth, for the fundamental facts of being. Cultivate the desire for a knowledge of your home planet; its involved forces and its evolving state, its age and hidden histories. They can all be known, and no one will hinder the transmission of the gatherings of the ages when they are sincerely desired and honestly used, not for personal aggrandizement, but for the benefit of every mind that is in need of them.

A Mild Criticism of Spiritualism

Flammarion Found That Eliminating All Possible Cases of Fraud or Self-Delusion, There Is a Surplus of Facts Remaining, as Set Forth in the Chicago Tribune, Which Has at the Head of Its Remarks the Question, "Is Spiritualism a Scientific Fact?"

Do the spirits of the dead still linger in the world? Is the earth peopled with real but invisible beings, who take an active interest in the doings of their human friends and enemies? Is the spiritualistic seance merely a self-delusion when it is not a humbug, or is it a scientific fact, capable of demonstration?

Cammille Flammarion, the great French scientist, has been trying to find an answer to these questions. For the last five years he has investigated table-tippings, slate-writings, materializations, and other Spiritualistic phenomena. He has studied the work of the most remarkable mediums in the world in his efforts to discover if Spiritualism is a fake or if it really is the science of the future upon which the profoundest scholars may devote their energies.

Flammarion is not a mystic. He approached his subject with the true scientific spirit. He was not willing to believe anything that could not be proved to him. He was not willing to reject anything merely because it was unusual, or out of the lines of ordinary scientific inquiry.

Unable to Explain Phenomena.

Did the investigations of Camille Flammarion convince him that Spiritutlism is a fraud unworthy the study of an intelligent man? Or is he satisfied that spirits exist and can communicate with men? He will not go so far as to answer either question positively. But he leans to the belief that there is "something" in psychic phenomena that cannot be explained by the common laws of physics.

Flammarion makes the startling assertion that "there are certain forces in existence, at present unknown, which can counterbalance the effects of gravity." Tables can be raised from the ground without physical assistance. Objects of furniture can be moved about the room. There is no trick about this. It is a seeming miracle which Flammarion has seen performed often and under circumstances which precluded the idea of fraud or collusion. A dining room table may rise from the floor and float toward the ceiling without the touch of a human hand.

Is it the Work of Spirits?

Whether this spookish performance is the work of spirits M. Flammarion does not know. He knows that the force which draws all bodies toward the center of the earth has been set aside for the moment and that a superior and mysterious power has its will with the table. Neither, he insists, do the mediums themselves know. They have found that under certain conditions they are able to transcend the laws of gravitation. They have learned how to put themselves in touch with a mysterious force which they do not understand, and they leap to the conclusion that they are assisted by the spirits of the departed human beings. But that is not certain, says Flammarion. The mediums may be mistaken. They cannot demonstrate the existence or presence of the spirits to a scientific certainty. They have uncovered a mystery which they cannot solve.

In regard to spirit writing Flammarion has seen many wonderful things. He himself did much writing at various times while lending himself to the control of so-called spirits. Old Galileo used to write for M. Flammarion, and the ancient scientist communicated many interesting facts to the modern scientists. There was no fraud in these letters from Galileo, of course, but they were disappointing, because they did not at any time transcend the mental capacity of Flammarion. Galileo told the Frenchman things that the latter already knew—or might have known if he had thought of them.

Proof That Spirits Are Not Smart.

The same sense of disappointment was felt by Flammarion in the communications made verbally by spirits through mediums. Sometimes the message was commonplace, sometimes it was ridiculous. It never was of value. The poetry written by the spirits of dead poets in every case sounded like a feeble imitation of a real work of genius. When the accommodating spirit of Shakespeare writes rhyme for the medium they invariably are amateurish. And while mediums sometimes receive messages in foreign tongues which they are known not to understand, the communications contain nothing wise or new. The fortune telling aspect of Spiritualism is not proven to be of any particular value. The spirits either do not know what will happen in the future or they cannot be persuaded to tell. Some of the revelations made by honest mediums were more like jokes than prophecies.

Flammarion does not take the dark room Spiritualistic seances seriously. After patient and honest investigation, he found many cases of trickery, and while some of the phenomena appeared to be above suspicion and many mediums are sincere, the tricks they perform are childish. The spirits—if the seance manifestations indeed are the work of spirits—are more like mischievous imps than the dignified shades of departed souls.

There is the interesting possibility suggested, not only by Flammarion, but others, that the so-called spirits are not supernatural beings in any sense, and least of all the dead whom the world has loved and lost. Might they not be invisible, too filmy and vague for the physical eye to see, having bodies of thin ethereal matter and mentality enough to respond to the human intellect? Flammarion does not answer this question.

Flammarion admits that the dark room wonder-workers are not to be discredited simply because they work in the dark, but he says that few, and perhaps none of the manifestations at seances were satisfactory or wholly convincing.

At one demonstration given by Mme. Eusapia Paladino, the wife of an Italian merchant, Flammarion cites a curious fact. The woman was not intelligent enough to deceive them by a trick, but to guard against any possibility of fraud the scientist and his friend sat on each side of the medium holding her feet and hands so that she could not move without their knowledge. A cake of glue, so tough and hard that it was almost impossible to make an impression upon it, was placed upon the other side of the room in a curtained cabinet to which not even a Keller could have obtained entrance without being seen.

When the lights were lowered, all possible precautions were taken to prevent the entrance or assistance of a confederate. After a few minutes, during which time the woman called upon her controlling spirit to stamp its image in the glue, the seance ended.

Can't Explain Need of Darkness.

An investigation showed to the astonished scientists that the profile of a woman was stamped legibly and deeply into the glue. This was supposed to be the spirit's face, and they were unable to account for the production. As the face bore a remarkable resemblance to that of the medium, they thought it was open to suspicion, and they regretted that the lights had to be lowered during the seance. Flammarion was unable to find any medium who could give him a satisfactory explanation of the necessity of darkness during the performances.

Flammarion says that almost every medium with which he had dealings sooner or later was discovered cheating. Some of them could do wonderful things, inexplicable things, but in their anxiety to create a profound impression they would begin to exaggerate and play tricks. He had to watch them all the time in order to keep them from adding clever feats of conjuring to their performances. This tendency on the part of the mediums is discreditable to all that they do, and yet Flammarion found that, eliminating all possible cases of fraud or self-delusion, there is a surplus of facts remaining.

If science is not willing to indorse Spiritualism, it will grant that there are some wonders and seeming miracles that cannot be explained.

Mrs. Emma Huff Is Honored at Lake Helen, Florida.

Nigh the southern border line of the Camp at Lake Helen, the ground begins to climb until it has reached its highest point, and here a lone flag pole has for many moons stood unadorned. This is Inspiration Point, and as you reach it you will want to take off your shoes—not altogether because you stand upon holy ground, but rather to shake the sand out, which has gathered in them.

This beautiful spot is revered for communion between spirits in the flesh and out, and is a part of the homestead belonging to Mrs. Emma Huff, the patron saint of the camp.

A few days ago it was suggested that her friends present her with a flag, and everybody was so eager to help that the amount each was permitted to contribute had to be limited in order to give all a chance in this way to express the high esteem in which they held her.

At the close of the afternoon service on the last Sunday in January, the audience was invited to meet in Mrs. Huff's parlor and here Major E. R. Hopkins, of Brooklyn, N. Y., presented her with a beautiful 15-foot flag, and this memorial signed by those who had contributed:

"Dear Mrs. Huff—Your friends take great pleasure in presenting you with the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of liberty and patriotism, deeply appreciating your belief in the greatest liberty for each mortal to live according to the light revealed, and in your true patriotism, wishing peace and brotherly love to come to all the children of the earth.

"Your undaunted courage, loyal devotion to the truth, unselfish life for others, and unswerving fidelity to the highest principles you can perceive, have made you a potent power for good, and a help and an inspiration to the Southern Cassadaga Camp at Lake Helen, Fla. and as we hope the flag may long float over the Camp and gladden our eyes, so may you long be spared to live among us, helping us with your presence and blessing us with your consistent spiritual life."

In presenting the flag the Major said: "on behalf of your many friends on these grounds, I have the exquisite pleasure of presenting to you a physical token of their regard for you as a devoted friend, a true woman and an ever faithful worker and efficient leader in the field of spiritual progress.

"You and a friend (Mrs. Skidmore), were the first women to receive from spirit realms the inspiration to establish here a great institution for the growth and radiation to all the world of Spiritualism, and with that friend you have since ably labored in this great field, she from the spirit side of life and you from the material—you always in touch with her and with great intelligences, under whose guidance the work was commenced and has been continued with success that is abundantly evidenced by our surroundings here to-day.

"The material token that I transfer to you is naught else than our national flag, whose white so well typifies purity, whose red typifies strength, and whose stars in a field of blue, are prophetic of the realization of our hopes, that this nation of strength and purity, amid the other nations of the world may progress in these great elements, even until the time when the stars of night shall no more penetrate with their beauteous light the blue dome above us.

"Our Nation's flag is not the flag of any church, it was not born of dogmatism, it needs no strengthening by credal lines, it is America's gift to humanity, a token of freedom of thought, it is a triple emblazonment of the divine right of the soul to seek communion with the source of divinity, whence it was evolved, and as such may it ever be dear to every American citizen and especially to all who shall seek the Southern Cassadaga for spiritual light; and long, very long may you continue a familiar sight above Inspiration's height, where it will first be given to the breeze this day."

Mr. Critchley was in the audience with his cornet, and played the Star Spangled Banner, which was sung, after which everybody marched through the camp to Inspiration Point, where Major Hophins hoisted the flag amidst cheering and enthusiasm.

Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing called attention to the fact that it was a woman, Betsey Ross, who, shortly after the Declaration of Independence, designed and made the stars and stripes, using her own red skirt for that color in the flag, and stitching 13 stars into the blue background—with the hearty approval of Geo. Washington.

Mrs. C. P. Pratt reminded the people of the visions of W. J. Colville concerning their ground as a spiritual center to be used for educational purposes.

Mrs Emma J. Huff, in closing stated that she wished it distinctly understood that this land which she held by spirit directions, on which certain points had been selected for carrying onward a part of the spiritual work, was not in any sense antagonistic to the Camp and its purposes, but an aid in promoting and completing the original ideas long ago advanced.

The whole event was a source of much pleasure to the campers who felt that the flag was an earnest of better things to come when ultimate heights shall be attained, where liberty, purity and peace shall walk hand in hand and take possession of the promised land, where dwell no aliens, but where the black, and the red, the yellow and the white man shall live in one common brotherhood and dwell together forever and forever.

This work will be found especially interesting to all who would desire to make a study of Romanism and the Bible. The historic facts stated, and the keen, scathing review of Romish ideas and practices should be read by all. Price 25 cents.

WHAT BETTER EVIDENCE?

Does Not This Prophetic Knowledge Indicate the Presence of a Higher Intelligence That Imparts the Same?

Guy Kibby of the Wheeler Creek road was struck by a Lake Shore train at the North Broadway crossing this forenoon and died within an hour, from the injuries. The particulars of the affair as near as could be learned are that Mr. and Mrs. Kibby and children came to town this morning to do some trading and while Mrs. Kibby was trading at the stores, Mr. Kibby went to the grist mill of Brown & Blair, just across the Lake Shore tracks and to the west of North Broadway.

He was afoot, and just as he returned the west bound Lake Shore fast mail and express train was approaching. Witnesses say he tried to cross in front of the fast approaching train and had almost cleared the track when struck on the left side and shoulder by the pilot beam of the engine. He was hurled several feet into the park next to the track. He was taken immediately to the hospital and physicians made an examination which revealed that he was too badly injured to recover and his wife was sent after but he died just as she reached him.

Mrs. Kibby was in the Fuller Department store when the accident happened and as she came out she saw people going down towards the track, as a natural consequence she and those with her went down that way and it was then that she learned what had befallen her husband. She was almost distracted with grief and when Mr. Kibby was taken to the hospital she was taken to a nearby house and with her small children waited for some word. She was soon summoned. Mr. Kibby was perhaps thirty-five years of age and well known in the village and vicinity. Arrangements for the funeral have not been made.

An acquaintance was heard to say this morning, that Mrs. Kibby dreamed last night that her husband was killed by a train, and this morning when they started to town she cautioned him to be careful.

Are Fatalities Foreseen?

The mother of Arthur J. Fosse, the brakeman on the passenger train wrecked at Mentor Wednesday night, told of the death of her son two hours before any word reached her at her home in Buffalo. Mrs. Fosse who is an invalid, called her husband to her bedside about the time the accident happened and told him that their son had been killed in a wreck. Two hours later the sad news was received by telegraph. The above incident was related by the father of the dead brakeman.

Many such instances are being reported all over the country. The night before the accident at the North Broadway crossing in Geneva, Mrs. Kibby is said to have dreamed her husband was killed. Many people are moved to wonder at such occurrences.

Dream Foretells Death.

Bellefontaine, O., Jan. 4.—(Spl.)—The death of Chester Henry, killed by cars at Bowling Green, was foretold to his eldest brother, Frank Henry, of Mt. Victory, in a dream. He awoke from a nightmare and told his wife of his vision. A few hours later word came of the accident.—Geneva Free Press-Times, Ohio.

Arisen to the Life Triumphant.

Rev. Moses Hull, the faithful worker, the calm reasoner, because he had knowledge of the subject he discussed, has put on the diviner life of spirit.

Though his labors and genial companionship were highly prized by friends and students of the Spiritual philosophy, we must send thoughts of congratulation to his illumined soul that he has so quickly found victory over material existence in the ennobling life where love of truth makes clear vision a literal fact to those who study the principles of Spiritual growth and achievement.

A ripe biblical scholar, being familiar with the original texts, he delighted to show forth the errors of theological bigotry, revealing the simple logic of Scriptural Spiritualism.

To his devoted wife, Mattie E. Hull, a constant helper in public work and in the arduous labor of establishing The Morris Pratt Institute, will be given sympathy and admiration of her sublime courage in continuing their work in the beginning of her lonely pilgrimage.

To the teachers and pupils of the Institute whose loss cannot be measured in the passing away of their grand patron, we would say:

Still trust the loving spirit of devotion to your precious cause, by the revered Moses Hull. He will bring a saintly throng to aid in the growth of The Morris Pratt Institute, the sacred monument of his life work.

Items From Long Lake, Minn.

The State Society is making an effort to send out two or three missionaries as workers in the field. There is need of more missionary work to be done here.

There are a great many Spiritualists throughout the state who need the assistance of the State Association and encouragement to go ahead with the work of building up the Cause of Spiritualism.

We are looking forward to the time when Minnesota can hold a camp meeting some time during the summer months. I believe that if organized and carried on in a business-like way, not allowing and fraud upon the grounds, such a camp will be supported by the Spiritualists of Minnesota. If such a camp could be established within easy access to the great Twin Cities, on some one of the numerous beautiful lakes, it would be well attended, with the improved services of the railroad and street cars now at hand. I would be pleased to hear from others on the question of having a camp the coming season of 1907.

I am pleased to know that Brother George W. Kates is president of the Temple Fund, as he has had many years' experience as a missionary worker. There is great need of Temples among Spiritualists. There are many small societies which, with a little aid could go ahead and build.

There will be a number of your subscribers that will be glad to know that the Lake Minnetonka Spiritualist Society has its Temple complete and all painted, inside and out, with hard wood finish, and all paid for and owned by its society. It is the only temple in the state owned by the society. This all came from a few earnest workers who were determined to have a temple of our own.

In the sixties and the seventies we had organized a goodly number of Lyceum workers. We had seven classes that used A. J. Davis's Manual. I am glad to know that Mr. Davis's works are to be published again.

I have been a reader of his works from the "Stellar Key" up to his 29th volume. ROLLA STUBBS.

HE DID NOT FEAR DEATH.

A Friend's Tribute to the Memory of Charles S. Brown.

To the Editor:—Charles S. Brown, of 6425 Green street, passed to higher life on Monday, January 28. He was 50 years of age, and leaves a devoted wife and one son to survive him.

Mr. Brown is known in Englewood and vicinity, where he spent many years, as a man, not only of unquestioned business ability and integrity, but also as one who believed in, and had the courage to practice and commend, the simple life. He understood, more fully than do most men, his place in nature, his relations to his brother man, and to all sentient creatures, His dictum was "Peace to All Beings." His generous heart and kindly face made him the chosen friend of the child in the street and the millionaire prince in his office.

He knew that all life—no matter how humble the form through which it worked—was God's life, and the difference between all the living creatures about him was one only of degree, not of kind. Thus, philosophically he identified himself with all. To him universal brotherhood was a fact, not a fiction, in nature, and he lived his belief as nearly as the present distorted social economic system would permit. Birth and death to him were only the beginning and the ending of a single chapter in the long life story contained in the Book of Eternity.

Charlie Brown, as he was known far and wide, was a close student of nature's mysteries, was a believer in the pre-existence of the soul, had first-hand knowledge of the continuity of life, and was himself far along The Path.

Why, then, should he fear death, when in it he could see life more abundantly? His so-called death is but the lower aspect of his higher birth. His welcomed reception by waiting relatives and friends in the home beyond can never be questioned by those who witnessed the beautiful light that illumined his eyes and the tranquil and serene expression that could be seen upon his pallid face during the few moments that immediately preceded his demise.

While eminently fitted to live, he was pre-eminently fitted to make the change that men miscall death.

Charlie Brown is not dead. 'Tis true he has stepped beyond the visual range of such eyes as yours and mine, but he lives, and will live forever.

Seance With Charles Barnes.

To the Editor:—While at Grand Ledge last summer my husband and I attended several seances given by Charles J. Barnes of Warsaw, Indiana, and were thoroughly convinced that he was a good man and an honest medium, so made arrangements with him to come to our home this winter and give some seances.

According to agreement he came January 21, and gave six very successful seances, five trumpet and one light seance. They were the first ever held in these parts, the people being nearly all strictly orthodox and only a few Spiritualists. People came many miles through the storm and cold. One man walked ten miles. All were well pleased.

The last one was a light seance. The spirits tied knots in handkerchiefs and passed them over or through the curtains, wrote messages, wound up a watch, played the harp, handed out for someone take, also lifted the stand up above the curtain. Hands were held above the curtains for us to clasp. One crippled hand came, the thumb and every finger was bent nearly double. It was recognized by a lady who had never attended a seance of any kind before coming here. It was the hand of an uncle who had been a soldier. She thought it a grand test, as it certainly was. Some came skeptics and went away convinced. We expect to have Mr. Barnes with us again sometime. MRS. M. S. WEED.

Appreciation and Sympathy.

Whereas, our beloved President Moses Hull, has passed from the material to the spiritual realm, after devoting the best years of his life in the promulgation of truth, and that the closing years of his life have been spent in the endeavor to build up and establish an Institution that would stand for a broad, practical education, unhampered by limitations of creedal doctrines and dogma, and in which is pursued the study of facts material and spiritual as soon as they present themselves to human thoughts and confidence;

And Whereas, in recognition of his great love and work in Spiritualism and other reforms, be it

Resolved, That we extend our deep appreciation and our sympathy to the dear ones who will miss him as a devoted husband, a kind father, a loving brother and a generous friend. And that a copy of these resolutions be placed on the minutes of the Club and a copy be sent to the Spiritualist papers, and to Mrs. Hull. Respectfully submitted.

A New Device for Seances.

To devise some plan or plans, as the case may be, whereby we may arrive at correct conclusions as to the genuineness of spirit manifestations, is the purpose of many investigators at this time. The following explains itself:

"A German Spiritualist, writing in Psychic Studies, describes a new apparatus for obtaining what is known as direct writing. It consists of a cubical box about a foot each way, the front being formed by a conical bag of soft but closely woven black silk. Through a hole in the tip of the bag a pencil is placed, so that the longer part is inside the bag and the point outside. The notion is that a spirit hand can materialize inside the conical bag or sleeve," says the account, "and can direct the movement of the pencil over the paper. A medium, a country girl of 14, who can only read, write and work the simplest arithmetic, placed her hands on the top of the box, in full light, and soon the conical bag swelled out as though a hand were inside, and the pencil began to write. The box and bag being entirely closed and dark inside, there is no obstacle to the materialization of a hand within; thus direct writing can be obtained in a lighted room."

I should be much pleased to see this device thoroughly tested, which, no doubt, it will be. Writing by this method would do more to dispel skepticism than all the materializing seances, as they are now conducted, put together.

What we want is the evidence under conditions that preclude all possibility of fraud, and just as soon as such evidence is demanded the frauds will be out of business. We have frauds simply because a very large proportion of the Spiritualists are too credulous to doubt the honesty of persons claiming to be mediums. J. A. WERTZ.

Dr. I. K. Funk.

He Calls Ghosts the Result of Real Material Vibrations.

The wonders of psychic phenomena [says the Chicago Examiner and American] in the twentieth century—it would be impossible even to outline them in a brief paper. But what has already been accomplished is but an infinitesimal part of what will be done.

From what we already know it is safe to say that eventually there will be nothing that cannot be explained by natural means. Right here now in this prosaic twentieth century we are reaching out beyond forces which can only be explained by the five senses.

There is no such thing as the occult. It is all natural. Take the universal ether, which we know exists. The microscope won't show it, nor will the telescope reveal it, yet we know it must be there. We know it is something infinitely finer than our physical air. It can transmit all vibration, however minute or infinitesimal.

And so we get heat vibration and X-rays and wireless telegraphy and thought transference and psychic phenomena. And that is the point I want to make as perhaps the greatest mind-wonder of the century. I believe, with many others, to-day that the only difference between a stone and a piece of wood is vibration; that the difference between a man and a fish is simply vibration.

Now we find to-day that wherever we can measure and receive vibration we must have something to take these impressions. This something must be attuned to vibration. And so, with one mind here on earth and another in the great beyond, it is perfectly proper to assume that vibration is still working. In fact, it has been demonstrated.

But let me go a little further in vibration. Prof. William Crookes, the British scientist, has delved very deep into the subject. Assume a pendulum swinging once a second; that is vibration. Keep on doubling the swings until at the sixth doubling we get thirty-two swings or vibrations.

That is the lowest note of sound the human ear can receive. Each doubling gives a higher note until we get 256—the middle C on the piano. Keep doubling and doubling until we get beyond 2,000,000. Then we have electrical waves. More doublings and we get heat and light vibrations. In between all these are unknown waves which some day will be explained. Further along come the X-rays. At the sixty-third doubling we have the vibrations of radium—billions on billions—and at the sixty-fourth we come to those waves which we can only call occult for want of a better word.

But they are not occult; they are natural, and in this twentieth century we are going to explain some of them; we are going to remove a little more of mystery from the world.

Many things can be explained now that could not be dreamed of twenty years ago. Who would have believed in radium even so short a time ago as when Roentgen discovered the X-rays? Who would have believed in wireless telegraphy in our civil war? It was used in the Russo-Japanese conflict.

X-rays can pass through ordinary metal. The physical body of a man has a low rate of vibration. It cannot pass through metal or any solid substance. But suppose, with the human body resurrected, is it not possible to believe that it might not have been finer vibrations than the X-rays, and so pass through solid substances? Many eminent men believe that to-day simply from the results of their researches. Would that not explain many Bible miracles?

The twentieth century has seen enormous strides already, and to-day scientists are at the point where the unseen—the occult, as some call it—will become wholly natural. Vibration will explain everything.

I know one case of a mother who was suddenly awakened one night by a cry, "Oh, mother, mother, the doctors say I have typhoid fever!" It was the voice of her son. He was fifteen hundred miles away. Next morning the telegram came announcing it, and later a letter telling the time when the doctors made their decision. It was the moment the mother heard the cry.

That is not hard to explain with our twentieth century knowledge. The mother and the son were in perfect sympathy. Their hearts were attuned. Through the thought ether came the son's cry. And the mother heard.

The twentieth century stands to-day on the threshold of wonderful things. We have seen and we have heard. Very much of the natural world is an open book.

We are now about to open a book that has been closed before—the book of the unseen and the unheard world.

REV. DR. I. K. FUNK.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Of the Vermont State Spiritualist Association.

The Annual Convention of the Vermont State Spiritualist Association was held in Grand Opera Hall, Opera House Block, Montpelier, Vt., January 18, 19, 20. The attendance was good during the entire convention, despite much inclement weather. Sunday the hall being packed afternoon and evening, showing conclusively that the people are interested to know more about the teachings of our beautiful philosophy.

Mrs. Helen P. Russegue of Hartford, Ct., was the speaker for the three days, and she was at her best. All who know Mrs. Russegue know that means a feast of good things every session for the hungering and thirsting for Spiritual food.

The phenomena were demonstrated by the writer, and were said to be highly satisfactory to the many that received communications from their loved ones. Mrs. George Royce, soloist, and Mrs. Doty, organist, both from Roxbury, Vt., furnished the music, which was of a high order, and was much appreciated by all. On Sunday Mrs. Royce arranged for a quartette, which was a surprise to the association, nevertheless the music rendered by them was much enjoyed by the large audience present. A unanimous vote of thanks was given Mrs. Royce for her great kindness. Altogether the convention was a success socially, spiritually and financially.

The local society of Montpelier did much toward helping to make it a success, as they always do, and the Woman's Relief Corps, did their share as well. They served dinner and supper in the adjoining hall, so aged people who could not climb three flights of stairs three times a day were able to attend all the services, as they could go in the morning and stay through the three sessions without any inconvenience about something to eat.

The Ladies Auxiliary that was organized one year ago, had a sale table of useful and fancy articles during Friday and Saturday. Preceding the evening session on Saturday all unsold articles were disposed of by auction, Mrs. Russegue being the genial auctioneer. The amount realized from the sale table was $39.27. This was given the association to help out the financial part. The ladies felt quite encouraged, this being their first attempt, and they wish to thank all who contributed for the table, and trust another year they may be able to do much better.

At the annual business meeting of the association the following officers were duly elected:

President, Effie I. M. Chapman, Cambridge, Vt.; First Vice-President, F. H. Dewart, St. Albans, Vt.; Second Vice-President, E. J. Fallon, Montpelier, Vt.; Secretary, Mrs. Jessie Fallon, Montpelier, Vt.; Treasurer, Don H. Chapman, Cambridge, Vt.; Auditor, E. J. Fallon, Montpelier, Vt.

Board of Directors: Don H. Chapman, Cambridge, Vt.; S. N. Gould Randolph, Vt.; L. T. Smith, St. Albens, Vt.; Mrs. Nellie Shaw, Morrisville, Vt.; Addie Ballard, Ludlow, Vt.; E. J. Fallon, Montpelier, Vt.; S. S. Smith, Barre, Vt.; Mrs. Henry Childs, Montpelier, Vt.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

A Widely Known and Respected Worker in the Vineyard of Truth.

On the morning of Jan. 26, the spirit of Alfred B. Sayles, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, left its tenement and passed from its earthly existence into the broader fields of life.

As a sower and reaper in the broad fields of Spiritualism, he stood among its peers. He was born in Cayuga county, New York, in 1820, moving from there to Ohio and from thence to Michigan in the early forties of that century. At an early age he married Miss Elizabeth A. Dillenback. His wife preceded him to the higher life eighteen years ago.

His parents were Close Communion Baptists bringing up their children strictly, within the tenets of that faith. But, with his bible for a companion in the field (his parents were farmers), and a pillow for his head at night, after reading by the light of a huge fire until the hours grew small and the embers had fallen to coals against the backlog, he began early to reason for himself, the ethics of religion. At the early age of eighteen years he became a teacher of the universal salvation of mankind.

He was among the first to recognize the demonstrations of spirit control, in the era of modern Spiritualism. He turned to his bible for proofs of the continuity of life. Here he found, not only the evidence, but that spirit manifestations are among the earliest records of the existence of man. This formed the basis for his study of the philosophy of Spiritualism. To study was but to broaden his conception of its truth.

With him, to know truth was to live it; and thus his life has been a living example of the truth he inculcated. As he grew in knowledge, he gave to others of that which he received. Spirit communion became a part of his daily life; and in his quiet, unassuming way he made many converts to Spiritualism. To him Spiritualism was not a religion, not faith, not belief, but a knowledge of the great natural law of cause and effect; from which no one can retract or step aside; and no God can give special dispensation of or vary its course. To him, God does not exist, only as man personifies the All-potent power of nature and makes it the object of his adoration; placing heaven high above him, beyond his reach, because it is beyond his comprehension. Ever seeking for truth, he found that for which he sought, demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt. His was a broad and useful life, worthy of emulation. His eighty-seven years of life were filled with good works—the expression of good thoughts.

We cannot mourn the passing on
To broader fields of lives sublime,
We know the sheaves we garner here
Yield larger grain in richer clime.

Notes Concerning the Opening of Cassadaga Camp.

The Southern Cassadaga Spiritualist Camp Meeting Association, opened its first meeting for the season of 1907, on Sunday, February 3, under the most favorable circumstances. The day—as all days are here, was most charming.

The auditorium was tastefully decorated with all the southern greens, vines, mosses and flowers, with many roses from the rose garden.

The invocation was given by Mrs. Wheeler, the opening speech by President Dr. G. N. Hilligoss. I extended fraternal greetings from the Lily Dale board, according to their resolution in regular meeting. Speeches were then made by Vice-President E. W. Bond, Mrs. Carrie E. Twing, Mr. Hubbard, Mrs. Stumpf, and Mrs Morrell.

In the afternoon a phonograph concert by Dr. Hilligoss, was enjoyed by the campers, seated in the park, ladies in white, no hats, and the mocking-birds striving to outdo the mechanical music.

The afternoon discourse was by J. Clegg Wright, in his usual inimitable style, followed by messages given by Mrs. Morrell, all good and accurate.

In the evening a free seance in the Pavillion by Mrs. Pettengill and Mrs. Morrell, which are to be a permanent feature. A short talk on Universal Love, by the influencing speaker of Mrs. Morrell, followed by messages by Mrs. Pettengill, completed the first red letter day of the camp.

Mrs. Mary Cooper of Camden, N. J. has taken "Peek-a-Boo" cottage for the season.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Miller of Big Run, Pa., will spend some time at the camp, later going south to Tampa, etc.

Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Conlan of Mt. Vernon, N. Y., are domiciled in Mrs. Thatcher's cottage, also Mr. and Mrs. Hull of Chattanooga, Tenn.

Mrs. H. L. Tobin of Cleveland, with her mother, Mrs. Schuster, are in Bedell cottage.

The following names appear on "Hotel Cassadaga" register, since my last letter.

M. and Mrs. Nahum Poole, and Seth H. Redding, of Onset, Mass; Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Nichols, Peterboro, N. H.; D. W. Gamble, Mrs. Scott, and Mrs. Nickerson, New York; Mrs. S. J. Houk, Elyria, Ohio; Jas. G. Van Middlesworth, Elizabeth, N. J.; Mrs. D. M. Hampton, St. Louis, Mo.; W. N. Wheeler and C. B. Parratt, Oakfield, Mo.

The weather is the finest ever known save for a little rain. The spirit of harmony and hope prevails. Success seems wafting in on every breeze. New countenances come cultivating cordiality. LEE MORSE.

AN OLD WORKER WRITES.

She Speaks Warm and Earnest Words for Lyceum Effort.

Many kindly people say to me: "Why don't you let us hear from you through The Progressive Thinker?"

My reason for silence is, there are so many abler writers, that I dislike to intrude. I am busy all of the time. My stay in Pittsburg has been pleasant, for officers and members of the Church, Ladies Aid and Lyceum have given cordial greetings and hospitality. Met there the Superintendent of Lyceums, Mrs. Gillespie. It was a pleasure to see her strong interest in the work. I met the Lyceum one Saturday afternoon. They came at my invitation, and a very enjoyable time we had. Mr. and Mrs. Gillespie were pleasing aids.

The dear little Conductress, Miss Claus, works faithfully; Mrs. Watkins, Miss Dixon and others. Did not have a chance to attend the adult class that Mrs. Stevens so ably leads, but I could not fail to see the interest taken in it.

I believe the Lyceum should have attention and that every society should have one. I think if all would give more interest to the children before they pass away, there would be no lack of communion afterwards. I believe if more love and seeking to unfold the child's inner life were given, many would remain longer on earth. I believe tests and messages are sweet, but I believe they should begin right here and now, before we sail the "tideless sea."

As far as I know, I have never missed attending a Lyceum where one was held by the society I served, for the last forty years. While life and health are mine, I shall give all I can to the blessed children. Several lyceums are using my little Outline Lessons, and I am grateful.

This month (February), I am with the Buffalo society. Afterwards I go to the pretty city of Hamilton, Ont.

Brother and sister Lockwood are convalescent. His spiritual energies are alert and vigorous, never more keen, and whoever hears him, will be wiser and better.

I can but grieve for the passing of Sisters Sarah Byrnes, Jennie H. Brown and Brother Hull. Faithful, tried and true, still will their ministrations bless and inspire us.

Moses Hull Memorial.

Sunday evening, February 3, the Light of Truth Spiritual Society, of Dayton, Ohio, held a memorial meeting in honor of Moses Hull, the arisen brother and champion of our cause. It was largely attended by his many admirers and friends in this city.

The speaker of the evening was W. V. Nicum, who dwelt in his usual earnest manner, yet very touchingly, upon the life work of his old friend, pastor and teacher. The speaker said in part:

"Moses Hull's name will live in the hearts of all Spiritualists throughout the world as one whose work was to make people think and thus lead them to a clearer understanding of the esoteric interpretation of the bible. That was largely his work in the world of reformation;" although he said and believed, "To be a live Spiritualist in the true sense meant to be a worker in all reforms."

"Spiritualism and the world owe much to this earnest, conscientious man who has gone to his reward, and if we all would follow him more closely in his writing and public teachings we would become better men and women.

"Let us quote again from one of his oft repeated sayings: 'I would die happy if I knew the world was made better by my having lived in it.'

"Spiritualism and the world are the gainer by Moses Hull's having lived. However, his transition to a higher life does not mean that his work is ended, but rather just begun in a more potent way.

"Let us try and realize in all its grandeur and beauty the great truth, namely, that our friend and brother is not dead, but alive, and will still be our teacher and the champion of our Cause in a more profound and earnest manner than ever before."

The speaker closed his discourse by reciting Tennyson's last poem, "Crossing the Bar:"

"Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me;
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

"Twilight, and evening bell,
And after that the dark;
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark.

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar."

MOSES HULL.

His Many Excellent Qualities Fully Appreciated.

"If one would write (or speak) in a noble style, let him first possess a noble soul."—Goethe.

Moses Hull, our brother, has returned home clothed in fine raiment, and rich in imperishable wealth. "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." He used his talents for sublime and divine purposes—to promote happiness in the world.

As a liberalizing factor in modern thought, he stood out grand, heroic, and central. He was a lion in courage, invincible in logic, yet at all times tender and just.

Truth was his "first and only love." And how valiant was he in defense of it! Sincerity was the basis of his eloquence. Eloquent and persuasive discourse was as natural to him as breathing.

His mind was like an ever-flowing fountain, and as the spray from the fountain is made beautiful and sparkling by the warmth of the sun-light, so the scintillations of his intellect were made more beautiful and graceful by the warmth of his love.

May that "Peace which is past all understanding," rest upon him and the loyal and waiting wife.

We shall go far before we meet another Moses Hull,

FROM AN ELEVATED OUTLOOK.

Keep Your Soul "In Tune With the Infinite."

Miss Elizabeth Harlow's lecture on the "Dangers of Psychism" is not only an able answer to the assertions of Theosophy, but to the large mass of non-thinking people who regard our phenomena as the work of the devil, or relatively evil, of little benefit.

Mr. Barrett's position for a pure mediumship is my own.

Those of us who are blessed with its gifts must, to elevate the position of Spiritualism and our own souls, and for even our self-respect, look beyond material gain.

An elevated gift of mediumship, used purely can accomplish inestimable good beyond the establishing of the continuity of life. How many weary souls we can comfort, how many burdens lighten! What true and high endeavor the oversouls can inculcate through a mediumship in harmony with their efforts, and without fear of the "Evils of Psychism," so that we keep our soul's efforts in "Tune with the Infinite."

"Science and the Future Life." By James H. Hyslop, is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. Price, cloth, $1.50. 10 cents postage extra.

"How to Train Children and Parents." Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying this little book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

FREE! My Book ABOUT CURING DEAFNESS AND EYE DISEASES AT HOME

I HAVE published a new book which tells of a new method by which people who are willing to devote fifteen minutes of their time each day for a month or two, following my instructions, can cure themselves of mild forms of Deafness, Head Noises, chronic Catarrh, failing eyesight of Granulated Lids, Sore Eyes, Films, Wild Hairs, Glaucoma, Weak eyes, and ordinary eye, ear, nose and throat diseases.

This book gives the causes and symptoms of each disease and tells you how you can cure it at home, explains my painless method of straightening cross eyes, etc.

Germs of Mind in Plants.

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons,—Cloth, illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB.

Author of "All's Right with the World," Cloth 370 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by this wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

What All the World's a-Seeking.

SIX HISTORIC AMERICANS.

A Book That Every American Freethinker Will Delight to Own.

By John E. Remsburg.

The work consists of two parts, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "The Saviors of Our Republic." In regard to Paine's religious views, Mr. Remsburg establishes the negative of the following (1) Was Paine an Atheist? (2) Was he a Christian? (3) Did he recant? Page after page of the most radical freethought sentiments are culled from the correspondence and other writings of Franklin and Jefferson, which show that these men were as pronounced in the rejection of Christianity as Paine and Ingersoll. That Washington was not a Christian nor a believer in Christianity. In support of Lincoln's infidelity he has collected the testimony of more than one hundred witnesses.

The book is handsomely bound in cloth, giving fine portraits of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant; also portrait of the author.

This book contains 365 pages, printed on heavy paper, well bound in cloth. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

Heresy, by a Heretic.

"The Teachings of Jesus, Not Adapted to Modern Civilization," a 48-page pamphlet, from the versatile pen of Dr. G. W. Brown, of Rockford, Ill., price 15 cents, is on our table, and is included in our catalogue of books for sale.

The author, unlike the preacher, found much in the life of Jesus, as related in the Gospels, to disapprove. Indeed he found much to condemn. His citations from Bible authority are large, with chapter and verse; and his texts for comment are those the preachers pass by in silence when pronouncing eulogies on "our Lord." The ever-lauded Sermon on the Mount, Dr. Brown shows would be impractical in realistic life. If the direction, Matt. 6:25, "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye put on;" and verse 34: "Take therefore no thought for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself," was rigidly observed, "All the forces of nature would be left in their primal condition; cities would not be built, states would not be organized, fields would remain uncultivated. No ships would plow the ocean. There would be no commerce, no law, no government. The wheels of industry would remain forever silent. The plow, the loom, the anvil would be unknown. Books would not be written, and man would retain his native wildness and ignorance, relying for food, raiment and shelter on his heavenly father who clothes the lilies and feeds the ravens."

It will be well to read the pamphlet, and see the other side of the picture the clergy have painted; though a good Methodist brother into whose hands a copy had fallen, pronounced it "the awfulest booklet ever written."

Incontrovertible Facts.

Propagating truth by falsehood is not anything new in history. The whole Christian church, from its very foundation, seems to rest on a false base. No original sin for which future generations were to be responsible, and punished to the end of time, and God requiring no atonement for such sin caused by our first parents eating an apple, then no Redeemer was required to make that atonement by death on the cross; so every postulate relating to the founding of the system is false; therefore the entire structure is a fraud and has been through all the ages.

Spiritualist pretenders are heard to say: "What if mediums do practice frauds when they cannot get genuine communications? They convince skeptics, and add to our numbers, strengthening our forces, and should be encouraged, not condemned." If falsehood is praiseworthy for propaganda purposes, then truth is quite out of fashion.

But a lie is a lie, however and wherever used, and they who employ such instrumentalities to advance their faith are liars, and should be so branded wherever met. Organized in force, or operating singly, they are frauds and are unworthy of credit, and should be universally repulsed.

Christians gained control of governments, and by repressive laws prevented an exposure of the frauds on which their creeds were built. While exposing the arts by which they gained power, we do not propose to tolerate another system of frauds to aid in building up a better system of religion.

The scheme of nature, regarded in its whole extent, cannot have had for its sole or even principal object the good of human or other sentient beings.—J. S. Mill.

The Observer.

All along the pathway of a busy life it has been the fortune of the writer to come in contact with those who are denominated by churchmen, skeptics. This fact has been accompanied with the additional observation, that such doubters of divine revelation, like most of us were born of orthodox parents; were taught the prevailing creed; and, very generally, in youth, had been connected with one of the many Protestant churches, to which they had remained faithful until mature life. Not until they began to investigate the base on which the churches were built did they waver in faith. They who were the most learned were the most profound in their convictions that the foundation of the Christian faith was not an enduring rock, but a crumbling fable.

On the other hand he saw those whose reading had been very limited, confined almost wholly to Biblical literature and current events, who knew little of the older religions, and scarcely anything of the revelations of the last fifty years in regard to ancient cults which paved the way to what is now known as Christianity, the most zealous in propagating a faith which all good scholars who have dared to reason, to read and to think, repudiate.

In conversation with a very zealous Methodist awhile ago, he related a case which appeared to have given him much distress. Giving his name our friend said he was one of the best men he ever knew, devoted to his family, his friends, to the church and to God. He was a worthy example to all, and faithful to every trust. All loved him, yet he enlarged his reading as the years swept by, began to neglect his attendance at church, and when labored with he gave as a reason he had become satisfied from critical research the Christian system is not what is claimed for it; that it is a priestly invention, devised to place themselves in power, and rule at the expense of the people; that the good as well the evil in it, was borrowed from ancient Paganism. He wished our opinion.

We assured him his observation was ours, that where he stated one case we could relate a score of the same character; that it became a question with such persons whether they should simulate the hypocrite, remain in the church, and encourage falsehood to gain the plaudits of their fellows, or proclaim their honest convictions, and become the reproach of the non-thinking and grossly ignorant multitude. They accepted the latter alternative and became identified with the Darwins, the Huxleys, the Tyndalls, the Voltaires, the Volneys, the Depuys, the Taylors, the Drapers, the Emersons, the Ingersolls, and an innumerable multitude of scarcely lesser minds to be met with everywhere, many of the ablest scholars in the churches being converted to the truths, but unwilling to starve their families, so remain in the church, practical deceivers, preaching what they do not believe, though in some instances trying to educate their parishioners to a conception of the real truth as they have learned it.

Our friend did not desire to continue the subject, so he went home to read another chapter in the Bible, the source of all his wisdom.

Up to Some Devilry.

The managing editor of the Kalamazoo, Mich., Gazette, announces that business in the news department of that office will hereafter be opened by prayer. On whom does he propose to prey? All past observation of business movements opening by prayer has shown there was "a nigger in the woodpile." John A. Murrell, the great western land pirate of a former generation, simulating a preacher, would enter homes and engage in family prayers while his pals were running off stock. A great bank in Chicago, a few years ago, opened business with prayer and soon went to the wall to the ruin of thousands of depositors. Wherever this pious dodge is resorted to rest assured there is something the actors wish to conceal. The college students who had poached on signs, and taken them to their rooms to burn, engaged in a prayer meeting with closed doors, the police on their track, but were not allowed to enter until the last evidence of their guilt was burned, when the prayer concluded with:

"An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after signs, but no sign shall be given, but the sign of the prophet Jonas. Amen."

The Pope Smells Danger.

Report comes from Rome that the Pope is fearful of a collision between the friends of the Vatican, and the anti-clerical societies on the removal of the remains of the late Pope Leo to their final resting place. The time fixed for the event almost coincides with the anniversary of the burning at the stake of Giordano Bruno. It is claimed the time for removal has been countermanded, and the defunct God's vicegerent's body will be quietly removed without notice to the public as to time.

It will be 307 years, on February 17, since Bruno paid the penalty to the church with his life, for teaching the plurality of worlds; that the universe is infinite and immeasurable; that all is God; that man should be judged by deeds, not creeds; that there is no efficacy in prayer. He disbelieved in special Providences; laughed at miracles; classed the Jewish scriptures with the Greek myths, and was confident the time was near when the dread of everlasting damnation would cease, and the priests would cease to proclaim its horrors. In short Bruno taught substantially the truths of Modern Spiritualism. He only lived 300 years too soon.

"The Great Work."

A Review, Chapter by Chapter, by Lyman C. Howe.

As set forth by the author, the specific purposes of the second chapter, from which I quoted quite liberally in my second letter are:

"I.—To fix indelibly in the mind of the reader the four distinct and separate classes into which the data of the universe divide themselves when considered solely in their relation to the individual.

"2.—To emphasize the paramount importance of 'the things we know' over all the other classes of data in the universe from the standpoint of the individual.

"3.—To remove from the mind, as far as may be possible all blind acceptance of the mere speculations, opinions, beliefs and dogmas of mankind, who speak without the authority of definite and personal knowledge.

"4.—To open the way to a fair and unprejudiced consideration of the subject before us with a view to obtaining the largest measure of truth possible.

"5.—To stimulate a healthful desire for exact and definite knowledge concerning the subject under consideration regardless of the source from which it may come.

"6.—To lead to a personal investigation and intelligent study of such facts as may be accessible and pertinent."

The gist of all of this, and of all that is said of the four classes of data is in the claim of the supreme value of direct personal knowledge, which can only be derived from experience.

In its ultimate bearings there seems to be no good reason for questioning this estimate; but as to present utility, and helpful advantage to the individual in the pursuit of happiness, the overwhelming preponderance of the second class ("things we assume to know,") I suspect far outweigh in value "the things that we know." A large per cent of this class are for all practical purposes so nearly certain, so generally reliable, so reducible to practice in the affairs of life, that the great body of advantages in securing health, wealth and happiness, in the home and community, is derived from this class. True, the small radius of experimental knowledge is the key by which this larger class is interpreted and applied, and without it the second class would be well-nigh useless.

So, too, the first class would have an exceedingly limited value, without the second class. There are many things that we think we know that are, after all, open to the suspicion of possible mistake; and this, too, when personal experience is our authority.

Some four years ago a wonderful discovery was reported in France. M. Blondlot, "who stands among the first of French physicists," announced the discovery of a new ray, which is known as the N-ray. It was a matter of observation. It was "personal experience." He saw it. Other eminent scientists saw it.

Dr. Carpenter supplemented the discovery and extended it into the domain of physiology. But strangely enough "not one of the many interested English and German physicists who have endeavored to repeat Blondlot's experiments has been able to do so, and even some who have been present at demonstrations made by the author and his assistants have reported that they could not see what Blondlot asserted that he was then seeing." This is a strange case. To say that Blondlot's eyes are different from other eyes, does not solve the mystery; for others saw the same; yet by whole nationalities the N-rays were invisible, even when they were co-operating in presence of the famous discoverer.

M. Pellat, Professor of Physics in the University of Paris, declared his belief in the N-rays, "because M. Blondlot is a scientific man of great repute." He recites a case of "a distinguished physicist who measured the deviations of N-rays that had passed through a prism of aluminum, and continued to do so when the deviating prism had been surreptitiously removed." Here is the case of a great discovery, by a notable scientist, demonstrated by his own personal experience, that is in dispute among the most reputable scientists in Europe. Experiences often mislead us; and where they depend upon certain exceptional methods, and states of mind, and are contradicted by other experiences, can we trust them for scientific revelation? There are many things that have never been demonstrated to our senses, and in the nature of things cannot be, that are just as certain to our minds as those we have seen, felt, tasted or heard. By the author's definition of "things we know" could any of us testify that within the enclosure of the skull we have convolutions of a special quality of matter that we call brains? We cannot see, hear, smell, taste, or feel them; yet we have no more doubt that they are there, than if we held them in our hands, or weighed them upon scales.

When extraordinary statements are made, that have no precedent in our experience, we need to know by personal experience, and actual contact with records, to justify an acceptance of the claim. The claims set up for the "School of Natural Science" are extraordinary. It hardly seems possible that such a school has existed from prehistoric times, has demonstrated in the most perfect and positive way that death is but an open door to a larger life (as taught by Spiritualism,) and the great growing intellectual and scientific world that leads and inspires civilization know nothing of it.

Moreover it would seem that such rare wisdom, and incomparable science, utilized by such highly qualified teachers, having human welfare at heart, should in the long ages of its labors, have so improved the foundations of human character in a large area of favorable opportunities, as to have brought a large minority of the denizens of earth into easy access for the great truths that hold such inviting charms before them.

But the author offers several reasons for this inaptitude of human nature to learn by experience. Thus: "The acquisition of exact and definite knowledge involves a labor. It calls for the unremitting exercise of honest, earnest, intelligent, courageous and persistent personal effort, on the to be an almost universal characteristic of human nature. However much we may desire a thing whose value we know and appreciate, we possess only a limited amount of intelligence, courage and perseverance which we are ready and willing to exercise in the task of acquiring it. In the largest number of instances—more especially where the thing to be acquired is knowledge—the amount of personal effort we are willing to exert is very small.

"Moreover, when we have reached its limit we are inclined to accept almost any recognized substitute that may be offered. This characteristic of human intelligence is so general and strongly marked that it constitutes one of the chief reasons why so few of our brightest and otherwise most capable men and women become personal demonstrators of the laws. * * * And yet we are forced by evidence which cannot be refuted to recognize as a fundamental principle of individual human development, that exact and definite knowledge comes to all of us in exact ratio with the amount of intelligence, moral courage and perseverance we put into the active search for it. * * * Indeed, to this intellectual inertia, and inherent indolence of human nature are due the most of the prejudices, superstitions and dogmas of both science and religion throughout the ages.

"It is easier to entertain a prejudice than it is to acquire the knowledge necessary to rise above it. * * * It is more convenient to cherish a superstition than it is to acquire the wisdom necessary to demonstrate its fallacy. For this reason most of us are bound by superstition. It is more agreeable (to ourselves) to dogmatize than to demonstrate. Hence it is that most of us are dogmatic without knowing it. It is more pleasant to preach than to practice. (That depends upon the character of the preaching and the kind of practice.—L. C. H.) Therefore the majority preach and the minority practice. (Do they? Do they practice what the majority preach?—L. C. H.) * * * Let us not deceive ourselves longer. Let us not even try to do so. On the contrary let us declare our emancipation from the tyranny of such a slavery. Moreover, let us do it NOW before we turn the leaf on which these words are printed. * * * Hereafter then let us intelligently, courageously and persistently apply ourselves to the honest and earnest search for definite personal knowledge. Let us do this in whatsoever fields are open and accessible to us. Let us do it if necessary, in defiance of our own present opinions and beliefs, prejudices and superstitions, inclinations and desires, as well as those of our fellow-men who would seek to hold our souls in bondage."

To all of this I would offer a few suggestions—(not for the purpose of hypnotizing the reader). That mankind are habitually indolent does not seem to be supported by facts, except in certain tropical climates. Intellectual indolence is doubtless due to the lack of early training. Children usually dislike the confinement and effort that schools often impose. But as their brains develope and the rudiments are mastered, study becomes attractive. But any new departure requiring a new kind of application, is likely to be irksome and, at first, distasteful. But children and men will apply their brains to the study of games—like chess or checkers—and find fascination in the effort.

That "the inherent indolence of human nature" is the cause, or a cause, for the prejudices, superstitions and dogmas of both science and religion," does not seem to be sustained by history. Dogmas are inherited. They exert a powerful influence upon the thinking capacities and reasoning powers of men and women, too. To defend a dogma men will exert their intellectual powers persistently for days, months, and years, when comparatively little effort would demonstrate their error and reveal the truth.

Moreover, it is not because the dogma offers a more pleasing prospect for those who accept it. Men have studied and wrestled with difficulties in the authority that they have been taught to reverence, and summoned all their intellectual energy to sustain the dogma of endless misery and bloody atonement, when half the effort would have shown them the utter fallacy of such doctrine. Nature persists. When she establishes a habit she resists all efforts to change it. It can only be overcome by determined and continuous effort, intelligently applied; or, by the influence of climatic and sidereal intervention, or some cosmic variations that may be remote, but active, and holding hidden relations to the conditions that have fossilized in human life, or in the organisms of physical nature.

Knowledge does not suddenly unsettle and eliminate long-cherished habits of mind. No matter how easy, or how difficult it may be of attainment, the fixed habits of mind are quite sure to ignore or reject it. When Joules of England demonstrated the relation of heat to mechanical energy, proving conclusively the measurement and equivalent, he had done all the work, and made the demonstration; but the scientists of his time spurned it, and for seven years refused it a place in their records. It was not "intellectual inertia" that shut their eyes to this discovery. It was the persistence of the habits of thinking, which fortified their minds against the new revelation.

The author's appeal to his readers to forsake all prejudices and "apply ourselves to the honest and earnest search for definite personal knowledge," is well, but not so easily done as written. I know of no one who is entirely free from prejudice. But if millions were absolutely free, the application in search for definite personal knowledge, might be not only difficult, but impossible, except in the exceedingly narrow line of their search for daily bread.

All of us know a little, and many are daily extending it, by habitually enlarging the sphere of their associations. But the kind of knowledge that seems to be in the author's mind, is utterly out of the reach of all ordinary people, whose daily lives are occupied in the worthy effort to be self-supporting. It is not so much intellectual inertia, I think, that prevents the millions from pursuing a course of study and experiment so indispensable to the attainment of exact personal knowledge, as it is their inability to make conditions, and secure the necessary time from the labors that provide a home and physical comforts for the family. Evolution works slowly and with many temporary reactions; but I see no reason for pessimistic doubt that the Cosmos is a consistent whole, and progressively evolving the limitless possibilities stored in the infinite constitution of Nature.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

THE GREAT WORK.

It Is Highly Commended by One of Its Students.

To the Editor:—In your edition of January 26, Mr. Lyman C. Howe has prefaced his review of "THE GREAT WORK" in a commendable spirit. His avowed attitude, however, is that of criticism and it will probably be beneficial. If the book is not true—let it fall; if it is true it will survive all attacks.

There are those, however, who may be unduly influenced by the attitude assumed by the learned reviewer, and it seems to me that it would not be inappropriate if you published, at this time a foreword from one who has had the privilege of making a far deeper study of the work and the vital principles involved than it has yet been possible for Mr. Howe to do. Without in any way endeavoring to minimize or disparage his judgment or to anticipate his conclusions; with no desire to proselyte or to disturb the balance of the judgment of your readers, I would like to offer you the following from the standpoint of one "who knows whereof he speaks."

"THE GREAT WORK" is the most valuable contribution to literature in the history of the world. Its theme justifies its title. It is "great" because it points out to suffering, longing, aspiring humanity, the path by which the true method of obtaining independent spiritual development, "mastership" and immortality can be obtained.

Its value to the world at this stage of its evolution cannot be over-estimated. It is a "New Testament"; nothing but a reading of it can give an idea of its transcendent importance.

The truth of these apparently bold statements is known to some and is affirmed by others who, having studied the preceding volumes, "Harmonics of Evolution" and "The Great Psychological Crime," have given the last book of the series a critical and careful consideration. To them it is evident that it is either the work of one possessing, or having access to knowledge, transcending that of ordinary mortals (or spirit controls) or of an extraordinarily able man, who, for an inconceivable purpose evilly designs to deceive mankind. However the metaphysical and psychological student forms his own conclusions from the internal evidence presented to his consciousness.

It is a work that will stand the most critical analysis. Its careful definitions and the clearness and precision with which its facts are stated puts it into the foremost rank of scientific writings. The truths cannot be ascertained by a discussion, the only way is to read the book and study it.

This work is claimed to emanate from a great school existing many years before the Mosaic period and preserving an unbroken chain and record, to the present time; with its members on both planes actively interested in human progress. This is stated in detail in the chapter on "The Lineal Key," in such manner that the author's solemn assertion, that he has been in constant personal touch with the "Great Masters" has a consistent bearing on the following extract:

"The remarkable fact that here in this simple formulary, for the first time within the knowledge of our history we find ethics reduced to an exact science, is sufficient of itself to suggest to those who think intelligently, the fact that all this is not the result of any one mind. It should be sufficient to establish beyond question that it is the fruitage of the best intelligences of all ages, from the cradle of humanity to the immediate present. No greater fallacy could be suggested than to credit the author of this volume personally with the honor of having wrought out from the recesses of his own brain and consciousness the definite results here referred to. He would be most willing and happy to acknowledge such honor if he were justly entitled to it. Such, however, is not the case. To him it is sufficient honor that he has been assigned the difficult task of reducing the subject to a simple and unambiguous expression in the language of his own people."

And with this humility, the author, whose love of knowledge and love of truth, have fitted his great intelligence to receive the eternal truths; disclaiming all "leadership" and refusing all material rewards, gives the world the crystallized knowledge of the ages, "content to live his arduous life in complete obscurity that he may better do his work, and better serve his fellow-men."

It would be impossible to review this wonderful book in any space which you would be willing to allow it. It would be analagous to a "review of Shakspeare. The treasures are there. My object will be served, if in any measure the assurance that some of us have traveled along the path and found some light, may be the indirect means of causing others to read and study the book, so that, proving a source of inspiration to some, it may open the way to others "who have long been in darkness and now seek to be brought to light."

At one period I investigated Spiritualism and personally demonstrated many of its varied manifestations, and am highly appreciative of its better influences. I have investigated "Theosophy," been a student of psychology and have been a searcher for truth through metaphysical, philosophical and "occult" literature. I could not find what I wanted.

I have found the source of truth and light now, and my sense of duty impels me to attempt in this way to return in equal measure to my fellowmen the glorious benefits which I have myself received.

Gratefully I sign myself,
A STUDENT OF THE SCHOOL OF NATURAL SCIENCE.

SLEEP WALKING.

And Some Experiences Therewith in Connection With a Prominent Worker.

While I have no desire to plead for the guilty, I was very much interested in the so-called somnambulistic experiences of Ross Freeman, who was acquitted of the charge of burglary and assault in Judge Cottrell's court. To me it seems more of a fact than a theory, and the possibilities are that the youth is in reality a sleep-walker.

Both myself and a brother have had experience in sleep-walking when children, and on many occasions I have awakened to find myself away from the bed in which I went to sleep.

On one occasion a married sister came home on a visit, bringing her little babe with her.

I occupied a good sized bed room, containing a double bed and my mother asked me to sleep in a smaller room as the larger bed was more comfortable for sister and baby. I remonstrated, and asked to have the privilege of sleeping with the baby, but this request was refused. I retired about 10 o'clock and was soon in peaceful slumber. When I awakened in the morning I was astonished to find myself lying on my sister's trunk, which had been placed by an open window in her room. Although it was summer, I was quite chilly when I awakened, hence I must have been there some time. I had to pass through three rooms and open several doors in order to reach her room.

I also remember a cold winter's morning when I awakened to find myself in the dining room sitting behind the stove with my chin close to my knees, and arms folded.

The space between the wall and the stove was not large, and I had never thought of crawling into such a place during waking hours.

Have also found myself in the yard on a summer's morning, and have a distinct recollection of awakening in the garden one morning while in the act of plucking a flower, and having quite a bouquet in my left hand. On awakening there was usually a dazed feeling, not lasting more than a moment, when all seemed clear.

While I was in the city of Portland, Oregon a young negro boy, while asleep walked out of the third story window of a brick building. I believe his name was Smith. He was severely injured, but after being confined in the hospital for a month or two he fully recovered. He said that he dreamed he was fighting with another man and was running away from him.

In my experience there were no dreams or consciousness to my recollection. All I can say is that we have not learned all the lessons of psychology and it is not time for science to fold her hands and say she has finished her work pertaining to this subject or any other.

GEORGIA GLADEYS COOLEY.

The Unknown Life of Christ.

A New edition of the Unknown Life of Christ is just from the press, and we are able to supply all demands. For the benefit of new subscribers we have added thereto two remarkable lectures, one by Prof. Henry S. Olcott, and the other by Miss Elizabeth Harlow, on the "Dangers of Psychism," a very valuable, attractive and instructive addition to this excellent book, and which should be carefully read by every Spiritualist, investigator and occult student in the land. This book is gotten up in fine style, and the additions thereto will enable it to serve a double purpose. It is still sent out as an absolute gift to all who send in $1.00 for The Progressive Thinker one year, and 10 cents in stamps to pay postage on the book.

The Illinois Convention.

It Will Be Good to Be There---An Unusual Program.

The Illinois S. S. A. bids fair to surpass, in its coming convention, all the similar gatherings conducted by it for the past nine years. Spiritualists can be proud of the variety and strength of the program it will present at Handel Hall, the 19th, 20th and 21st insts. No one need be ashamed to invite to its sessions either earnest investigators, or the idly curious, while Spiritualists themselves cannot afford to miss any of the meetings.

The advance announcements of its bill of fare are already in circulation.

While the members of the official board keep modestly in the background, yet all of them will be found at the posts of duty, from President Warne on the platform to the trustees, both resident and non-resident.

An entirely new departure will be the special convention chorus of twenty-five voices, which has been carefully trained by Mrs. Carrie Crawford Pierce, who has entire direction of all the music for the occasion. Her own sweet voice and the perfect tenor of Mr. Pierce will be among the most enjoyable features of that portion of the entertainments.

We give herewith a bird's-eye view of the prominent portions of each session, and refer our readers to the uncondensed program for all details of arrangement.

Tuesday evening—Piano solo, Miss Marion Gordon; violin solo, Mrs. Clara Lauf Gillette; Bridal Chorus from the Rose Maiden, by the convention chorus; duet, The Army and Navy, by Messrs. Pierce and Friedman; Old Folks at Home, by the Ladies' Quartette; address, Miss Harlow; message giving, Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley and Mrs. J. A. Murtha.

Wednesday morning—Annual meeting of the State Association; election of officers, and consideration of the needs of the cause in Illinois.

Wednesday afternoon—Piano solo, Miss Marie Pierce; vocal solos, Mrs. Aaron and Mrs. Fisher; addresses by Geo. H. Brooks, president Wisconsin S. S. A., and Max Gentzke, editor of Lichtstrahlen; message giving, Mrs. Caird, Mrs. Sexsmith, Prof. McLane.

Wednesday evening—Vocal solo, Mr. E. L. Brown, of Elmwood, Ill.; vocal trio, Mrs. Pierce and Messrs Pierce and Fessler; addresses, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond and Thomas Grimshaw; message giving, Mrs. Cleveland and Mrs. Murtha; selection by Cremona Mandolin and Guitar Club; violin solo, Joseph Singer.

Thursday morning—Memorial services for Moses Hull, Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, and all arisen workers, participated in by Dr. J. H. Randall, Dr. C. A. Burgess, Dr. T. Wilkins, and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, with personal tributes by volunteers.

Thursday afternoon—Addresses, Mrs. Cooley and Mr. Brooks; messages, Mrs. Susie Thompson, Mrs. Barbara Hilbert, Mrs. E. Hanson; vocal solo, Mrs. Pierce; baritone solo, Mr. Fessler.

Thursday evening—Addresses, by Thomas Grimshaw and Miss Harlow; message giving, Mrs. Elmo and Mrs. Murtha; duet, Mr. and Mrs. Pierce; whistling solo, Mrs. E. Leuthesser; vocal solo, Mrs. Pierce; baritone solo, Mr. Fessler; Pinsuti's Spring Song, convention chorus; closing hymn by the audience, "To the Work, To the Work."

Admission—Mornings, free; afternoons, 15 cents; evenings, 25 cents. What a wealth of talent for so small an entrance fee!

Let every one attend. Now is the opportunity to impress officials and laymen of Chicago and the state, with the strength and character of true Spiritualism, raising it in the public mind to a higher plane than that of fortune-telling, money-grabbing, personal notoriety and Indian pow-wows.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

EXPLANATORY.

Still they are coming—names for a full set of the remarkable works by Andrew Jackson Davis, one of the best seers that ever lived on this earth. The notice for subscribers was temporarily withdrawn on account of the Doctor's inability to procure possession of the plates, in regard to which something may appear soon.

TO THE FRIENDS OF MOSES HULL.

I would like the friends and acquaintances of Moses Hull to send me any matters of public interest they can concerning him, whether letters, incidents, facts in controversy, etc. I may not be able to use all material thus sent, but it is well that I should have it.

The Way We Appear In Other Lands

Our Camp Meetings Reflected Among the Spiritualists of England.

The Brilliant and Versatile Lilian Whiting gives a graphic portrayal of some of our leading Camps in this country, and the prominent lecturers and mediums connected therewith, in "The Annals of Psychic Science," of London, England. Of such interest is the communication throughout, that we transfer the whole of it to the columns of The Progressive Thinker. Reader's of this paper must remember that its size enables us to give by far a greater variety of matter pertaining to Spiritualistic and Occult subjects, and general matters pertaining to our Cause, than any other paper now published, either in this country or Europe. This fact has become so generally known, that the paper has been the recognized organ of every prominent Spiritualist and Medium in the United States. Miss Whiting's descriptions of the camps, the speakers and mediums will be read with interest.

"IT IS REVEALED TO US AS A PLAIN FACT THAT CELESTIAL BEINGS, BEYOND OUR POWERS OF PERCEPTION, HAVE CLEAR AND DEFINITE RELATIONSHIPS WITH US—MINISTERING TO US, SYMPATHISING WITH US, MOURNING OVER OUR FAILURES, REJOICING OVER OUR REPENTANCES; AND THE FIRST CONCLUSION FROM THE FACT OUGHT TO BE A CERTAIN RESTRAINING SENSE OF HIGH COMPANIONSHIP. IT IS A PART OF THE RECOGNIZED PROVIDENCE OF GOD TO INFLUENCE, GUIDE, AND EDUCATE US IN HUMAN AND VISIBLE THINGS BY HUMAN AND VISIBLE AGENCIES—BY FRIENDS, PARENTS, BROTHERS AND SISTERS, WHOSE PRESENCE WITH US AND LOVE FOR US HAS BEEN A RESTRAINING INFLUENCE; ALL OF US HAVE KNOWN VERITABLE HUMAN ANGELS WITHOUT WHOSE LOVING CARE LIFE WOULD HAVE SEEMED A CHAOS; AND RATHER THAN GRIEVE THEM, WE HAVE OFTEN EXERCISED MUCH SELF-CONTROL. IT SHOULD BE AT LEAST AN EQUALLY RESTRAINING CONSIDERATION TO BE ASSURED BY OUR HEAVENLY FATHER THAT HE HAS ALSO SURROUNDED US WITH LOVING INVISIBLE FRIENDS THROUGH WHOM HE COMMUNICATES HIS THOUGHTS AND HIS WILL, AND THAT HE HAS GIVEN HIS ANGELS CHARGE OVER US, AND IN THEIR HANDS THEY SHALL BEAR US UP. HOW NEAR I KNOW NOT, BUT NEAR ENOUGH TO BRING HEAVEN INTO OUR VERY MIDST."—VERY REV. BASIL WILBERFORCE, ARCHDEACON OF WESTMINSTER.

"We are spirits clad in veils;
Man by man was never seen;
All our deep communion falls
To remove the shadowy screen."

The Spiritualistic "camp-meetings," as they have formerly been called—the name now changed to assembly—have been an important phase of the general inquiry for larger truth and the increasing recognition of it since 1873. Now with a record of more than a quarter of a century, with a history at once complex, incongruous, and comprehensive of almost the entire scale of manifested phenomena, the movement may well claim critical observation and focus serious attention in contemplation of its breadth and inclusiveness.

The history of the Spiritualistic movement in the United States is one which, if read backward like the Chaldeans, reveals a progressive series of phases which invite attention if not conviction. As a matter of speculative inquiry this history offers curiously varied and inclusive phenomena, holding in solution, so to speak, nearly or quite all that are now specialized under hypnotism, suggestion, the secondary or multiple personality, regression of memory, exteriorization of sensibility, thought transference and other forms of phenomenal conditions. Beginning with the simple and primitive rap heard by the Fox sisters in 1847, Spiritualism has, within this more than half a century since, developed so many aspects that the general life is interpenetrated, often unconsciously, with its influence or its philosophy.

Perhaps no form of belief has been so little a propaganda as that of Spiritualism. For the most part its convocations have been held as the interest of its believers rather than as a method for inducing belief. The unformulated conviction has seemed to be that the adherents and devotees of the faith turned to it spontaneously and of their own accord,—as a natural condition in evolutionary development—when the right time came, and until then it was no affair of argument. Inquirers were welcomed and exacoffered, as a rule, all possible facilities for investigation; but inquiry is seldom forced upon the public. Saying this, as a rather general truth, it must also be said that fakes and frauds are too numerous, if they do not abound; but they hold the same relation to the true manifestations that counterfeit money holds to genuine currency. And in any serious study of finance it is the genuine currency that we study and not the counterfeit, however skilfully created.

The camp-meeting was first initiated in the summer of 1873 at Lake Pleasant, in the western part of Massachusetts, a hundred miles from Boston. Nature offered attractions in a beautiful little lake some three miles in circumference which lay, gem-like, among the hills, with a railway station in near proximity, and here three hundred cottages have been erected within the thirty-three years that have passed, which are occupied for weeks before and weeks after the convocation, which usually lasts one month. The sites for the "camp-meetings"—now usually known as assemblies—are always chosen with an eye to beauty and healthfulness, combined with good facilities for reaching them by the ordinary routes of travel.

From May to October inclusive, the place invites the sojourner. There are accommodations to meet all requirements, cottages, large and small, furnished and unfurnished, can be rented at moderate prices for the season,—anything from five to forty pounds; while rooms from six to eight shillings a week upward may be obtained, and meals at modest prices are procurable in a variety of ways. The hotels are open during the session of the meetings, and often for some little time before and after to accommodate transient guests.

In spiritistic phenomena every line is represented and every manifestation of mediumship. Psychics of every conceivable order take up their abode within the grounds; the "test" mediums, the healing, the materializing, the slate-writing, the automatic writing; the trumpet medium; the medium who produces the independent voices; those who produce "spirit photographs" and portraits in colors; the flower mediums; the inspirational speakers; the palmists; the astrologists and astro-psychic; the medium who has discovered the 'means of "conscious co-operation with nature," and can inform you (at the modest rate of a dollar a month, or ten dollars a year), how to avoid the mere stupid mistake of death—who will, for a consideration, impart to you the secret of perpetual youth; the man who has worked out a new planetary system that accounts for every variation in the universe by a perfection of method undreamed of by the new astronomers, the man who has found that all scholastic drudgery is superfluous—that college and university are the most unnecessary of institutions, and that all knowledge can be "tapped" and flow into him who will lie on the sofa for two or three hours a day and receive. What does Festus say?

"All aspiration is a toil
But Inspiration cometh from above
And is no labor."

All these and other variations on the uncanny folks may be found—as incongruous as the contents of the witches' cauldron. The weird sisters are not limited to the heath near Torres. From the interview with your grandmother to the Shade of Solomon one may find almost any demand granted, almost every desire met. The curious and wonderful suggestibility of the subliminal plays, without doubt, a great part in these seances, and, to some degree, independently of the medium. The manner in which indications of the subnormal will be apparent, even in jokes and frauds, is one of the perplexing problems with which the sitter has to deal. If a seance were, frankly, all fraud and artifice,—that is conceivable. If it were all genuine,—that is conceivable, also; but it is the degree in which a grain of truth is inwoven with a very large measure of falsity which offers perplexities. As a witty American writer, Gail Hamilton, once exclaimed: "Milk is good and water is good, but don't put the milk-pail under the pump." Gleams of truth, evidences of the supernormal knowledge, will be recognized and then, suddenly, "the charm's wound up," and both sitter and psychic are afloat on a sea of fabrications and falsities.

The up-risings of the sub-self offer phenomena which are yet to be explored and formulated. Professor HiramCorson, Litt. U. L. L. U., of Cornell University, holds that this subself is the source of man's highest spiritual knowledge. Browning expresses the same conviction in "Paracelsus":

"Truth is within ourselves; it takes no rise
From outward things, whate'er you may believe,
There is an inmost centre in ourselves
Where truth abides in fullness."

"This doctrine appears in 'Sordello,'" says Dr. Corson, "especially in the fifth book, in 'A Death in the Desert,' 'Fifine at the Fair,' in 'The Ring and the Book,' in 'Beatrice Signorini,' in 'Asolando,' his last volume of poems, published on the day of his death. These are but a few of the places where the doctrine comes out in Browning, evincing how vital it was with him from the earliest to the latest period. This and the resurrecting power of personality (one in which the spiritual man ever co-operates with the intellectual) may be said to be the great cardinal doctrines of his poetry."

Dr. Corson adds:

"It is what man draws up from his sub-self which is of prime importance in his true education, not what is put into him. It is the occasional uprising of our essential sub-selves that causes us, at times, to feel that we are 'greater than we know,' and that affords an inward proof of the saying of Jesus that the kingdom of God cometh not with observation, but that it is within us. But these uprisings give us 'intimations of immortality' more evidential and alluring than can be derived from all merely intellectual evidences, which are, in fact, no evidence at all."

"These uprisings of the sub-self subside, but the more frequent they become by leading a spiritual life, the less are their subsidences, the uprisings becoming more and more a part of our permanent, conscious selves. It is through the uprisings of the subself, its final freedom from subsidence and its permanent connection with the upper conscious self, that man becomes, so to speak, isolated from the flesh (a state expressed by the Sanskrit word Kaivalya, signifying isolation or aloneness) and attains to oneness with absolute being. This state was realized by Jesus, who could say, "I and the Father are one.' 'When is man strong until he feels alone,' says Valance in Colombe's Birthday.' How little the saying of Jesus to Martha has been understood! —'I am the resurrection and the life,' —that is, I myself, a resurrected spirit, resurrect the buried bodies of men."

These "buried spirits" explain a vast amount of perhaps otherwise almost inexplicable phenomena of the seance room. Hidden things come to the surface; events, trains of thought, moods, and memories have a resurrection.

A veracious historian of thirty-three years of Spiritualistic camp-meetings could not, however, dwell merely, nor even mostly, on fraud.

"There are nettles everywhere,
But smooth green grasses are more common still,
The blue of heaven is larger than the cloud."

The intelligent observer finds in any close and critical study of these assemblies that they are largely characterized by simplicity and sincerity. The National Spiritualists' Association, as a body, condemns fraud with scathing force. In his annual address President Harrison D. Barrett said:

"I believe the time has come for us, as an organized body, to declare with forceful emphasis our determined opposition to every form of fraud and to the employment of persons of questionable character upon our platforms or in our seance rooms as speakers and mediums. I plead for a loyal defense and support of honest mediums of every phase."

In all the leading camps no recognized fraudulent medium is admitted; still, as before noted in this paper, fraud and genuineness are sometimes strangely mingled.

During the summer of 1906 some forty-three camp-meetings have been held in America, ranging over the country from Maine to Washington on the Pacific Coast, and from Massachusetts to Florida. Of these the leading ones are those of Onset and Lake Pleasant, Massachusetts; Lily Dale in New York; Parkland Heights Spiritual Home in Pennsylvania; and Lake Helen in Florida, the sessions of the latter being held in the early spring. Of these the assemblies of Lily Dale and of Onset continue from thirty to fifty days in July and August, while most of tthe others are in session only thirty days, or less. Among the now prominent speakers are Rev. Cora L. V. Richmond, Rev. Frederick A. Wiggin, Mrs. Helen L. P. Russegue, Rev. May S. Pepper, Miss Susie C. Clark, J. Clegg Wright, Rev. Wilson Fritch, Mrs. R. S. Lillie, Prof. William M. Lockwood, Rev. Dr. B. F. Austin, Mrs. Annette J. Pettengill, Mrs. Minnie M. Soule, Lyman C. Howe and Dr. W. O. Knowles.

Onset is one of the most beautiful seaside resorts of Massachusetts; on what is known as the South Shore. It is only fifty miles from Boston, with splendid beaches in close proximity; the center of several good hotels, boarding houses, and with dozens of cottages which are taken by the season. For the Spiritualist camp-meeting is inclusive of something more than its specific purpose; it offers a summer outing in attractive places to families and individuals who, otherwise, could not afford to take it. There is a good proportion of the "camp-followers"—the name being literally applicable,—who are only incidentally and sympathetically related to Spiritualism; they take up their summer abode within the grounds; dip into the meetings, conferences, and possibly seances, occasionally; they believe, or they are inclined to believe, or they are hospitable enough to the belief, that there is truth in the claim of communion between the Seen and the Unseen,—but, at best, they take their inclinations or their convictions passively rather than actively. There is a radiant and beautiful atmosphere in which to live; the gleam of silvery water seen through a luxuriance of midsummer greenery; simple, kindly folk abound by and surround them; there are no particular standards of conventional life and fashion to impose their sway, rents are cheap, and altogether the conditions are alluring. It may also, without exaggeration, be said that they are uplifting. Our poet, Whittier, expressed a profound truth in the stanza:

"O human kindness, human love!
To few who seek denied:
Too late we learn to prize above
The whole round world beside."

As Prof. Amiel so well counselled: "O, be swift to love! Make haste to be kind!" The real progress of the world is—in its fundamental reality—carried on by this treasure of kindness, and this very friendly atmosphere is a notable feature of the Spiritualists' camp-meetings. The critical observer may go to scoff, but the chances are that he remains to pray, so to speak; that he is attracted, and more or less helped by the sympathetic harmony he finds surrounding him.

There are usually three sessions a day in these meetings. There is nominal admission of ten cents to the grounds, and the country people for miles around will come for a day, bringing with them a picnic dejeuner; listening to more or less of the addresses, and strolling about with friends at their pleasure. They do not assimilate any special philosophy but they are aware of a kindly, human brotherhood, with intimations of a life beyond that is encouraging to effort and endurance.

There are also special days set apart for the discussion of special themes, outside spiritism. The "Peace Day," when speakers on international arbitration and peace hold the platform; "Woman's Day," when representatives of the political emancipation of women, representatives of prohibition, and perhaps also of some industrial ideals, are invited to speak. In this way the late Miss Susan B. Anthony was heard both at Onset and at Lily Dale; Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, previously to her death in 1905, was more than once the speaker of the day at Onset, and a group of representative men and women allied with political, temperance and industrial interests are frequently heard from the platform of the Spiritualist camp-meetings. Health is a topic that receives no little attention; and, in one way or another, the Spiritualistic philosophy is related in many ways by its expounders to the general life.

The speakers engaged to make the addresses at the Spiritualist camp-meetings are paid,—two pounds for each address on a week-day and three pounds on Sunday. On the latter day, too, the nominal entrance fee to the grounds is increased, usually from ten to fifteen cents, or a season card of admission is sold (as at Lily Dale) for sixteen shillings.

The various psychics also gather at one of the camps and hold individual seances at such hours and such prices as they themselves fix with the sitter. These seances are regulated entirely by individual option.

Of course camp followers—the cranks and fanatics, the soothsayers and uncanny folk in general—are not unknown, but they rarely, if ever, appear as platform speakers. These are selected with care, are invited to appear, and a feature called conferences is frequently introduced—a general meeting in which any speaker, limited strictly to five minutes, may take part, and this proves a safety-valve for the superfluous genius that has theories for keeping up the sun at night in the heavens and remodelling the universe in general.

Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, the chairman of the Onset Camp, is a physician of the education and culture distinctive of the best representative of his profession. This camp is managed with efficient judgment, integrity of business methods, and a hospitality of purpose that is none the less keenly discriminating in that it is liberal and tolerant.

In its thirtieth annual session this past summer the programme broadened into a comprehensive inclusiveness of the occult, the metaphysical, and the psychical discussions. Rev. Cora L. V. Richmond, who makes a specialty of Astro-Psychology, believes there is a direct psychological relation between the individual soul and the planets. In a book entitled The Soul, Mrs. Richmond expounds her philosophy in a logical and finely thoughtful way; and her lectures, ranging over "Soul Astrology," cover this ground, and Mrs. Richmond also compared and defined Astro-Psychology and Psychology. One finds Mrs. Richmond offering such thought as this:

"Spiritual power is the beginning of inspiration. * * * * Whatever flows into man's life from the divine infiltrates through the body and mind. We do not call that inspiration which is the usual activity of spirit in the organic nature, this is simply the power which the spirit uses, but which is not spiritual power. The distinction between the two is evident; one may give expression to many things by a power which is from within, but when that which is from within is expressed, it becomes an impelling force, a light divine."

A course of lectures at Onset by Mr. Wilson Fritch—who was also one of the leading speakers at Lily Dale—offered a rather illuminating discussion of "Intuition," "Thought," "Telepathy," "Auras and Colors" and "Symmetry." Under the general title of "The Science of Noble Living," Miss Marietta L. Mason discussed, in a series of lectures, "The Unveiling of the Psychic," "Character Reading," "Chirology," "Astrology, or Our Place in the Zodiac," and "Harmony, or Health and Happiness."

Rev. Frederick A. Wiggin, pastor of Unity (Spiritualist) Church in Boston—a church with a very large following—gave several lectures with tests. Mr. Wiggin's (alleged) "control" is the famous actor, John McCullagh, and the polished and dramatic manner—dramatic, but not theatrical—of Mr. Wiggin goes far to suggest the genuineness of the claim. Mr. Wiggin's sermons are "inspirational" in their character and they certainly offer ethical counsel of high value, and his psychic power has manifested itself in some remarkable tests. Mr. Wiggin's Sunday evening discourses in his church are always supplemented with spirit messages.

Miss Susie C. Clark is one of the most original and vital speakers on the Spiritualistic platform. She is the author of several books, and has an especial gift as a "spiritual healer." It is Miss Clark who treated Mrs. McKinley, the widow of the martyred president, and from a condition of apparently hopeless invalidism, with no prospect of much continuance of life, Mrs. McKinley is now comparatively well. The list of Miss Clark's patients is a notable one, and her course of lectures at Onset last summer drew special attention. They discussed mental and spiritual healing; the manner of utilizing mental powers; the place of Will, Imagination and Memory; the "Power of a Radiant Spirit"; psychic healing, concentration and meditation as aids to illumination and topics along this line.

In this past summer of 1906 forty-three Spiritualist camp-meetings have been held in the States. While those of Lily Dale and Onset take the lead in numerical attendance and importance, the smaller and less known hold their individual interest. That of Queen City Park, on the shore of Lake Champlain, two miles from the City of Burlington, Vermont, connected by electric trolley lines, held its twenty-sixth annual assembly this year, its speakers including Rev. B. F. Austin pastor of Plymouth (Spiritualist) Church in Rochester, New York, and the editor of Reason, and Mrs. Helen L. P. Russegue, whose addresses are ethical rather than conjoined with the phenomenal in any way. "I care for no definition of religion that shall not enable me to go out into life, and help some that are weaker, some that are lower," one finds Mrs. Russegue saying.

The Mississippi Valley Spiritualists' Association held its twenty-fourth assembly this past summer in Mount Pleasant Park, in Iowa, when hotel and cottages are supplemented by tents rented at incredibly low rates. At this camp, among the leading speakers are Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, whose lectures are supplemented with spirit messages; Georgia Gladys Cooley, who is considered to be a transmitter of peculiarly sympathetic messages, and Mme. Stuart-Richings, a dramatic reader, whose lectures on spiritualistic themes are mingled with a series of dramatic interpretations of the poets. The Mount Pleasant Park grounds are beautiful, and the association is entirely free from debt. They define the object of their assembly to be "the promulgation of the only scientific religion," and their platform is a broad one, and emphasizes the brotherhood of man, and keeps in view the social needs of the convocation. This camp has also its special days—"Theosophical Day," "Flower Day," "Women's Day" and others of a special character.

Now the feeling everywhere inspired by these camp meetings—of which forty-three were in session this past summer of 1906—is one of prevailing enthusiasm. By this one does not mean mere fanaticism; "I call a man fanatical when his enthusiasm is narrow and hoodwinked, so that he has no sense of proportion, and becomes unjust and unsympathetic to men who are out of his own track," says George Eliot, in the person of one of her characters, and adds: "I should like to keep the word enthusiast for the highest order of minds, those who care supremely for grand and general benefits to mankind."

The impartial observer of the general spirit of these camp-meetings, as manifested in their varied aspects, cannot but feel that it is the enthusiast rather than the fanatic that gives the pervading tone to the assembly. In any prolonged study and critical analysis of this unique feature of summer life, one gains a new perception of the significance of the common lot, a deeper recognition of the value of the humanities. With occasional admixture of the grotesque and the fraudulent, the character of the meetings is, in the main, sincere. Most of the addresses made are intelligent, and some of them are even philosophic and scholarly. This assertion may, at first, seem incredulous to the scientific mind, but a closer inquiry would emphasize its truth. Mediumship, when commercialized, has its temptations. Is it the only phase of remunerative activities which is invested with temptation?

Mr. Harrison D. Barrett, for many years the president of the National Spiritualists' Association of America, is a man who may well be included, with no sort of exaggeration, among the great men of his country. An educated and highly cultivated gentleman; a man of the utmost spirituality of life; of noble purpose, intellectual power, the most generous as well as discriminating appreciation; of delicate insight, infinite sympathies; and combined with all these fine and divinely helpful qualities are his genius for organization, his power of drawing from every one his best, his greatness of leadership.

In the annual convention of the N. S. A., held in Chicago, in October, President Barrett in the chair, it was

"Resolved. That as mediumship is the gateway through which the realization of the continuity of life is brought to humanity we realize that the only way to have the best is to furnish the best possible conditions, and we therefore urge every society and individual to exercise the greatest care in the selection of time and place in which their spiritual gatherings are held; and in the selection of individuals who represent them as mediators between the material and spiritual phases of life; and to this end we recommend that the state association, through its officers, devise a system of reading especially suited to investigation."

In President Barrett's annual report is evinced his hospitable attitude toward other forms and methods whose trend is the same pursuit of spiritual truth. Regarding psychic research President Barrett says:

"This important branch of occult study has assumed larger proportions during the past year, and has made appreciable progress in every division of its work. The transition of Prof. Richard Hodgson has led to the disbanding of the American Branch of the London Society for Psychic Research, and to the organization of a new society, with Prof. James H. Hyslop of Columbia University as secretary. This new organization will assume legal form, and take its place before the public as a regularly instituted movement on or before January 1st, 1907. It is reported that an endowment fund of twenty-five thousand dollars or more has been raised by the had-working secretary, the income from which is to be used in defraying the expenses of the society. I recommend that we extend congratulations to the members upon their success and assure them of every possible co-operation on our part in the prosecution of their work."

That this is not the language of one lenient towards fraud or fanaticism is evident.

One of the most important speakers at the camps is Mrs. Mary T. Longley, the secretary of the National Spiritualists' Association. Mrs. Longley believes she is "controlled" in her platform work by the Rev. John Pierpont, a Boston clergyman of the early years of the nineteenth century, who was a poet, a thinker, and a divine of wide recognition and following. He is the grandfather of the well-known New York capitalist, Mr. Pierpont Morgan, whose mother was the daughter of Rev. John Pierpont. In Mrs. Longley's lectures before the Spiritualist camp-meetings we find such passages as these:

"So far, Spiritualism has given just the light which the world was prepared to receive, but there are storehouses of knowledge which have not yet been unsealed to mortal comprehension; there are great and beautiful revelations yet to be made, but these can not be given until sensitives are so thoroughly quickened in their mentality—the vibratory action of mind and body—as to be uplifted in the superior hours of entrancement or of spiritual perception on to the plane of vibratory action on which the spirit teachers reside and from which they can gather knowledge and power.

"Not until human minds who are investigating these subtle laws have become so attuned in harmony with the spiritual spheres and their higher conditions as to be able to receive and interpret the revelations that are held back in the present day, will these things be poured out upon the mortal world, but there are grand reservoirs of knowledge that can be obtainable in the to-morrow of Spiritualism. In the to-day it is not possible to give more than hints or gleams of these things from the unseen—hints of the glory that is pent up in spiritual states of consciousness and of achievement by wise intelligences who have by no means forgotten the needs of humanity on earth—gleams of brilliancy that scintillate from the minds of high souls that have gone forward in their search for truth and their attainment of wisdom."

There are persons living in Boston to-day who vividly recall the ministry of Rev. John Pierpont, and who regard these "inspirational" talks of Mrs. Longley's as being singularly characteristic of him. The following passage from one of Mrs. Longley's lectures, alleged to be inspired by Mr. Pierpont, certainly outvoices a truth regarding these camp-meeting addresses:

"But we do mean to say that what sometimes seems to be an illiterate expression, or of but small account to the intellectual mind, may bring comfort and sweetness to some humble life that could not comprehend the abstruse questions or understand the serious problems pertaining to human progress and growth, but can be comforted by the lowly word spoken by a departed friend that brings light and beauty into the home life. And so our thought to-night is that the weakness of the present day, as interpreted by those who stand far off and contemplate Spiritualism as something unworthy their attention, may have been the lever to uplift many human hearts from the depths of sorrow, many human minds from the night of ignorance to planes of comfort and of knowledge that the carping world does not understand."

And again:

"When we consider how much the spirit world has to overcome by way of limitation, of strange and erratic mental conditions on the earth side, before it can give the intelligent and individualized message; or the manifestation of power through physical objects, we may say Spiritualism has done well, it has accomplished much. It has been the great event of history of the nineteenth century, of all the centuries, culminating in its expression and power in the nineteenth century and reaching onward into the twentieth century with force and beauty of thought and spirit touching the hearts as with electric fire, of thousands of human thinkers outside the pale of Spiritualism, so-called, as well as keeping up its work among its adherents in our own ranks.

"The question should not be, 'Why have not spirits done more in their return to earth during these few decades of time?' but it should be, 'How could they have accomplished so much with all the limitations and obstructions in their path?' But we can say that for scores of years, yea, no doubt for centuries, human beings in the spirit world have been experimenting, studying up these lines of thought, seeking to understand the law of vibratory force and action, trying to gain knowledge of the power of mentality, of mind over mind; coming in contact with physical objects and exercising an electrical or electro-magnetic force upon them to make them as it were alive, subservient and responsive to intelligent will; making these investigations and experiments with the only thought in mind to culminate them in opening a highway of communication between the so-called spirit world and this plane called earth, and this has been accomplished by what great effort on the spirit part no one of earth can ever know; by overcoming what obstacles no one can understand; by continually and watchfully experimenting, going over and over again lines of thought and of effort that promise to give some good result until at last the line was laid and communication opened between the two worlds."

The question as to the alleged supernormal power of the speakers at these meetings might well invite study. Sir Oliver Lodge, lecturing on the ether and its functions, has said:

"I have now endeavored to introduce to you the simplest conception of the material universe which has yet occurred to man,—the conception, that is, of one universal substance, extending to the furthest limits of space of which we have any knowledge, existing equally everywhere; some portions, either at rest or in simple irrotational motions, transmitting the undulations which we call light; other portions, in rotational motion—in vortices, that is—and differentiated permanently from the rest of the medium by reason of this motion. These whirling portions constitute what we call matter; their motion gives them rigidity, and of them our bodies and all other material bodies with which we are acquainted are built up. One continuous substance filling all space, which can vibrate as light, which can be sheared into positive and negative electricity, which in whirls constitutes matter, and which transmits by continuity and not by impact every action and reaction of which matter is capable—this is the modern view of the ether and its functions."

It is into this "continuous substance filling all space" that the ethereal man, released from his physical body, passes, and which constitutes the next stage of his environment. Into this ethereal realm the psychic easily passes by virtue of his own preponderance of the luminiferous ether, and that he may thus receive the flow of thought from the spirit with whom he is especially in rapport is easily conceivable.

Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham is one of the platform speakers whose power is apparently of the supernormal; and to her addresses are added tests that can hardly be accounted for outside the spiritistic theory.

A critical student of the phenomena of the seance held by the individual psychic at the camp-meetings, must discern and give the same recognition to the indications of genuineness that he would to the indications of fraud. With one (slate-writing) medium, who had even been "exposed" and labeled as a fraudulent producer of messages, a candid sitter had the following experience. As she was on her way to keep the appointment made she was suddenly haunted by a stanza that ran:

"I know you are always by my side
And I know you love me, Winnifred,
dear,
For I never called on you since you died
But you answered tenderly, 'I am

The tantalizing experience of endeavoring to relegate a stray stanza in one's memory to the proper poem and author to whom it belongs is well known to everyone; and it beset this lady until, finally, at the very door of the seance room, it came to her that the author was Phoebe Carey. She entered, closed two slates together, and as they were held up in space by herself and the psychic the tiny pencil within was heard writing swiftly. When it ceased the slates were opened, and there was a message signed "Phoebe Carey." The theory that the slates were prepared beforehand, and that the prepared ones were, by sleight-of-hand, substituted for the fresh and unwritten ones, and that the sound of apparent writing was, instead, the scratch of the psychic's finger-nails on the under side of the under slate—the method of fraud, that had been charged in the expose, was rendered untenable by this little occurrence. The psychic must needs have been little less than supernatural if she could have foreseen this little incident of memory on the part of her sitter. Yet the question remains: Was it simply and frankly Phoebe Carey who wrote? Was it some "control" who read the name in the sitter's mind? In either case one can hardly escape from the conviction of the supernormal origin of the writing.

It is increasingly apparent that in the realm of the ether new laws are met with, and that the miracle of one plane is but the ordinary, the natural occurrence on the next plane. The vital force of the whole universe manifests itself in various phases and degrees of spiritual activity. "In telepathy," says Rev. Wilson Fritch, one of the important lecturers before Spiritualist camp-meetings, "we come to a solid metaphysical ground for the loftiest experience of saints and mystics. If it is possible to read the spirit vibrations of finite beings, it is possible to read the same sort of vibration in the Infinite. And as the Infinite lives in an eternal now, without past or future, the past can be read and the future discerned. Prophecy is, then, the exercise of a natural function. Infinite vistas of "Actina," a Wonderful Discovery That Cures Afflictions of the Eye and Ear Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for the cure of most forms of disease, for a new system of treating afflictions of the eye has been discovered whereby all torturous methods are eliminated. There is no risk or experimenting, as hundreds of people have been cured of failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when specialists, they state, termed the cases incurable.

Mr. A. O. T. Pennington, special agent Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co., Kansas City, Mo., writes: "Having used Actina for several years, I cheerfully recommend it for the cure of eye, ear and throat affections. It cured my mother, of cataracts."

Susan Cardwell, Lincoln, Kan., writes: "I am 73 years old. I was so blind I could only know persons by their voices. After using Actina I can now thread a needle without glasses."

Rev. W. C. Goodwin, Moline, Kan., writes: "My honest opinion of Actina is that it is one of the most marvelous discoveries of the age. It cured my eyes, and cured my wife of asthma."

Hundreds of other testimonials will be sent on application. "Actina" is purely a home treatment and self-administered by the patient, and is sent on trial postpaid. If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Co., Dept 342B, 811-813 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive absolutely free a valuable book, Professor Wilson's Treatise on the Eye and on Disease.

Prof. Lockwood's Books.

Store your mind with the great but demonstrative truths found in consecutive order only in these writings.

Prof. Lockwood is the only writer, thinker and lecturer in this country who affirms that the evolution of the soul of man is in strict accord and agreement with the evolution of the soul of nature; and that the only proof of immortality inheres in an analysis of nature's fundamental principles and the co-relation of cosmic elements and energies.

These great truths are explained and demonstrated from the plane of the Spiritual Philosophy founded on Nature itself.

The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature and its Relation to the Philosophy of Spiritualism. A scientific demonstration of the invisible principles and attributes of nature and Modern Spiritualism. A mint of scientific truths as the basis of its phenomena. Price 25 cents.

The Infidelity of Ecclesiasticism—A Menace to the American Civilization. The entire hierarchy of Ecclesiasticism arraigned as infidels for subverting the scientific demonstrations of universities and colleges, by substituting the immoral phantoms of the Mosaic Hypothesis. It is a hot shot. Price 25 cents.

Historical, Logical and Philosophical Objections to the Dogmas of Reincarnation and Re-Embodiment. A concise and masterly review of the historical origin of Reincarnation as an ancient dogma. Its illogical claims and inconsistent assumptions. Its glaring defects and dogmas dissected. Price 25 cents.

The Spiritualism of Nature. Modern Spiritualism has its basic truths in nature, and is proven not by the bible or any sacred cosmogony, but by an analysis of nature's self-existent principles. Price 15 cents.

Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth. The greatest book, and the greatest truth of any age; a book of 212 pages with several telling scientific illustrations. Continuity of life and the association of spirit realms demonstrated to be in scientific accord with principles of the Co-relation of Force, and the Conservation of Energy. The greatest book ever written in the defence and support of Spiritualism. Price $1.

The Relation Science Holds to Natural Philosophy and its Conflict with Every Phase of Religion. In this essay the author shows that science is not a thing—a corporation or individual, but a process of inductive and deductive reasoning. Its acceptance means the death of Theurgical religions. Price 15 cents.

All of Prof. Lockwood's publications are on sale at The Progressive Thinker office, Chicago, Ill., and at the rostrum when he lectures. These treatises contain the wealth of a vast historical and scientific research.

The Universe By L. M. Rose. This booklet contains 71 pages of explanation regarding force; the beginning of creation; what matter is; what life is; immortality; psychic science; the soul of things, and ends with a poem entitled "Song of Psyche," by Emma Nickerson-Warne. Price 25 cents.

PROGRESSION Or How a Spirit Advances in Spirit Life. The evolution of Man. By Michael Faraday. Price 15c.

ROMANISM EXPOSED Is a pamphlet of 80 pages, in reply to Prof. David Swing, Priest Cashman and Dr. Withrow, and is principally in defense of Protestantism. A concise little pamphlet. Price 15 cents.

Science and a Future Life

By Prof. James H. Hyslop. Price $1.50; Postage 10 cents.

This work is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its ethical deductions, unanswerable in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. For sale at this office.

RADIANT ENERGY and Its Analysis, Its Relation to Modern Astrophysics, by Edgar L. Larkin, Director Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, California. This book treats upon a new branch of research into the laws of nature, and to the student or even an admirer of the modern astrological literature will surely come with great interest. Price, cloth, $1.75.

Anna Throndsen, leeturer and test medium, can be addressed for engagements at No. 1619 College avenue, Indianapolis, Ind.

Mrs Carrie M. Hinsdale of Ft. Worth, Texas, is now at Sulphur, Ind. Ter., where she is doing some excellent work. She can be addressed for engagements at that place in care of John P. Gopdman.

Mamie Young writes; ""Divine Spiritual Church meetings are being enjoyed by good audiences every Sunday. Rev. Lucy A. Hodge Koontz greeted her hearers with a message of love Sunday evening, following with messages from spirit life, giving out the truth of Spiritualism, which was more than thankfully received."

Mrs. J. B. Ager of Hyattsville, Md., writes: "17 is a day with us. We were married Nov. 17, 1853; had three children born the 17th of different months; held our golden wedding Nov. 17, 1903, in the city of Rochester; and now what a sad change—the good father, husband and citizen passed to spirit life, Dec. 6, 1906."

H. B. Campbell writes: "Having enjoyed an acquaintance with you for many years of your arduous progressive thought, it seems good I should report to you and at least acknowledge an appreciation of your untiring and unflinching effort to benefit humanity."

Mr. Charles Barnes, the well known trumpet medium has an engagement at Canton, Ohio.

Miss Elizabeth Harlow writes: "I am now located again with my old society at Columbus, Ohio, after a two months' trip to Baltimore. The society here has been served by Mrs. Murtha, the test medium, during my absence, and we can easily judge of the success when I tell you the hall is crowded at each service, and the society has decided to keep her another month, interest is running so high, so this month we have a double team. Mrs. Murtha is certainly one of the BEST on the rostrum to-day. Our society is growing in every way. I would like to fill the time from August 21 to 30, with a camp somewhere in the middle west. Any society wishing my services can address me at 345 E. Long street, Columbus, Ohio, where I am now located for the rest of the season; also will attend funerals."

W. J. Ward writes from Clinton, Iowa: "Our society at Clinton, Iowa, continues to make slow but steady headway; sometimes of necessity tacking to suit the caprices of the winds, but still onward. We take some pardonable pride in the effectiveness of the musical feature of our services. We aim to preach an eloquent and soothing sermon with it. Mrs. Alice C. Barry, with her heart to heart talks is surely sowing seed which will bear good fruit in due season. But we all realize that we are doing pioneer work and are satisfied therefore to blaze the way for those to come."

Recording Secretary, Mrs. Thompson, writes: "The Fraternal Daughters of the F. O. O. S. Society held their first tea-party at Atlas Hall, corner of Ogden avenue and Robey streets, Wednesday afternoon and evening, Jan. 30. Between the hours of five and seven a genuine feast was spread, consisting of cold meats, Boston baked beans, various kinds of cakes, coffee, etc., all for the small sum of fifteen cents. Knowing the charming and estimable ladies managing the affair, it would be superfluous to say that the supper room was crowded to its fullest capacity. It is worthy of mention that the ladies by their efforts paid all expenses, leaving a snug sum as a nest-egg for their monthly offering to the F. O. O. S. Society. In the evening a most enjoyable entertainment was given, consisting of instrumental and vocal solos, and short talks by several brothers and sisters. The Fraternal Daughters held their first meeting for organization and ejection of officers, the preceding week at the home of Mrs. Alex Caird, 598 W. Monroe street, at which time matters of importance were freely discussed by those present. The following ladies were unanimously chosen as officers: President, Mrs. Alice Sexsmith; vice-president, Mrs. Alex Caird; financial secretary, Mrs. Jennie Adams; recording secretary, Mrs. Thompson; treasurer, Mrs. H. D. Blount; trustees, Mrs. Travis and Mrs. Schelain. The society will meet the first and third Wednesday of each month, giving a tea-party, supper and evening entertainment. A cordial invitation is extended to all those desiring to attend. Admission ten cents, and supper fifteen cents. A society having such phenomenal success with but one week of organization, shows the earnest endeavors and untiring efforts of its members, and should have the support of all liberal-minded people, inasmuch as it stands for a promotion of the faith and not for personal gain. Join the ladies at their next tea-party, and thus lend your aid to our beautiful truth."

H. J. Cameron writes: "Pleasure Lovers, Attention! The Golden Rule Pleasure Club having formed an organization and secured a charter, sends you greeting, and wishes to extend to you a cordial invitation to their series of receptions and dances to be held at O'Donnell's College Hall, 43 South Paulina, street, between Washington and Park avenue, Saturday evenings, February 9 and 23, and March 9 and 30. Social dance, combined with lunch served on the last Saturday evening of each month. Young people's social and song service every Sunday evening from 5 to 8 o'clock. Membership solicited. No dues and fees. Send name and address to the secretary, H. J. Cameron, 54 No. Ashland avenue. Watch out for the second grand masquerade ball to be given by this club at the Star Lodge Hall, 378 So. Western avenue, Saturday evening, March 16, 1907. Music by Kirkland."

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

Sarah Waterland writes from Detroit, Mich., of the First Church of the Soul: "Sunday evening, Feb. 3, the meeting welcomed the hour that enabled us to show our love and appreciation of our beloved pastor, Mrs. Crawford, who has worked earnestly and faithfully for Spiritualism and our good in the past year, and it was in consideration of her kindness toward us and our love for and appreciation of her, that our assistant pastor, Mrs. Minnie Sharlow, in behalf of the society, presented her a beautiful bouquet of flowers and fifteen gold dollars as a slight token of regard. The whole affair was kept a secret, and was quite a surprise to Mrs. Crawford who responded in her usual happy manner."

Wm. John Ward writes from Clinton, Iowa: "Like The Progressive Thinker, Clinton is booming. Is it good, after much weary toil, to at last see the fruits of your labor? The people of Clinton are very conservative; but at last we are attracting the intelligence of the city. We have even captured a Theosophist! Think of that! And he says that, granting the same liberalism of thought, there is not much essential difference between Theosophy and Spiritualism. Well, wonders will never cease! Last Sunday Mrs. Alice C. Barry gave us much good food for thought in a fine lecture on 'Spiritualism and the Bible.' The lecture was not only replete with beautiful sentiment, but would have tickled the mental palate of even such a logician as Prof. W. F. Peck in its logic. Labor and patience brings its reward in due time, my comrades."

E. H. Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Daughters held their regular fortnightly tea party and entertainment in Atlas Hall, 406 Ogden avenue, Wednesday, Feb. 6, 1907, and are pleased to state, that it was both a financial and social success. The evening meeting at 8 o'clock was presided over by our president, Mrs. A. Sexsmith, and the following persons took part: A short talk by Mr. Wevi, a vocal solo by Mr. Warner, a violin solo by Mr. Nelondslon, a piano solo by Miss Fannie B. Thompson, and a vocal solo by Mrs. E. H. Thompson; Mrs Lichtig gave a recitation; Mrs. Irene Smith, a piano solo and Miss Gladys Green, 5 years old, a piano solo, after which Mrs. Dr. Caird and Chas. A Thompson gave some psychometric readings. Then our meeting came to a close, and each one present seemed as the disciples of old, that that they could say, 'That it is good for us to have been there.' Our next tea party will be, Wednesday, Feb. 20, at 2:30 p. m."

W. J. E. writes: "Sunday evening, February 17, Chicago Spiritualists will have an opportunity of hearing one of the best speakers in this city, in the person of Dr. James R. Price. He is connected with the university of this city. In early days he was known as a medicine man of the Ute Indians. He has been secured by the Alliance Society, 3514 Vincennes avenue, in Vincennes Hall, for this date only. Mrs. May Elmo gives tests and messages every Sunday at 3 and 8 p. m."

Correspondent writes from Meadville, Pa.: "Georgia Gladys Cooley is filling her third engagement with the Meadville Society. She is a great favorite in this part of the country and a single announcement of her coming is sufficient to pack the church. Her usual success has attended her on this visit and she has been prevailed upon to remain over for several extra meetings as the people requested more of her grand work. She serves the society of Lima, Ohio, Sunday, Feb. 17, then goes to Chicago as one of the workers at the convention of the Illinois State Convention, which convenes there, Feb. 19, 20 and 21."

Mrs. C. L. Purrington writes from Plymouth, Mass.: "It has been a long time since a report of the Plymouth society has been made generally public; but we have been working for the cause of Spiritualism all the same. Ten years since we began meetings in Spiritualists' Hall, court street, owned by the First Spiritualists Sewing Circle, and as we look over our list of speakers that have served us, we find several have passed on to a higher life. The meetings have been carried on under the auspices of the Ladies' Sewing Circle. We have services every two weeks. January 10, the annual business meeting was held at the Plymouth Rock House, with Mrs. Snell, and the officers chosen for the coming year: Miss Sarah A. Bartlett, president; Mrs. Sarah R. Collins, vice-president; Mrs. Hannah E .Snell, secretary and treasurer. Mrs. Nancy J. Thompson and Mrs. Hattie M. Bartlett, committee on work. The Sewing Circle meets every Thursday afternoon from two to four. The speakers engaged for February are Mrs. M. A. Bonney, of 780 Shawmut avenue, Boston, and Mrs. Abbie J. Atwood, of Lynn, Mass.; for March, Mrs. M. A. Bonney and Mrs. Martha A. Whitehead of Methuen."

Louise Grant writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "I feel that the time has come when we should crowd our literature as much as possible before the public. Unless we take a firm stand and be valiant soldiers, the enemy will conquer. If we band together and do our duty, God's angels will help us, and although the battle may rage hard, and we who live in the city of Los Angeles especially may have to suffer much, right will eventually triumph. I think if societies would take a number of Spiritual newspapers, and distribute them free of charge to the audience, and each one, after reading, give the paper to some family who does not go to our meetings, the seed sown in this way would not all fall among thorns. Let us use every means of spreading this beautiful truth."

W. M. Chresho writes: "I have taken The Progressive Thinker for two years and have found in it a fund of, to me, very useful and valuable knowledge."

M. Lizzie Beals writes from the Worcester Association of Spiritualists, Mass., G. A. R. Hall, 35 Pearl street: "Mrs. Katie M. Ham of Haverhill, was engaged to serve our society for the month of January. She occupied our platform, January 6, but owing to severe illness was obliged to cancel the remainder of her engagement. Her many friends in Worcester regret the loss of her services at this time, and hope for her speedy recovery. Mr. Wellman C. Whitney of Springfield, was secured to fill the open dates and served the society very acceptably as on all former occasions."

Mrs. Martha Woolsey writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "The Indiana State Association still continues its meetings with renewed interest. Sunday, Jan. 27, Mr. Will J. Erwood was with us, and his name drew a big house and his lecture was much appreciated, and his messages were fine. We were sorry not to be able to keep him longer. Last Sunday Mrs. Allie Buhland spoke and Mrs. Frances Ruddick gave slate-writing. Lecture and messages were fine. Wednesday, Jan. 30, we had a social at Mrs. M. C. Jacobs' and raised a nice sum through the kindness of Mrs. Ruddick giving slate writing to those present, and at the close she gave a trumpet seance. The house was crowded, and all went away feeling it was good for them that they were there. We are looking forward to the dawning of spring time when we feel that more interest will be felt. On this Thursday evening I will hold a public circle for the benefit of the State Association, and will have slate-writing and trumpet manifestations. This work to me is so beautiful, I never feel I have done half enough."

Mrs. Sarah Crossfield has an engagement for February at Grand Rapids, Mich. Letters will reach her there if addressed in care of General Delivery.

Lillian E. Whitney writes: "At the First Spiritualist Ladies Aid Society of Springfield, Mass., Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, of Troy, N. Y., was our speaker and medium, Jan. 6, 13 and 20. Her work grows better each year. There were large audiences at each meeting. January 27, Mrs Holt Harding, on account of illness canceled her engagement, but we were fortunate in securing Mrs. Helen P. Russegue for that date. Her lectures were listened to with great interest, for they were uplifting and instructive."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "We all remember the intensely cold weather of Sunday, Feb. 3, still it was not sufficient to prevent about 200 of our friends from attending the services of the First Society of the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists in Hygeia Hall on that day. Many friends from the North, South and West sides and suburbs are brought together who have not seen each other for years. The pleasant surprise is mutual, and as they great each other with smiling faces one feels some satisfaction in having been instrumental in making possible such an opportunity. But we do more than this—we provide the means every Sunday for you to visit with your loved ones who have passed away, and we do feel a pardonable pride in making this possible, by being a member. What joy one experiences to see the happy, smiling faces as they recognize the names of the loved ones they do not see. It is pleasant to note the growing popularity of our culinary artist. The victuals do go. At 5 o'clock we serve for 15 cents, the best meal obtainable in the city. Don't take my word for it—come up and see. Our concert at 7 was made more enjoyable by select recitations given by Sister Lichtig and Mr. Guy E. Moore, and Master Clarence Clark also came in for his share of applause as an entertainer. As stated before, each month a public announcement by the auditing committee will be made from the rostrum so that each member will know just what we are doing, and on Sunday it was gratifying to learn of our progress since organization on Sunday, Jan. 13. Our books show a steady increase in membership, and our treasury is also receiving its share of attention. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond occupied the rostrum in the evening. Her topic was prompted by questions asked by the congregation, which dealt on the occupation of those departed. It is needless to say all were satisfied with the explanations offered. We will again have the privilege of listening to Mrs. Richmond on Sunday, Feb. 17. Tell your friends and avail yourselves of this opportunity. Services every Sunday at 2:30; circles at 4; supper at 5; song service at 6:30; concert at 7; evening service at 8 o'clock. The best talent in the city. The Fraternal Daughters will hold their regular tea party on Wednesday, the 20th, at 2, in the same building, second floor; supper at 6:30 and social at 8. Come up and get acquainted with the Daughters. Keep in touch with the progress of Spiritualism by subscribing to The Progressive Thinker, $1 per year. We will take care of your subscription at the door. Copies also on sale each Sunday."

J. H. Thomas of Minnesota, expresses his appreciation of The Progressive Thinker, and will take it as long as he can find a dollar. He patronized all the old Spiritualist papers in their day.

M. C. Holmes of Concord, N. H., writes: "The book, The Unknown Life of Jesus Christ, received. I am very much pleased with it, and think it is valuable addition to my library, and thank you very much for same."

Mrs. Hannah S. Luce writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "I have watched with great interest the success of Spiritualism, and I see the time drawing nigh when its brightness will not only be realized more fully but from the shores of the beyond will be sent more and still more to gladden the hearts of mortals here. A new era is arising for the many who have waited and watched. The bright star, 'Spirit Return,' is now in the ascendancy, and although at times a cloud might flit across its disc, its brightness will not be entirely obscured, but still higher shall its rays penetrate until every nation shall feel its genial influence."

Mr. Merkel writes: "The Spiritualistic church of the Students of Nature had an elaborate service Sunday evening at 461 W. North avenue. The hall was gorgeously decorated with flowers and festoons. Mrs. M. Schumacher, the pastor, officiated at a Spiritualistic baptism upon the child of Mr. and Mrs. Grimes, giving it the earthly name of Zuline Moreau Grimes. While sprinkling the child with flowers it was given the spiritual name of Hyacinth; the definition means constancy and benevolence. The pastor then taking the child in her arms, offered it to the true spiritual principle of Spiritualism; then placing the child in the mother's arms for safe-keeping. Rev. Esser kindly volunteered his services and delivered a beautiful lecture for the occasion. The pastor then gave spirit messages, which brought sunshine and greeting to all."

Samuel A. Huntington, Malden, Mass., writes of the Progressive Spiritual Society, Louise Hall, 138 Pleasant street: "Sunday services, Feb. 3. At the afternoon, 3 o'clock circle, Mr. Dixon, a former member, and Mrs. Morton made short addresses, and Mrs. Carter and Mrs. Morton were the message bearers. The evening meeting at 7:30, opened with praise, reading of scripture and invocation. Prof. Graham of Boston was the speaker and message bearer. He prefaced his work by reading a beautiful poem, entitled, 'The Bird With the Broken Pinion,' then chose for his theme, 'Love, Friendship and Truth,' giving a very interesting address, after which he devoted nearly an hour to giving many fine messages, reading from articles. The hall was full and the meetings are growing in interest. Mrs. Annie R. Chapman of Brighton, Mass., will be the speaker, Sunday evening, Feb. 10, instead of Dr. Willis who was engaged for that date by mistake. Mrs. Cassie H. Tainter of Manchester, N. H., will be the speaker on Sunday evening, Feb. 17, and Rev. F. A. Wiggin on Thursday evening, Feb. 21."

The Brotherhood of Spiritual Truth meets Sunday at 2:30 and 8 p. m., in Temperance Hall, 330 West Sixty-third street. Services conducted by Prof. J. K. Hilles and wife.

Mr. John W. Ring of Crystola, Colo., visited The Progressive Thinker home as he passed through the city to attend the mass-meeting at Milwaukee, February 12. Mr. Ring lectures in Muncie, Ind., the following Sunday in St. Joseph, Mo. After a short stay at Crystola, Mr. Ring will begin an engagement in California, beginning at Los Angeles, March 3; also visiting San Diego, San José and other points.

Mrs. S. Dropmund writes from Kansas City, Mo.: "Mrs. Glen C. Stephens, is the speaker and message bearer for the Kansas City Psychical Research Society which holds its regular meetings in her parlor at 3108 East 14th street. She is a worker for humanity. She and her society are now endeavoring to find a suitable location for a Temple in this city."

H. J. Cameron writes: "On Sunday, Feb. 3, the Golden Rule Spiritualist Society held its usual interesting meeting both afternoon and evening. The afternoon was devoted to short talks and messages as is the usual custom. In the evening, the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, gave an address, the subject being 'Life,' a most appropriate one, it being the anniversary of the passing to spirit life of her son. The message bearers of the evening were the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, Brother J. C. Burgess and Mrs. Schmidt, all of whose tests were recognized. A growing interest is being manifested which gives pleasure to the management. The speaker for Sunday evening, Feb. 17, will be Mr. B. C. Peterson of the Order of the Magi, at O'Donnell's College Hall, So. Paulina street, between Washington Boulevard and Park avenue."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "On Sunday afternoon, Feb. 12, 1907, at 2:30 will occur the first public installation of officers in a Spiritualist society, when the officers of the First Society of the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, Dr. Alex Caird, president, will be installed in Hygeia Hall, corner Ogden avenue and Robey street. The public is cordially invited to witness this most impressive ceremony."

Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss, state missionary for Ohio, writes: "Spiritualism in Elyria, Ohio, continues to be taught under the auspices of the Progressive Spiritualist Society there, which is presided over by that loyal friend of the cause, F. W. Martin. Jan. 20 and 27 it was my privilege to address this society, as well as at two week-night meetings. Their programme is filled for the season with the names of efficient workers, and the seeds of truth are sown broadcast, and there is always some that falls on fruitful ground. May they continue in the good work."

Mary B. Hill writes: "The Band of Harmony will hold a progressive euchre party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, 478 Fullerton avenue, Feb. 14, 1907, afternoon session to begin at 2 o'clock; evening session at 8 o'clock sharp. Those wishing to attend both sessions will bring their supper. Score cards, 25 cents. Four prizes for afternoon, and four for evening. Be punctual. A large company is anticipated. Invite your friends. Northwestern Elevated, Robey, Halsted and Western avnue cars to Fullerton avenue, near the university."

Lyman C. Howe is engaged to lecture at the Budd Lake Camp, July 20 to August 4, and at Lily Dale Anniversary Meeting, March 31. He writes that he was shocked to hear of the sudden death of Moses Hull and Jennie Hagan Brown.

Mamie Young writes: "Divine Spiritual Church, Hygeia Hall, corner Ogden avenue and Robey street, is still having successful meetings both afternoon and evening. The pastor, Rev. Lucy A. Hodge Koontz, both by lectures and tests, is imparting the spiritual truth and teaching the brotherhood of man and sisterhood of woman. All are invited to hear this teacher of Spiritualism in its true sense."

Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie fills an engagement at Battle Creek, Mich., for March and April.

Mrs. Jennie French writes from Spokane, Wash.: "We deeply regret the passing out of Brother Moses Hull, as he was a great light to Spiritualism. He spent a while with us to our great benefit. Spokane Spiritualists had a great spiritual feast the first week in January, when President Barrett, Mrs. Cobb, and Mrs. Jennings spent three days with us. Many were made to see greater beauties in our philosophy and not a few were convinced of the fact of spirit return and of the beautiful truth that 'We live again.' On the last day of our meeting Mrs. Elizabeth Woodruff passed to spirit life, leaving behind her husband and a daughter, Miss Hazel, but rejoiced to go to the meeting of her other dear ones gone before. She, to her own knowledge, was welcomed home by father, mother, brother and sister. It was a beautiful passing out, and no tear need be shed except for those left behind. The funeral was conducted by the writer, and the floral decorations were the most beautiful ever seen in Spokane. The irregularity of the trains keeps The Progressive Thinker behind until after Sunday and we miss it very much. The Spiritual Science Society holds its regular meetings every Sunday night at the hall, and every Wednesday its soul communion meetings at the home of the writer."

Carrie L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The regular meeting of the First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society was held as usual, with the president, Mrs. Mattie E. A. Allbe, in the chair. Supper was served at 6:15 p. m.; a social hour and 'snip sale' was enjoyed after the same. In the evening the following talent took part: Mrs. Kate R. Stiles, who paid a loving tribute to the work of our late arison brother, Moses Hull and sister, Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown; Mrs. Morgan gave messages, and contributed a song; Mr. Graham spoke and gave messages; Mrs. K. R. Stiles gave communications which were all recognized, as were all communications given during the evening. Mrs. Alice S. Waterhouse opened the meeting with remarks. The people here in Massachusetts are confronted once more with a strict and severe medical petition, the hearing to come before the Public Health Committee, on Thursday, Feb. 14, at 10:30 a. m., at Room 444. All are requested to be present at the same as numbers count. Next Friday at the Ladies' Aid we will have a valentine supper. Come and receive a souvenir."

Mrs. May A. Price is for the present lecturing for the Temple League of Washington, D. C. A well filled house gives inspiration to the speaker and each lecture is followed by tests and messages from the spirit side of life, which are recognized by all to whom they are given. Mrs. Price is open to other engagements and for camp work for the summer. Address 1718 Fourteenth street, N. W.

IT IS APPRECIATED.

The Progressive Thinker Leads in Every State in the Union.

Mr. Paul McArthur, president of the Missouri State Spiritualist Association, writes:

"I wish to publicly express my thanks to J. R. Francis, the editor of The Progressive Thinker, for the many favors he has so freely extended both to the state association and myself. Every article and notice sent him by your president for publication has been cheerfully inserted, in spite of the fact that space in his popular paper is at a premium. I most earnestly recommend that a vote of thanks be tendered him, also that every Spiritualist in Missouri show their appreciation of his sturdy stand for honest mediumship and pure Spiritualism by becoming a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker."

DO IT NOW.

Perhaps you have a message, full of cheery words and hope,
To help some luckless brother who is struggling up the slope.
The way is strewn with boulders and the night comes on apace—
The dark, dark night, Eternity—the last long resting-place,
Go, breathe the message! Drive the pain from someone's aching brow,
Wait not for a fitter time, but breathe the message now.
Sob it not o'er a sombre bier
Into a cold and listless ear.

Perhaps you are a singer who has built a tender song
To thrill some fellow-mortal with its accents sweet and strong.
The way is long and dreary, and the music spells are few,
Someone is waiting even now to hear that song from you.
Go, sing the song! Raise up some head that sorrow seeks to bow,
And wait not till the lines grow cold, but sing it—sing it now!
Sob it not o'er a sombre bier
Into a cold and listless ear.

Conductors and Secretaries of Lyceums

Please send me a list of your members, and the name of your lyceum. For some time I have been waiting anxiously for a list of all our lyceums. It is most important that we should have an authentic list of your lyceum, its membership, and address of its officers. Will you not give me this assistance?

The Banner Contest list will remain open through the month of January, so any school that has not reported, send in report at once; but even though you may not desire to enter the competition for a prize, please send report of your membership. The lyceums that have reported are as follows: Los Angeles, Cal.; Parkland, Pa.; Chesaning, Mich.; Pittsburg, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Decatur, Portland, Galveston, and a partial report from three others. We trust by the close of this month to have a full list of every working lyceum in the United States.

Yours for the children,
ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

"The Religion of Cheerfulness." By Sara A. Hubbard. An excellent book for the culture of health and spirituality. None can read it without pleasure and profit. Price 50c.

"The Infidelity of Ecclesiasticism. A Menace to American Civilization," By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, lecturer upon physical, physiological and psychic science. Demonstrator of the Molecular or Spiritual Hypothesis of Nature. Scholarly, masterly, trenchant. Price, 25 cents.

The World Has Never Seen the Like!

At Great Expense we have secured the copyright of Mr. Ghandi's translation of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." It is to be sent forth as a gift to our subscribers, as set forth in the following:

It is an absolute fact. We are enabling our subscribers to form a valuable library at a nominal cost. One of them writes:

"I have your THIRTEEN premium books, which if I had bought in the open market at the usual price would have cost me at least $15. Sending each year for one copy at the cost of 25 cents, the whole thirteen volumes have cost me exactly $3.25. As you paid the postage thereon, which amounts to not less than $1.40, all you receive for the Thirteen copies I have, is exactly $1.85, causing you to lose in the aggregate each year a large amount of money in order to benefit your subscribers."

The above is an accurate estimate. All we have received for the thirteen premium books when they have been ordered one at a time for thirteen consecutive years, is approximately $1.85 a little more than the price of a single book.

We now offer as a GIFT OUT RIGHT, one of the most valuable books of the present age—THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. In order to obtain this book, you must send TEN CENTS in stamps to pay the postage thereon, and ONE DOLLAR for The Progressive Thinker one year. Your library is not complete without this remarkable book. Every Spiritualist should have it for study and reference. Every orthodox Christian should read it, and thus learn the whole truth in regard to Jesus. Remember it is a GIFT to you on the TERMS MENTIONED above. We expect to distribute at least Twenty Thousand copies as GIFTS.

Have You Read OUR PREMIUM BOOK OFFER?

Truly, the world has NEVER SEEN the like before. Search the annals of history, ANCIENT AND MODERN; critically examine the history of Spiritualism; look here and there, in every nook and corner of the world, and you CANNOT find a parallel to the offer made in reference to these THIRTEEN remarkable PREMIUM BOOKS. They constitute a wonderfully valuable Spiritualistic and Occult LIBRARY, and are furnished at a nominal sum. All are substantially bound and neatly printed, and those who purchase them are DELIGHTED WITH THEM.

We have now THIRTEEN magnificent PREMIUM BOOKS which you can select from.

GEMS OF THOUGHT, by SEVENTEEN leading authors, is our last Premium Book.

Any one of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 25 cents. This is the price, remember, when you order only one book in connection with a yearly subscription. The paper, one year, and one Premium Book, $1.25. But if you order more than one Premium Book the price is as follows:

Any two of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 70 cents.
Any three of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.
Any four of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.
Any five of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.75.
Any six of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.05.
Any seven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.
Any eight of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.65.
Any nine of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.
Any ten of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.10.
Any eleven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.40.
Any twelve of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.85.

Lastly, all of these THIRTEEN Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for 4.15, something never before equalled in this country or Europe.

Bear in mind that every order for a Premium Book must be accompanied with a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker, which is $1. We repeat that the world has never seen the like of it before.

OUR THIRTEEN REMARKABLE PREMIUM BOOKS FOR $4.15.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be rushed, and the style becomes therefore assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often grow weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Mr. Cormick: Q. Is it possible for a spirit to fulfill a compact entered into before death, to return and make its presence known by a given sign or communication?

A. In discussing this subject in connection with the "Myers test," which by the bungling method taken was a failure, made such by the editors who know nothing of the laws and conditions governing such manifestations, we pointed out the difficulties in the way of success. In many cases it has been successful, and as an answer to this correspondent in the same mail, came a letter from Mr. E. A. Palmer, Philadelphia, from which I take the following passage:

"A short time before Mrs. Palmer passed to a higher life we agreed upon a signal we were to give each other, whoever went first, to prove our identity. My wife passed on August 14, 1902, and not until June 5, 1906, did I obtain the signal, rapped by a small table. No one but myself in the mortal form knew what that signal was. The medium was a stranger."

Almost four years had gone by, and Mr. Palmer had constantly sought for this evidence. This incident shows the possibility of such communications, and also the difficulties attending. There can be no doubt of the anxiety of the spirit wife to make her presence known by the prescribed test, and that she availed herself of the first opportunity presented.

If such tests are desired, the simple longing for them will not bring success. The means on our side should be furnished as far as our yet imperfect knowledge will permit. We could not leave the matter to chance throw the responsibility on our spirit friends. Nor should we draw hasty conclusions. If the "tests" have not been received it is because it has been impossible to give them.

D. S. Foster: Q. Is it a well-proven fact that persons who have passed to spirit life can look back and see the material bodies of their friends in earth life, and are cognizant of their actions, or can they see only their souls or spirits?

2. Is there a distinctive difference between soul and spirit, and if so, please define it?

A. (1) It seems to be the universal testimony of spirits in their communications, that they are as fully cognizant of things in this earthly life, as before they left it. Whether they recognize physical matter, as we do by our senses or the spiritual substance which they contain by their spiritual perception, there is a difference of opinion. The result would be the same in either case.

(2) Soul is indiscriminately used to mean the body or the spirit, and is undesirable because confusing. It was introduced to carry out the idea of the trinity in man, whereas man is dual, a spirit, and a physical body. When we say "the human soul," it is exactly as though we said "the human spirit." Again the word is used to mean both, or a human being.

"Albus": Q. In spiritual literature and on the rostrum we often hear the phrase, "infringing the laws of nature," as when we put the finger in a flame. Is this correct?

A. It is incorrect and misleading to say that we infrings or break a natural law. If we place our finger in a flame and are burned, we subject ourselves to the influence of another law, that of heat. If we are sick, it is because we have knowingly or unknowingly become subject to the laws of disease. For the time the laws of disease have the mastery, but those of health may again gain control. If we fall from a house-top we break no law, but remain subject to the same gravitation, which holds us to the earth. The confusion of thought arises in the use of the term "law," and retaining the meaning that it has in governmental affairs, whereas it is so distinct it should have another name. A law of nature is simply the course a cause runs to its effect. There is no power in the law more than in the rails on which the locomotive runs. But back of every law of nature, to the least, the energy of the universe impels the cause to its certain effect.

"Theosoph": Q. Do you not err in making Theosophy a part, and so small a part of Spiritualism?

A. There is a great deal of Theosophy which is not Spiritualism, and its phraseology and confusing terms make the difference more pronounced than it really is.

Thus when the question "What is meant by the astral body?" was presented, after the most careful examination of authorities I was not as positive that I had the true and approved definition, as I desired to be. Now the lecture of Henry Hotchner, a noted Theosophist of New York, given before the Theosophical Society of Cleveland, Ohio, makes the subject clear. The "astral body" is identical with that known to Spiritualism as the spiritual body, and the "astral plane" is the spirit world. After carefully reading the reputed passage, I begin to think the implication in this correspondent's question is correct. I did err in making Theosophy so small a part, for according to this lecturer, in the fundamental principles they are identical.

"The theosophical explanation of the life after death is the result of careful investigation into the subject by students in the society. It conforms to enlightened reason and common sense, and can be verified by anyone willing to go to the necessary trouble to do so.

"We find that man is an immortal soul, and that death is not the end of his existence, but merely the laying aside of his physical body because it has served its purpose of providing knowledge and experience for the soul's growth. After death he is the same in passions, thoughts and aspirations. He is in a finer body, called the astral body, which is composed of matter so subtle and tenuous that it cannot be seen by physical eyes, though it can be clearly seen by higher vision. His condition after death depends upon the life he has lived, for the law of cause and effect works on the astral as on the physical plane. The man who has lived a moral and unselfish life on earth will have a happy and helpful existence on the astral plane."

Yet we make a reservation: What would have been the doctrines of this new theosophy if Spiritualism had not clearly stated and demonstrated these great principles, unrecognized before its advent?

I say "new theosophy," for the theosophy as taught to-day is not the theosophy of India, or that of the ancient school from which it derives its name.

And after comparing this authoritative presentation of theosophy with Spiritualism, broad and deep as are the lines of similarity, the latter overleaps and sweeps into an infinite beyond.

Theosophy is as large as the breath of Spiritualism blown into it. The same may be said truthfully of occultism and Christian science. Take away this breath—well, I am reminded of a small boy at a fair. He went prancing proudly by the side of his mother, with a wondrous, crimson, shining, bobbing globe, held by a string over his head. It glittered in the sun, and pulled to go up to the clouds. As he hurried along the sphere ruptured, the string fell, having at its end the whole of that balloon, but now a little brown, puckered bunch of rubber. Of course the boy wildly cried that his balloon had broken away. Well about everything that had made it rise and attract attention had gone out of it. And so you take Spiritualism out of these "cults," have you left much more than the string held of the boy's balloon?

Investigator: The phenomena described by Sir William Crookes in his experimental research, have never been invalidated by being shown to have been fraudulent, nor Florence Cook, the medium, exposed as a trickster.

The celebrated Eusapia Paladina, by the many years she has given the most select and careful experimenters opportunity to test her wonderful phase of mediumship ought to be beyond the attack of venomous criticism. An exposure was reported, but the tests she afterwards continually gave were sufficient answer.

LIGHT AND TRUTH.

And thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim.—Exodus xxvii. 30.

The question old, few answer it,
Or even give it passing heed:
Man lives and will not understand,
Content to let false prophets lead.

We build upon the muck and mire
Frail creeds that answer for to-day,
To-morrow we will build again,
Not thinking all will pass away.

Not knowing that a Master might Possess all things we hold most dear,
If He desired, but naught to Him
Are all the baubles of this sphere.

There rests within the close confine
Of darkened minds a hope to know
The answer, but with vain desire
To make of knowledge worldly show.

Yet still we seem to understand
That time and space have no control
O'er that which we have pleased to term
The everlasting, deathless soul.

This light e'er shines for those who seek;
Man in the All, above, below,
And that to see the face of Truth,
He has but only self to know.

None may present you with the pearl—
By bitter trial all good is bought—
The pearl by Christ and Buddha found,
The pearl by countless masters sought.

You shrink and shudder at the price,
And slowly break the ties that bind,
The while you mourn the prison foul,
The law decrees be left behind.

What magic yokels hope to see,
With gaping wonder wild at play,
When some bold tricksters, cowled and smug
Herds superstition down the way.

A sign! A sign! The same old cry,
Gods made of clay and seeming real;
That which a child may taste or smell,
Or see or hear or feel.

A something that will bring sweet rest
To all desire that thrills the blood;
A something that will cost no pain,
Yet make a godlet out of mud.

Ethereal truth awaits the day
When some unshackled, hallowed race,
With eager hands will rend apart
The sable veil that hides her face.

possibility here open to man. By the same principle of telepathy we come to a universal language, deeper than words, sculpture, painting, or music."

Mr. Fritch points out that Prof. Josiah Royce, of Harvard University, shows that the ether itself is but an expression of a deeper, timeless, spaceless essence which, for want of a better name, we call spirit, and of this all-pervading spirit all finite spirits are expressions. In those profound lectures delivered by Prof. Royce before the University of Aberdeen, published later in two volumes entitled The World and the Individual, Prof. Royce expounds this theory. It provides the explanation for all the phenomena of clairvoyance, clairaudience, prevision, and telepathy.

The City of Light Assembly, at Lily Dale, New York, near Niagara Falls, held its twenty-seventh annual meeting this year, extending over fifty-two days, with over 500 lectures, and nearly as many conferences, lyceums and seances, with numerous concerts and entertainments beside. The assembly at Lily Dale is on a broad and inclusive scale, and includes Religion and Science, Philosophy, and Psychic and Occult Research, metaphysical discussion, intellectual culture in choice literature and thought; music and social entertainments. Opening on July 15th, the assembly continued through the early September days. Formerly known as the "Cassadaga Lake Free Association Camp-meeting," the name has been changed to more adequately designate an ideal young city of cottages, hotels, assembly halls and amphitheatre, with parks, the Leolyn woods, a boat-house, post-office, library, music pavilion, and other attractions, altogether covering over eighty acres of ground.

This City of Light Assembly stands absolutely unique and unparalleled in the line of summer convocations. The officers of the Lily Dale Assembly are: President, Mrs. Geo. L. Humphrey; vice-president, Mr. H. W. Richardson; secretary, Laura G. Fixen, and treasurer, Dr. Geo. B. Warne. Out of 182 cottages only fourteen were unlet, while the hotels and private lodgings were embarrassingly full. Mrs. Laura G. Fixen, the general manager, is a woman of extraordinary power in organizing and harmonizing; and the president of this assembly, Mrs. Pettengill, gave a series of platform tests of the presence of unusual forces; J. Clegg Wright held his "psychic classes" and the nineteen public halls of Lily Dale were constantly filled with successive audiences. The range of discussion is indicated by these problems attacked by Mr. Clegg Wright:

"The Evolution of Living Forms—The Foundation and Evolution of Morals—The Evolution of Body and Mind—The Evolution of Human Consciousness—A Study of Consciousness as Manifested in Man—Spiritual Consciousness—The Return of Spirits—Mediumship—Mediumship Considered as the Foundation of Modern Spiritualism—The Failure of Philosophy and Religion to Prove Another Life Beyond the Grave—The Evolution of Religion.

"The Soul an Eternal Entity—Sub-Consciousness — Sub-Consciousness, Its Plane and Power—The Heredity of Intellect, of Feeling and Passion.

"The Problems of Personality and Embodiments Considered—the Difference Between Soul and Mind Defined.

"The Mind After Death—Can Mind Recall the Past Embodiments of the Soul?

"Where is the Spirit World?

"What Is Christ? Will Christ Come Again?"

Certainly after this exhaustive—if not exhausting—list of the problems of the universe in general had been discussed and solved there would remain little for man to pursue during the remainder of his mortal career. All the sages and philosophers of the world's history might well tremble before all these matters covering the heavens above and the earth beneath and the waters under the earth, which were to be cheerfully disposed of within fifty-two days. Yet, while the scientist and the philosopher might not fail to have their opinions regarding this headlong flight through the Immensities, it is still true that to a general audience, largely untrained in specialties, such a course of lectures is not without almost incalculable stimulus of suggestion. Life is short and science, as well as Art, is long; and while a Darwin may feel that he could devote his entire lifetime to the study of earth-worms and then leave his work far from complete, the most of us are the better for a wider, even if a superficial, sweep over a more comprehensive area.

Prof. Lockwood's task was hardly less the task of Sisyphus, when he entered on the following lectures:

"The Basis of All Organization and Being Inheres in Nature and Cosmic Evolution.

"No System of Philosophy or Belief Is True That Does Not Recognize the Processes of Natural Development.

"The Old Ideals of the Duality of Matter and Spirit Refuted by Modern Discoveries.

"Spirit and Spiritual Forces the Basis of All Organization and Form in Cosmic Process.

"Nature Evolves Formative or Shaping Principles, the Soul of Things; The Form the Phenomenon of this Soul Principle.

"All Nature Related by Principles of Electro-Magnetism, as Is Witnessed in the Development of Its Various Forms.

"The Relation of Consciousness to Consciousness or of Soul to Soul are Natural Relations.

"The Brain the Receiving Station of Conscious Intellect, Its Variation in Organization. The Relation of Mind to Conscious Processes. All Forms of Life Are Symbols of an Invisible Actuating Energy Which We call the Soul of Things.

"The Subtlety of the Human Intellect, and Its Capacity to Be Impressed With Its Two Thousand Nerve Cells and Fibres.

"The Science of Psychology the Savior of the World.

"All Processes in Nature, Psychic and Invisible, This truth the Basis of the Spiritual Philosophy.

"Scientific Proofs of Conscious Life Beyond the Grave Established Upon the Data of the Co-relation of Mental Forces, and the Conservation of Mental Energies."

Aside from these, Prof. Lockwood lectured upon the X-rays and upon the connection between telegraphy and atmospheric spectra—a lecture in which he introduces the scale of the six vacuum tubes of Prof. Crookes. Other lecture courses were by Mrs. Carrie L. Irving; Swami Rama of Lahore, India; Mrs. Lillie; Miss Susie C. Clark, the famous "spiritual healer" and lecturer on that subtle borderland of the forces that unite soul and body; Dr. Charles Brodie Patterson; Mr. Edward C. Randall, who has made a long series of experiments with the psychic, Miss French, of Buffalo; the widely-known Mr. W. J. Colville, and the Rev. F. A. Wiggin.

In addition to this imposing list and the stupendous problems of life, death and immortality to be solved, we also learn that: "The heavenly host has charge of Lily Dale, inspiring every worker and enfolding every visitor in the unseen embrace of resistless heavenly power," and that Lily Dale should stand "a living monument to convince the world that through storms and struggles the passing away of men and their money in spite of schemes and fallibility of human foresight, the spirit world ordains and will know how to protect its own and to the end of time. Lily Dale shall stand the heart and center of Spiritualism, the New Jerusalem for ages and ages to come."

These encouraging assurances are supported by other contributions to thought. Dr. Henry Frank, of New York City, delivered a strong and convincing lecture on "Some Things Spiritualism Has Forced Science to See." Added to these lectures, in courses or singly, are the constant test seances of the mediums at prices from ten cents, "to give an illustration of palmistry," to $7 for a "spirit portrait." The slate writing and trumpet sittings range up to $1 for each. The management disclaims all responsibility for these, throwing the onus entirely upon the sitter and the psychic. These seances do not differ from those usually met. The phenomena of the seance room cannot be regarded, in toto, as being that of entire fraud or entire genuineness. With much of the former suddenly an element of the latter appears, which is evidential in its very nature, and which is not explicable by even the vast possibilities of the laws governing the sub-conscious.

Meanwhile, at Lily Dale, all this extraordinary panorama, summoned from the vasty deep while you wait, so to speak,—the evolutionary creation of living forms; even solving the spiritual mystery of the Christ and the question of His "coming again"; the revelation of "all processes of nature, psychic and invisible"—go on in a scenic setting of almost ethereal loveliness. Four lakes entirely surround the City of Light; of these, three are romantically wild in their coasts of hills and deep valleys, with cascades tumbling down, and groves and masses of wild flowers add their beauty; Niagara Falls is but sixty miles distant; the cottages and hotels are tasteful and attractive in their architectural grouping, and the entire scene is one of the most enchanting beauty.

One of the most remarkable of the mediums whose specialty lies in platform tests, is Mrs. Margaret Gaule, of New York City. For instance, one will find her saying to a certain individual: "A. (who is dead) is standing by you, and she says: 'I entirely approve of the letter you wrote to my husband in reply to his when he spoke to you of his second marriage. He told you he was very lonely, and that he wished to marry C., but that he would not, for worlds, do anything that would even seem to the outside world as any lack of respect' to my memory. You replied to him that you felt assured that I would be glad for him to have the happiness of companionship and sympathy. You were right; I am glad.' . . . This, from an entire stranger on the platform, whom—as it chances—you have never seen before, and the circumstances of which were known to no one save the gentleman in question and yourself between whom these private letters passed.

Another very prominent platform test mediums who adds to this gift that of being also a preacher and a lecturer, is Rev. May S. Pepper of Brooklyn, N. Y., who, like Rev. F. A. Wiggin, of Boston, Rev. Cora L. V. Richmond of Chicago, and Rev. Dr. B. F. Austin of Rochester, N. Y., has her own church, and is at the head of a very large following. Mrs. Pepper's platform tests, in the correct reading of sealed letters and correct replies to the questions therein, in the establishment of personal identity of the dead, and many varieties of these phenomena, have invited wide investigation from scientific men, and they have been such tests as to exclude the explanation by theories of telepathy, subliminal consciousness or secondary personality. There can be no reasonable doubt that Mrs. Pepper possesses supernormal powers. The Rev. Dr. Isaac K. Funk, of the New York publishing house of Funk & Wagnalls—an investigator in psychic phenomena—relates this personal experience with Mrs. Pepper:

"I enclosed a letter to my mother in an envelope, addressed on the outside with an initial and on the inside with the word mother, and had it put on the desk after Mrs. Pepper was in the pulpit. My mother died forty years ago in the West, and it is very unlikely that outside of my family any one in Brooklyn knew her name or what caused her death. There was only one chance in some hundreds that she would happen to seize upon my letter. Picking it up, she immediately spoke my mother's first name, described her by a number of trifling, but none the less important, details of appearance; she said that, curiously, she seemed to walk as if she was using but one foot. This she said was evidently for a test. Mrs. Pepper then inquired if I knew why she walked in this way, and I asked, 'Can't she tell me?' In a moment Mrs. Pepper said that my mother asked if I did not remember 'that needle?' The fact was, when I was a young man, my mother stepped off a chair and ran a needle into her foot. The needle had been sticking in the floor, point downward, so that the eye end of it had punctured her thin slipper and run so far into the foot that in order to remove it I used a pair of pincers. Paralysis of the foot and limb followed and in a week she was dead. The question in my sealed letter was, 'Will mother tell me what caused her death?' Mind reading might explain an incident of this kind, but evidence of the sure possession even of that power is exceedingly interesting.

"The next interesting statement Mrs. Pepper made was that my mother was not alone, that she had by her side a boy child whom she called Chester, and said it was her grandchild. I did not remember any grandchild of the name of Chester, either dead or alive, and I went away from the church that night firmly convinced that this alleged child, Chester was merely one of the unaccountable vagaries which very frequently obtrude themselves into otherwise accurate phenomena. But I was mistaken. Making inquiry among members of my family I learned that my mother did have a grandchild named Chester who had died in infancy about twenty years ago in the West, which accounted for the fact that his identity was not recognized by me."

In Mr. W. J. Colville the camp-meetings have a speaker of the most curiously elusive and, indeed, mutually exclusive characteristics. He is the most curiously alive being, so to speak; a man who can, apparently, see with his muscles, and hear sounds that cannot vibrate on the ordinary ear; a man who perceives, rather than sees, hears, or feels by the usual methods of approach. A speaker who is phenomenally uneven in his power, and who within the limits of a single lecture will exhibit both extremes of an almost supreme interest and of commonplace. Mr. Colville discusses such subjects as "The Scientific Value of Faith and Prayer"; "How Suggestion Affects Our Bodies," and "The Planes of Consciousness."

The evolutionary processes of life are carried forward in many ways. Much of the discovery that has rewarded psychic research has been too largely immured in star chamber council to let its light shine universally. The only conceivable value of the discovery of truth is to make it known to humanity. If an astronomer discovers a new star the fact is telegraphed all over the world, without the stipulation that every reader of a newspaper shall either be an expert scientist, or that the knowledge shall be withheld from him. The new fact is placed before the general public, to be grasped, intelligently, or ignorantly, as may be, but at all events it is freely given to all, and becomes a highly educative factor. Why, then, should psychic research shroud itself in secrecy! Rather, indeed, let every alleged fact be tested by the light of the public square.

The Spiritual camp-meetings are doing a certain work that no other agency can do. With whatever proportion of crudity, of superficial views, even of some fraud and artifice, they are still attracting the attention and stimulating the inquiry of countless thousands of people, while the general pleasure and innocent enjoyment afforded by the summer outing, at the camps, is a factor of incalculable good to a multitude to whom larger opportunities are denied, and these experiences open the way to larger thought; they increase the spiritual receptivity of the common life.

MENTAL THERAPEUTICS.

The World Is Making Progress.

The scientific and analytical minds of this age are having a comprehension and acknowledged recognition of the potency of the human mind as a force affecting and controlling the human organism more and more as they enter in upon the study of the occult forces which are now dominating our life in all departments of human experience and achievement. This statement is confirmed by the fact that the theories and teachings of "Christian Science," so-called, only another name for "hypnotic suggestion," or as our friend, Prof. Sibley so aptly puts it, "mental therapeutics," is being so generally accepted by people everywhere. While they are not prepared to accept the statement that "there is no matter, all is spirit," or to give it their endorsement as being a tenable postulate, they are willing to concede that we as a people are tangibly affected by the "finer forces" or "vibrations" which come to us from the invisible or immaterial world, hence the members of the medical profession are prescribing remedies of "a higher attenuation," and in the more advanced schools and colleges are, with Prof. Sibley, paying much attention to the importance of combining with their prescribed remedies this new science of "mental therapeutics" as affecting the physical body through the action of the mind, and those who are resorting to these methods in their practice are those who are the most successful.

The electric and magnetic forces are also becoming recognized as having a legitimate place in materia medica, and are being employed by the more progressive schools as aids in eliminating diseased conditions from the human system and restoring the same to its normal condition; and the application of these forces alone is often found to be more salutary in their effects and more successful in their results than the now fast growing obsolete methods of the old school of practitioners and are being acknowledged as such by those more advanced minds in the profession.

The fact that the number of magazines devoted to the teaching of these ideas is constantly increasing and having a wide reading and the advanced ideas and methods advocated are finding a general acceptance at the hands of and being adopted into the practices of the laity everywhere the postal service carries this "New Thought literature," is further evidence of the tenable ground of our leading postulate, and we are inclined to remind the faculties of those colleges who are teaching the old methods, and their graduates who are just now practicing the same, that unless they "brace up" and "get in step" with these advanced practitioners referred to, they will assuredly "get left in the rear" in the onward march of progress.

In this connection we may be allowed to refer to the exercise of the faculty of clairvoyance as an important and reliable factor in diagnosing abnormal or diseased conditions of the body, as a correct diagnosis must necessarily precede the successful treatment of any diseased condition of the human system.

And it is very fortunate for the human family that the development and exercise of this faculty of clairvoyance is becoming more general, thereby removing the many obstacles to the successful restoration of health by those engaged in the healing art—which have beset those who have been obliged to persistently contend with them in the past, and the writer firmly believes that we are only upon the threshold, as it were, of the discovery of other successful methods of preventing disease, as well. In fact the methods being advocated by the school of "Physical Culturists," whose ideas are to occupy a legitimate place in the education of the coming generation, as the adoption and practice of the same will greatly aid in fortifying the human system against the inroads of diseased conditions which are often induced by excesses of various kinds, and the abnormal conditions to be found almost universally in human society, including the many dissipations indulged in frequently by people who lay claims to being among the most intelligent and sensible people. So it is well that these advanced schools have come to the fore to meet the emergencies. I may say most unfortunate, which so seriously menace the perpetuation of the human family—and cause a demand for the increase of insane and other hospitals. When we cease to emphasize the necessity of "learning how to die," and rather recognize the important duty of "teaching how to live," we will more fully fulfill the important mission to which our Heavenly Father has called us as teachers as well as exemplifiers of his holy word, viz., "Be ye perfect in body as well as in spirit."

The Phenomenon of Invulnerability among the Marabouts.

IT IS FAR BEYOND ANY MANIFESTATION OF SPIRIT POWER THAT EVER OCCURRED IN THIS COUNTRY. THE ARTICLE WAS OF SUCH SIGNIFICANCE AND IMPORTANCE THAT "THE ANNALS OF PSYCHICAL SCIENCE" PUBLISHED IN ENGLAND, CONNECTED WITH WHICH BEING THE EMINENT PROF. CROOKES, PROF. CAMILLE FLAMMARION, PROF. LOMBROSO, AND MANY OTHER CELEBRITIES, COPIED IT FROM AN ISSUE OF THE LA NUOVA PAROLA, PUBLISHED IN ROME, GIVING IT ADDITIONAL PROOF OF GENUINENESS.

IF THE PHENOMENON PRODUCED WAS THE RESULT OF SPIRIT RETURN AND INFLUENCE, AND IT MAY HAVE BEEN, IT ONLY ILLUSTRATES THE UNIVERSALITY OF THIS GREAT TRUTH, WHEN SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS OUTSIDE THE RANKS OF SPIRITUALISM, TRANSCEND EVERYTHING THAT OCCURS WITHIN ITS RANKS. THE ARTICLE WILL BE READ WITH GREAT INTEREST.

M. J. B. Penne, after a visit to Tripoli, gives an account of interviews which he had with certain marabouts in that country and the interesting phenomena which they produce. El marbout, in Arabic, means literally, "consecrated to the Divine service."

It is not unusual in Europe to apply this term to all the Mussulman priests of the north of Africa from Tripoli to Morocco; but, according to M. Penne, the marabouts form a special sect of "saints" and ascetics. Those among them who are supposed to possess supernatural, psychic and physiological faculties are not numerous at the present time, and, indeed, they are so little known that persons who have lived in Tripoli for years told him that they had never heard of them.

M. Penne, however, was able to obtain an interview with one of their religious chiefs, through the intervention of two persons of note in the colony of Tripoli, M. Henri Labi and M. Raphael Bastianini. We will not refer to the religious and philosophical questions touched upon in this conversation, and will simply confine ourselves to reproducing the following declaration, which was made by the Mussulman priest, in reply to his interlocutor's inquiry:

"On Fridays in our mosques we go through certain exercises which appear phenomenal and supernatural to the uninitiated, although in truth nothing that happens in the world is supernatural. We do not, however, now succeed in effecting the transportation of the astral body from one spot to another; that occurred with certain 'Saints' about 150 years ago; my grandfather [This religious chieftain came of a line of priests.] was himself endowed with this power, thanks to his great virtues. Now if anyone possesses this faculty he has concealed it from the world; these men make no public display of their faculties."

On the following day M. Penne had an opportunity of meeting the religious chief of another village. This man's words were in closer conformity to the ideas generally entertained concerning marabouts. When his visitors entered they found him seated on a mat, a rosary in his hand, in a room on the ground-floor of a poor house near the custom house. He was thin and bony, his eyes were deeply sunk in his head, the eyebrows very prominent, the cheeks hollow, the beard thin and greyish, the complexion olive; he was about 50 or 55 years of age, and he was clothed in a dirty, shabby garment, which left his arms and legs and chest bare. The lack of a good interpreter prevented this interview from being particularly interesting; M. Penne therefore asked to be allowed to make an appointment with him at M. Labi's who is well acquainted with Arabic. The marabout agreed and arrived punctually at the appointed time.

M. Penne asked him, among other things, if he had experimental knowledge of certain psychical or physiological secrets, whether, for instance, he had been able to endure the fire test. The marabout replied in the affirmative and putting his hands at once in the flame of a candle which was burning on the table, he kept it there for several minutes, and withdrew it with the palm blackened by the smoke but not burnt, and without any sign of suffering. M. Bastianini, who was present, in order to assure himself whether the flame was burning properly, tried to imitate the marabout, but he could not keep his hand in the flame more than two or three seconds, and quickly withdrew it, feeling it burning. On the following day he told M. Penne that his hand still hurt him and the palm was slightly swollen.

The following is a portion of the dialogue which the correspondent of the Nuova Parola had with the marabout:

Question—Could you teach me your words of power, that is to say, a few of the Mantras and secrets by means of which you succeed in controlling certain laws of nature.

Reply—Why should I teach these things to you who are among the uninitiated? We cannot and ought not to teach strangers our secrets. If you really wish for instruction in the rites and doctrines of our religion, come and live among us for two years; and submit yourself to circumcision. During these two years you must submit to our discipline; share in our fasts and prayers and acts of penitence. After that you will receive further instructions from one of our chiefs, you will have to remain alone and in silence for forty days, fasting, etc. The body and senses must be mortified to render them more sensitive to interior and exterior vibrations; occult and latent powers are thus awakened in man and the superior ego is developed. In short, you must await the attainment of perfect equilibrium between body and mind, so that carnal instincts may not subjugate the will.

M. Penne asked and obtained permission to witness the phenomena which the marabout was able to produce. It was agreed that four hours after sunset on the following day, i.e., after sunfire (about 10:15 p. m.) we should meet in a room of the Hotel Transatlantic, where M. Penne was staying and in which he arranged a room in such a manner that the walls were absolutely bare, and that there was no possibility of mystification or trickery.

"At the hour and place agreed upon," writes M. Penne, "six marabouts arrived, accompanied by the one with whom I had been conversing on the previous evening, who, I believe, was a subordinate chief and whom I will designate as the second sheik, and also by another who was evidently their superior, and who shall be designated as the first sheik. The latter never allowed his face to be seen, keeping it concealed in a futah, a sort of cotton cloth, with which these people habitually envelope their heads and persons. Only for an instant, whilst I was watching intently the actions and movements of this chief of the marabouts, did I catch a glimpse of his face. It was the face of a little old man about 60 years of age, with long grey hair and beard and a keen expression; his brow scored with wrinkles, but calm and serene.

"The room was quite empty and isolated, so that it was not possible to find therein any trickery; it contained no cupboards or secret panels.

"Five chairs were brought in, and four of the marabouts sat down, the two others remained standing. On the fifth chair six very sharp stilettoes were laid; some had flat blades, some rounded, some square. Wooden handles, all cylindrical in form, were affixed to the blades. On the same chair were also placed a sword and many nails about three and a half inches in length. The sword was so sharp that it was possible to cut a piece of paper on the bias with the back edge.

"Everyone examined these objects at his leisure. There were present M. Raphael Bastianini, Director of the Italian General Navigation Agency, his brother, his son, aged 19, also in the employment of the Navigation Agency, three professors, the manager and manageress of the hotel, and other persons.

"The two chiefs remained in silence and abstraction. At a certain moment one of the two—the one with whom I had conversed on the preceding day, and who had held his hand in the flame of a candle, the one we have decided to call the second sheik—began reciting mantras or ejaculatory prayers, with long and deep respirations; whilst the first sheik murmured prayers, keeping himself always concealed under his veil, and also gave orders and instructions to his companions and pupils.

"Having exchanged some intelligent sign with the first sheik, the second sheik arose, took a stiletto, introduced the point into his mouth and thrust it through his left cheek in such a way that the point appeared on the outside. Not a drop of blood issued, and the marabout showed no signs of suffering. He took a second stiletto and repeated the same operation in the right cheek, so that the handles of the stilettos crossed each other in his mouth. He stuck a third stiletto into his throat right through from left to right, a fourth was thrust into his left fore-arm, and the fifth into his right arm below the elbow. With these four stilettoes stuck into his flesh he presented himself to each of us for scrutiny and verification, and each person could examine freely and satisfy himself completely as to the genuineness of the stilettoes, and of the fact that they were actually in the flesh. Upon a sign from us he set to work to extract the two stilettoes from his mouth, the third from his throat, the fourth and fifth from his arms, without shedding a drop of blood or leaving the least sign of a wound. On the arms only little marks like bruises were visible.

"Another marabout took one of the five stilettoes, and uncovering his stomach, thrust the stiletto in from top to bottom and left it thus sticking in his flesh so that everyone could see it, observe, examine, and touch at his pleasure and convince himself of the genuineness of the fact, and that there was neither trickery nor fraud, nor possible hallucination. At last someone said: 'Enough,' then he took out the stiletto, which each of us carefully examined, as well as the skin of the marabout, which had been pierced right through. But the dagger bore no trace of blood, not a drop issued from the flesh, only a very slight mark remained, like a bruise. We noticed many such marks on the stomach of this man and we questioned him on the subject; he replied that in the mosque he performed this exercise every Friday.

"The same marabout afterwards took, one by one, the nails which had been placed on the chair, and in the presence of, and in view of all, he held them suspended over his open mouth with two fingers and let them drop in, making a slight motion in the throat as if he had only swallowed a little saliva; he repeated this until no nails were left on the chair. Thus did the nails all disappear into the gullet of this extraordinary devourer. I sent to look for more nails in the hotel, and some larger and longer ones were found; one measured almost a foot in length. As many as were brought were swallowed by the marabout apparently with the greatest ease, himself crying out: 'Bring, bring two kilograms, three kilograms, four kilograms, I will eat them all; if you have vipers, scorpions, serpents, give them to me, I will eat them also.'

"We observed that this individual said several words in Italian that he had learned from the Italian Consul. It is also noteworthy that I was told, and he did not deny it, that this devourer of iron and of serpents is so afraid of lizards and chameleons, that it is sufficient to show him an inoffensive chameleon to make him take flight.

"All these things took place in full light, without any theatrical preparation. The marabout's arms were naked and also his throat and chest, for it is thus that they dress because the temperature of Tripoli at this time (November 5th, 1905) is as hot as that of Rome in summer. One of us even examined the mouth and throat of the marabout to assure himself that the nails were not there, which, however, without our perceiving them, would have been a material impossibility, and it would have prevented his speaking if he had kept all those big nails—more than a dozen—in his mouth and throat. When I asked him how he disposed of these nails he replied that he had not even noticed them, because when they entered his mouth they became like a drop of water. I understood him to mean that these nails dematerialized and disintegrated into molecules and atoms.

"A third marabout took a stiletto and thrust it into the upper part of the ball of his right eye. In order to make it penetrate more easily and deeply he turned the handle round and round as though he were stirring chocolate. He remained with his stiletto thus thrust into his eye until I took it out myself, observing that it had penetrated to the length of a finger; that is to say about three inches.

"The point of the stiletto, as all the witnesses could attest, was not bloody, or even moistened at all, and the man showed no trace of a wound or of suffering; he was in a normal condition.

"The second sheik retired again to the back of the room, bared his stomach, took the sword, made it pass through his mouth from one side to another. Then, uttering unintelligible words, and jumping, he began striking himself violently in the stomach. We requested that he should strike himself in the waist and should make the sword pass through from the front to the back, pressing the blade into the flesh, and he did so. When we told him to cease, we observed that the blade remained as before, very sharp, and on the stomach of the marabout we found no cut, but only two slightly red lines, similar to bruises or like the mark from by tight tying, by a small pack-thread for instance.

"Having learned from one of the spectators that on the day of the marabouts' he had seen one of them enter publicly into a fiery furnace, and issue from it safe and sound, after a space of time, bringing out with him an object which had been cooked in the same furnace, I asked the second sheik whether they could produce a similar phenomenon; for instance, whether they could walk, or stand, bare-foot on hot cinders or in the flames, or put their clothes into the fire without their being burnt, etc.

"He replied that they were not prepared to do this. But after having consulted together they asked for a little napkin and a plate of oil. Tearing the napkin into many strips, they rumpled them together, then they saturated them with oil and lighted them. Thus lit they introduced them into their mouths, holding them open in such a way that we could easily see the flame, which looked like a little hot furnace whence smoke issued. This smoke got into the throat of one of the marabouts and made him cough several times.

"When we said 'Enough,' they took the pieces of lighted napkin out of their mouths. We were able to observe that the latter were moist and fresh as if no fire had touched them; the beards and moustaches were not singed in introducing and withdrawing the flames from their mouths.

"Finally I enquired if they could eat glass. My inquiry seemed to perplex them somewhat; then they consulted together and the first sheik said they would eat glass, but only a little.

"He then sent for a flask, which was broken into fragments, and each marabout, except the two sheiks, took three or four pieces, which he masticated and ground between his teeth, as if they had been sweets, and then swallowed like drops of water, without visible effort but calmly and tranquilly.

"Then the seance closed. We were all astonished by what we had seen, and especially those who had resided in Tripoli for twenty years without ever having closely observed these phenomena, of which they had heard so often and of which they had even caught a glimpse on the Feast Day of the Marabouts without having realized their importance, attributing them to magic, to charlatanism, to hallucination or something worse, thinking them to be the work of fanatics or of obsessed persons, and not worthy of consideration or study."

UNITES WITH CLARA WATSON.

And Does Not Approve of the "Rev." but Would Rather Have Our Speakers Designated as Teachers.

I endorse every word of Clara Watson's article in a late Progressive Thinker. I am glad there are yet some who dare speak their honest convictions.

Religion is a terribly absurd word. Some would make it mean everything, or nothing; all we know about it is by the actions of so-called religionists.

HUMANITARIANISM,—God speaking through the human, is growing rapidly in this dear old world, but in ages when it was lightly expressed religion was the God of War, Bloodshed, and outrage.

As religion dies, Humanitarianism increases.

I protest against our Spiritualism being called a religion. The "Reverend religionists in the past have been our bitterest opponents. Now, on the eve of our almost complete victory, do not desert our colors. Drop the "Rev.," from your names and refuse to be called "Pastors." Teachers or what you are; remain such.

When I open up memory's chambers and listen anew to the wondrous words of wisdom and revelation that I have heard given by entranced mediums, such as Emma Hardinge Britten, Achsa Sprague, Seldon J. Finney, Frank Wadsworth, E. V. Wilson, Mr. Greenleaf, Lydia Pearsol, Susie Johnson, James G. Clark, Laura DeForce, A. B. Whitney, and many others whose names have left me, all entranced mediums, I try to imagine in what condition the world would be in to-day had it not been for them and many others likewise controlled. They all lived to a reasonable age, bright and beautiful to the last, and have gone on to help build higher heavens.

Many of our brave old-timeers are still here, still holding high their light. Surely they will not knock down the ladder by which they rose—mediumship.

This week's "Thinker" at hand, and wonderfully readable, worthy of being printed in letters of gold.

I was deeply moved by Jamieson's tribute to our arisen Moses. I had the great pleasure of attending their debate, but it was held at Ionia, Mich., instead of Paw Paw. It was the finest treat I ever had. It was "Diamond cut diamond" from start to finish, with not a word of anger on either side to mar the richness.

CRADLE SONG.

The wind is rocking the boughs to sleep,
Where prety leaves no longer drowse;
From dusky sky-heights the pale stars creep
To tip with silver the hills' dim brow,
While mother croons her lullabies;
Hush, baby, hush, and shut your eyes!

The moon folds round her a shawl of cloud
And lets the stars shine all alone;
The treetops now in sleep are bowed;
The wind far out to sea has blown—
Hush, darling, hush, and close your eyes;
Whilst mother croons her lullabies!

O'er wint'ry fields and frozen streams
The northland elves are weaving fast
A crystal, sparkling web of dreams
To make you glad whilst night shall last—
So mother stills her lullabies
To kiss the lids of baby's eyes!

EXALT THE COMMONPLACE.

Ordinary Daily Experiences Are Needed as Aids Along Our Pathway.

When we picture to ourselves a successful life, the attainment of all effort, we look away to the far horizon.

We paint a sky with wondrous color-schemes, and place ourselves at some central and radiant point within its prismatic imagery.

It never occurs to us to use the ordinary things of our daily life in building for these phenomenal results.

Our temples is to be made of fairer stuff. Nothing of the common-place shall enter in. The several parts, void of flaw or imperfection, must fit each with the other, like mosaics, forming a whole of rounded symmetry, polished and complete.

Life presents her uplifted activities. Trade, commerce, the professions, mechanical pursuits and various forms of labor file into line.

We make our choice, we draw our plans, we prepare for work. We look about for material with which to begin and find, to our surprise, nothing but the commonplace. Our elusive dream-stuffs have played us false.

Daily transactions dealing, it may be, with coarse commodities, and with coarse people, involving details as uninviting, are the materials with which the business man must begin. From these he must shape his career, the success of which will depend entirely upon the inherent powers possessed by the man himself.

Over and over again must the mechanic teach his untrained fingers to handle tools, before he can attain the skill of the master artisan.

He who chooses a profession must needs follow rocky roads, meeting many cuts and bruises on the toilsome way, before he reaches the hall of learning.

When we face the fact that all activities, however crude, are used by the Infinite Father in developing and testing the character of his children, they assume a new significance.

Daily drudgeries, trials, sorrows, crosses of every kind which meet us hourly, rising up in unexpected places, are often needed as aids along our pathway.

We may burn thorns and brambles for our own illumination, if we bear in mind the purpose which they serve.

If we fail to use them wisely, or to conquer and dispatch them, as the case may be, again and again will they appear, in varied forms, until we learn the lessons they were intended to portray.

The minister may exhort his hearers from the pulpit to follow the meek and lowly Master, but if he himself is an expression of embodied conceit, or if he is intoxicated with his own importance, his utterances will be like vapor, or empty wind.

Slowly and surely we are learning that it is not words nor professions, but the actual living vibrations of the soul itself, which makes for good.

It is the vital force of the real man or woman that counts. The miracle is, that when once we estimate these hindrances for what they really are, they melt away, they cease to be, and we find ourselves without effort, at the center of a harmonious life, where fear is not, and where all things work together for good.

Whatever our aim may be in the varied paths through which ambition may lead us, always are we companioned by the "commonplace."

To those who would attain spiritual heights, who would grow in intuitive power, in inspirational endeavors, it is the "common-place" that acts as aid and revelator.

It is the "commonplace" that turns its divine side to seekers after truth, and reveals the benignity of its mission.

There are manifest mysteries in our own back yard. The Infinite is at work in the least of these "things familiar," and we need not journey beyond our fence line to meet life's unutterable wonders.

If the attitude of mind be in tune with nature, the stars and sunlight, the air, and birds and blossoms will tell their secrets.

If we realize the God-nature in the human, Justice will bring its scales, Harmony will direct its orchestra, and Love will be the anthem to rejoice a waiting world.

Let us exalt the "Commonplace."

ELLA DARE.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

A Few Extracts Exhibiting the Teachings of Mrs. Eddy.

Mary Baker G. Eddy has advertised herself as a spirit medium according to books published by her, copies of which now are in Boston Public Library. A sample is as follows: "God had been graciously fitting me during many years, for the reception of a final revelation of the absolute Principle of Scientific Mind-healing."

"When God called me to proclaim His gospel to this age, there came also the charge to plant and water His vineyard."

Thus old and various works from Mrs. Eddy before the year 1900 proclaim her mediumship for a spirit she was pleased to call God.

She set herself up as the only pebble on the beach—the only one for God:

"That man is not an intelligence, a mind, or a gender, and that woman is but another and higher term for man." "Mediumship or Spiritualism is without foundation or fact." "A belief in spirits belongs to the darker ages. There is no evil in spirit. Evil has neither identity nor individuality, and is a belief." "Disease is an impression originating in the unconscious mortal mind, and becoming at length a belief that the body or matter suffers." "God is the only Life." "Man has no soul." "Soul of man is God." "There is but one Mind." "All is Mind; there is no matter." "What is deemed vegetable and animal life is a self-evident falsehood." "Life and intelligence is God—good." "About the year 1862, having heard of a mesmerist in Portland who was treating the sick by manipulation, we visited him; he helped us for a time, and then we relapsed somewhat."

Thus we have Christian Science from its source by its author. Is it strange that officials of the Boston Public Library keep the oldest editions of "Science and Health," by Mrs. Eddy, in a safe to be seen only in the presence and consent of the chief librarian or a trustee of the central library in Boston?

We can hear much about up-to-date Christian Science and its healing power. One thing has made it famous in Boston; this is the Christian Science system of getting and giving money and property in the cause of Mrs. Eddy, and a great Christian Science church in Boston. They have built a monument to themselves, Christian Science and Mrs. Eddy.

"Just How to Wake the Solar Plexus." By Elizabeth Towne. Valuable for [illegible]. 25 cents.

THE GARDEN OF EDEN.

A Few Hot Cinders of Thought in Reference to It.

And the Lord God planted a Garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had formed. Among the other trees in the Garden God planted a Tree of Knowledge, and commanded his man not to eat thereof, lest he should die, but his man got lonesome, and God noticed it, and said that in his opinion it was not good for man to be alone. I will make him a helpmeet. So God made man out of nothing, but having run out of nothing, he caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he took one of his ribs and closed up the flesh thereof, and the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman and brought her to Adam.

What an idea!

So woman was only a second or afterthought (afterthoughts are really the best), of which this is a shining example, and I must say for the quantity and quality of the material at hand, of which to make woman, it was a magnificent job, the best ever performed by God by all odds.

The Origin of Sin, and the Fall of Man.

Any man or woman is an object of pity who believes that there is one word of truth in the entire third chapter of Genesis. I cannot believe that there is an intelligent man or woman who in this 20th century believes in the childish fable of the Garden of Eden story, with its tree of forbidden fruit. The serpent story is ridiculous.

If I did not want a man to eat my apples I would not put him in my garden.

Had I had the making of him, I would not have created him with the appetite for that kind of fruit. By whom were Adam and Eve tempted?

The Devil!

Who made this devil?? Was it for this purpose God made him? Why did he make him at all? Why did he not let his inexperienced man and woman know about this serpent and his devil? Why did he not watch his devil instead of watching Adam and Eve? and yet so-called intelligent people continue to teach children that the Garden of Eden story is a historical fact.

A more childish and more foolish story would be hard to find or imagine. The idea of this God waiting around the Garden of Eden, knowing all the while what would happen, having made them on rpose so it would happen, and then holding us all responsible! It will not do! The doctrine called the Fall of Man is infamous, absurd, not worthy of the consideration of an intelligent people.

Please read the third chapter of Genesis, study it carefully and sensibly. Look at it in a common-sense view, and see what you think of it. If you don't form about the same opinion that I have, then it will be a wonderment to me. MRS. S. E. TINKCOM.

EXTRAORDINARY.

Eusapia Paladino, an Ignorant Woman, Has Wonderful Spirit Manifestations.

The question of Spiritualism has been revived in Italy, and is being much discussed by the press. Eusapia Paladino, a Neapolitan woman of the lowest class, uneducated, even illiterate, has presented herself as a new medium, and has achieved unexpected success. She raises tables from the floor with invisible power, moves chairs from one side of the room to another without touching them, and causes mysterious fires to descend from the ceiling, while her auditors feel the impressions of invisible hands laid on their shoulders, hands and faces, as well as other mysterious phenomena apparently of a supernatural character.

The excitement among all classes of people became so great that some skeptical journalists and scientists determined to submit the medium to a test. They invited her to a room selected by themselves, making sure that no fraud was possible. When the audience had gathered, the "chain" was formed around a small, round table, the medium sitting between a journalist and Professor Lombroso. Each took a firm hold of her hands, so she could in no way move her arms or feet. The room was not perfectly dark, as a feeble reflection of a lamp placed in the next room permitted the experimenters to watch all movements of the medium. To the amazement and consternation of the skeptics, while the medium was practically in an unmovable condition, and was closely watched, the usual phenomena took place. The journalist felt some one punching him on one side, Prof. Lombroso felt a hand caressing his shoulder, the table was elevated by a mysterious power several feet above the floor and power several feet above the floor and in placed on a chair in the corner of the room, and far from the reach of the hands of the medium, should she attempt to use them, was transported through mid-air and placed on the table.

After these experiments had been repeated, under conditions that excluded all possibility of fraud on the part of the medium and the connivance of any confederate, the result was given to the public and the discussion began in the newspapers, and it is still going on.

MENTAL TELEPATHY.

Through Its Instrumentality He Could Stop a Little Girl When Going on an Errand.

To the Editor:—That article on "Mental Telepathy," in The Progressive Thinker attracted my attention more than anything of late, for I have long been confident that in due time it would come to the front. Over 70 years ago, when hypnotism was attracting much attention, I took hold of it with much success in New Bedford, Mass. A young sister of mine (since dead) I could talk with when three and four miles apart. I could stop the little girl when going for milk, and she told her father that I did it. He was offended, and forbade any more of such nonsense. I was called a fool, a heathen, a disciple of Voltaire, and would break up all belief in the bible. I left New England in 1838 for the West, where even the thought was more free.

I am now glad that I have lived 95 years, to see a position taken almost in my youth, come to the front and be in harmonious accord with the deepest thinkers of this advancing age.

"All things come to those who wait." I have waited, and many things have come, and many more will, for no finite mind can fathom infinity.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to the higher life, Dec. 14, 1906, at Edgewater, Colo., W. C. Williams, aged 54. He was a Spiritualist, and his father a Spiritualist before him. He was marshal for three years of the town in which he lived. He was a man greatly beloved by all for his beautiful character. Services conducted by Rev. Mrs. M. Rubicam.

Passed to spirit life from spinal meningitis, Alta M. C. Burnham and Clara O. Burnham. Alta was 8 years old and Clara 6 years. Alta passed away January 17 and Clara, January 23. R. A. BURNHAM.

Warwick, Okla.

Mrs. Mary Ann Nichols, wife of Enos Nichols, passed to spirit life, January 25, to join the dear ones, Lester Parker and his wife, Harriet Parker, who were identified with this glorious philosophy in the early days of Modern Spiritualism. These veterans ever kept an open door to all who would investigate and learn the lessons that the angel world were bringing to humanity. And their arisen daughter has kept the door open in the same way, and many a soul has found the light through this same open door.

ELLA BACON BOND.

New Haven, Conn.

Passed to spirit life from her home in Kokomo, Ind., Jan. 26, 1907, Mrs. Alta Mendenhall, age 20 years. She was the wife of Arthur Mendenhall, a most estimable young man of that city, by whom she is greatly mourned. An infant child, not strong enough to brave the rigors of material life, preceded the mother to the land of souls by a short period. Both forms were buried in the same casket. Many friends and relatives deeply mourn the departure of this bright young woman. Services by Will J. Erwood

Passed to the higher life, from the home of her father, in Converse, Ind., Mrs. Laura Howard, after an illness of many weeks. Mrs. Howard was a hard-working, self-sacrificing woman, who had for many years kept house for an aged father, who is both blind and deaf. Her absence is keenly felt by all who knew her—her relatives feeling that one of the strongest links in the family chain has been removed from their midst. Most of them, however, realize that she has only "gone before." Services by Will J. Erwood.

Wm. H. Abbott, of Corvallis, Ore., passed to spirit life, Jan. 20, 1907, aged 84 years. He had been a Spiritualist fifty years. He was vice-president of First Spiritual Union of Corvallis. Services were held in Barrett Lyceum, conducted by Rev. Jessie S. Pettit Flint.

Mrs. Luensa S. Goodnow passed to spirit life from her home at Millington, Mass. R. F. Churchill of Greenfield, president of the New England camp-meeting Association, officiated. She was 77 years of age, a life-long Spiritualist and always doing her duty faithfully, regardless of the praise or condemnation of any one; a good woman has gone to her reward. R. F. CHURCHILL.

Greenfield, Mass.

David Schmachtenberger passed to the higher life at his home near Minerva, Ohio, Jan. 16, aged 62 years. He had been a Spiritualist for ten years and was a magnetic healer of great power; also a constant reader of The Progressive Thinker. He leaves a wife and daughter to regret his physical absence.

AREL SCHMACHTENBERGER.

Alfred B. Sayles, 87 years of age, passed to the higher life, Jan. 27, from the home of his daughter in Grand Rapids, Mich. He was one of the pioneers in Spiritualism. His life was a sermon. He was honored and respected by all that knew him. He leaves four daughters and one son, and a host of friends to miss his earthly presence. A good man has gone from our midst. Custer Post and the writer conducted the funeral services.

AMANDA L. COFFMAN.

R. D. Morrison, M. D., of Patterson, Ohio, passed to spirit life, February 4, after years of usefulness as physician and as an exponent of truth in its larger sense. Years ago he was a Methodist minister, then a Universalist, and for many years a Spiritualist, in which knowledge he fearlessly passed on. By pre-arrangement, the obsequies were conducted by the writer, and the family feel that a comfort is theirs that nothing can take from them.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

WORLD MAKING.

A scientific explanation of the birth growth and death of worlds. By Samuel Phelps Leland, Ph. D., LL. D. Nicely bound in cloth. Price 75 cents.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Price, $1.

"Longley's Beautiful Songs." A new edition comprising in one volume the four parts heretofore published, to which is added part five, also a number of the author's most popular songs, including "Only a Thin Veil Between Us" and its "Companion Piece." Cloth, 75 cents. Boards, 50 cents.

"The Spiritual Significance, or, Death as an Event in Life." By Lilian Whiting. One of Miss Whiting's most suggestive, intensely interesting, spiritual books. It is laden with rich, thoughtful spirituality. Price $1.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood. Professor Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents in succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. Price, 25 cents.

VOL. 9 CHICAGO, ILL., FEBRUARY 23, 1907 NO. 900

THE AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETY.

Having for Its Object the Elevation of the World to a Higher Plane.

The writer was present recently at a reception held by the American Peace Society in the Twentieth Century Club rooms, Boston, Mass. A goodly number of representative people were present. Tea was served and there were short addresses by President Robert Treat Paine, Secretary Benjamin F. Trueblood, Rev. Jas. L. Tryon, Edwin D. Mead, Annie Fern Andrews; and perhaps the most important address was made by Mrs. Edwin D. Mead, an energetic, capable woman, who evidently realizes that digression from the subject is unpardonable in a woman, because she is a woman, and so has her subject well in hand and presents it in quick, concise form that holds the attention of her listeners and creates in them a feeling of personal responsibility. She said in part:

"Each of us has something definite and practical to do in helping to bring about a second Hague Conference. The questions as to what steps are taken, what subjects considered at this second Hague Conference, rest with two men, Theodore Roosevelt and Elihu Root. Congress has nothing to do with it.

"This second conference must not come together in ignorance of procedure that [illegible] last conference.

"When they met [illegible] at Westminster, in London, [illegible] dated various recommendations, there were five more important [illegible] others. One of these is something [illegible] of us have been looking and working for years. It is an Advisory World Congress, a continuance, if you please, of the Hague Conference, so that it shall meet regularly.

"Second, Regulation of Armaments, calling a halt. Our English friends feel very strongly about this. England is ready to take a really advanced step in this direction. Our government probably is not. At least it has not yet shown any tendency to co-operate with England in this matter.

"Third, Another matter proposed by William Jennings Bryan, that we shall make it obligatory before any declaration of hostilities, to have difficulties between nations investigated by a Board of Arbitration. This has been done in some cases, but he would make it obligatory. That in itself would prevent nineteen out of twenty of all of the wars that otherwise might occur.

"Fourth, the Protection of private property at sea in time of war. The legalized piracy that obtains in times of war is a disgrace to humanity. America has always stood out theoretically at least—against it. The question now is whether we shall remove all this body of merchant marine from the danger of being despoiled and annihilated in times of war.

"Fifth, a general Arbitration Treaty. We have made arbitration treaties. We want one broad general treaty which all the nations shall sign with each other.

"Nations are communicating with each other about these propositions. We want to bring pressure upon the government in regard to this second Hague Conference. There is one thing everyone here can do, whether he or she is a voter or not. That is, take ten minutes and a two-cent stamp and write a letter to Elihu Root, and say you earnestly hope the government of the United States will support the recommendations of the Interparliamentary Union. It is not even necessary to enumerate them all. That is a very simple and very important thing to do. I do not think long petitions have so much weight, but when a man or woman takes the trouble to write a personal letter, he or she is almost sure to get a reply. I have been surprised at the courteous and quick response I have always received. If you address your letter correctly, it will be put on file and counted. These eighty millions of American people have nobody to express their desires on this important matter except President Roosevelt and Elihu Root.

"There is just one other thing you can do. Take the trouble to write a letter to your representatives in Congress, and ask them whether they belong to the Arbitration Group in Congress, and if not, why not."

Collection for the Temple Fund.

Each society of Spiritualists is requested by the executive board of the Temple Fund Society to take a special collection for the temple fund, on the second Sunday of March, as a tribute to our spirit helpers on the anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. The temple fund will accrue to the good of our general cause by generous help in temple extension.

The aim is worthy of the support of all friends of the cause, and in tribute to the spirits who need all of our assistance to give them enlarged opportunity for work in behalf of truth and humanity.

Send all contributions to Mrs. Carrie H. Mong, secretary, 415 S. Franklin street, Muncie, Ind., or to the president, and due receipt will be acknowledged. I have faith in you.

Fraternally,
GEO. W. KATES, President.

What Has Hypnotism Done for Us and What Can Spiritual Unfoldment Do?

Hypnotism has willed people to believe in man-made gods and saviors, and prevented the unfoldment of the spiritual senses, which would have revealed the light of truth in the human mind, therefore it has been the enemy of the human race, wearing the cloak of Christianity to make slaves of human beings; while spiritual unfoldment can and will reveal the light of truth in each mind, and bring about the brother and sisterhood of humanity, by obedience to nature's divine law, in the place of obedience to the false teachers by hypnotism.

Then our Christian wars will cease, and in their place we will have peace. Then the love towards a man-made god and savior will be love towards each other, for the unfoldment of our spiritual senses will reveal the false teachings that have been forced on the five finite animal senses, by the power of hypnotism, for the finite senses are hypnotized, to believe all kinds of creeds.

The infinite or spiritual senses can not be hypnotized; the lower cannot hypnotize the higher, the effect can not control the cause, therefore the spiritual senses are the lawful controllers of the finite animal senses, in the place of being controlled by hypnotism.

A. C. DOANE.

Very Remarkable Doings.

Occurring at T. W. Stanford's Seances with Bailey, the Australian Medium.

It has been most gratifying to hear from all parts of the Commonwealth, New Zealand and even South Africa how much the illustrated Supplements of "Apports" brought to these seances are appreciated. It is intended in the February number to commence a new series of these photo-reproductions, in which will be included such of the many curious objects brought as lend themselves best to this work, so that those unable to be present may gain a better idea of them. A picture appeals to the understanding more forcibly than anything else. During Mr. Bailey's absence in Sydney on November 23rd, no sitting was held, but on November 30, a noticeable thing occurred.

Abdul announced a surprise—that he was about to bring a "trick" bird, which had belonged to a bird fancier in India, now passed over to spirit life, who had traveled round with a large number of performing birds. All had been dispersed but this one, which would be presently brought. Almost immediately, and with the light only lowered for an instant, it came—a small bird of a palish yellow-mottled plumage, looking much the same as the other birds now enjoying life in the aviary at Stanford House. It was [illegible] and the next day, however, that this one was quite different to the rest. It allowed itself to be taken out of the cage, as no other newcomer had done, and then acted the part of a "dead" bird, lying quietly in the hand, or head downwards when held by the claws. It was, moreover, the sweetest little creature, liked to be petted, and when returned to its cage at once hopped on to its perch in the liviliest manner. Those who are acquainted with all the details of this circle and the medium, including hard-hearted skeptical persons, have long ago been convinced that these birds really come from the warm climate of India, Malay States, New Guinea, as stated. Unfortunately, a cold spell came a day or two after this "trick" bird's arrival, and although the greatest care was taken, it was seen that the cold had seized this unusually sensitive one, and it succumbed—but not before it had proved itself to be one of the most convincing of 'apports" even to outsiders.

Among the many speakers who have delighted the sitters at these circles, Mr. Creswick, the well-known actor, takes the leading place. Hitherto he has always selected some short play or plays, and very remarkable has it been to witness the medium in the space cleared for the occasion, assuming the part with all the gestures and finished delivery of an accomplished actor.

On the evening of November 16, a new departure was taken, Mr. Creswick delivering an address on "Lessons from the Oberammergau Passion Play," from as it will be seen, his point of view as a spectator, and is reproduced below as of special interest:

16th Seance.—Nov. 16. Address by Mr. William Creswick, "Lessons from the Obermmergau Passion Play." Phenomena. A handful of thin wafer-like biscuits said to be from a holy place at Juggernaut, and put there by the priest. They were exceedingly fragile, the first of the kind, and different from anything seen outside India. Small bulb brought from South India, and planted in pot filled that day with fresh earth. Very fine tablet. Plant had by this time grown 2½ inches; was subsequently put in conservatory, and it is promised will produce red and white flowers. A second tablet.

November 23rd.—No sitting.

17th Seance.—November 30. Address by Sig. Valetti, on "The State and Condition of the People under the various Governments." Phenomena. "Trick" bird brought mentioned above. An Assyrian tablet, more interesting as regards written matter than any previously brought. Dr. Robinson said, "In the account in the Old Testament of the destruction of Babylon, Balshazzar is said to be the last king. The large cylinder now in the British Museum declares that Nabonidas was the last king, and churchmen have tried to reconcile these two accounts. On this little tablet the inscription runs thus: "Gobryas came against them. The Lord of the Babilhu (Babylon) sent forth unto him, and Nabonidas fled away." Then followed what is a Babylonish affidavit, duly signed. Second Tablet. Referring as the other to the same event or incident, the investing of the City of Babylon by Cyrus. Indian seeds brought. One planted, and started to grow. Dr. Whitcomb said it bears a most beautiful crimson bell-shaped flower. Joseph Hooker took some to England, and they lived for a long time in the Kew Gardens.

18th Seance.—December 7. Address by Charles Bradlaugh on "Honest Doubt." Phenomena. Two pieces of monolithic marble from an old building. If re-polished it is said that fossilized fish would be found scattered throughout. A sacred tablet from Thibet, made of pine wood. It was said to be one hung near the graves of certain people with sacred writing on. This was very curious—a piece of yak skin through a hole in the wood serving to hang it by. The hieratic writing might be known by Dr. Heinsoldt, Dr. Whitcomb said, but there is only one man—Younghusband—at present with an expedition, who is familiar with it. Nest with two eggs and a complete skeleton of bird, which Abdul said was a "tragedy of the jungle." The bird, while sitting, is attacked by a venomous insect, dies, and another enemy comes and eats the body, leaving the skeleton as brought.

Lessons From the Oberammergau Passion Play.

Mr. Creswick: Good evening. Be it known to all men, actors as a rule are bad orators; hence I do not claim to be a good public speaker. I am able to recite the lines I have read over of some play, drama, or tragedy, but as an extempore speaker I must claim your clemency. The subject interests me to night, and I trust it will also interest you. I have entitled it "Lessons to be Derived from the Oberammergau Passion Play" or Miracle Play. Might I at the opening be permitted to say that actors, people connected with the theatre, have in nearly all ages been regarded as social pariahs, anathematized, reviled and condemned. Even in wise Greece, the Greece of Solon, the actors were looked upon by a portion of the populace as low people. It is recorded that Solon once seeing Thespis in his car in the streets of Athens, and hearing him recite one of the ancient plays, said, "Are ye not ashamed to tell so many lies?" In Rome, too, an actor's calling was considered a degrading one. Decius Lepidus, one of the most famous actors of ancient times, was commanded by Caesar to appear upon the stage before the Senate. This man belonged to the equestrian order, and this command was tantamount to an insult, but, fearing to refuse a man so powerful as Caesar, he obeyed, and received the equivalent in English money of £400; but history records that he never regained his status among his fellows. In early Christian times the theatre was largely banned by the leaders of Christianity. Augustine and others of the Christian fathers wrote against theatres, while, strange, but true, large numbers of the Christian populace delighted to attend the theatres. We know this is correct, because several of the Christian fathers in their works have declared that it was a shame and a disgrace for them to assemble in the theatres and listen to the singing and music, to watch the mimes, and then to repeat in the streets and in their houses what they had heard.

But it is in the early days of Christianity that we must look for the birth of the Miracle Play, known also as the Passion Play. Truth to tell, in those days only the clergy, the monks, and the friars, impersonated the Christ. All over Europe, coming down the centuries, we find this play enacted first in the churches, and solely by the clergy. In the thirteenth century we find the introduction of the Miracle Play in England, Spain and France, and in the year 1633 in the highlands of Bavaria. In a little village, after a devastating disease called the plague, the inhabitants promised under vow, to perform the Passion of Christ every ten years, and this divine drama has been enacted religiously ever since at ten years' intervals. Fifty years ago, even thirty years ago, the performance of the Miracle Play attracted vast crowds, which gathered from every part of the civilized world.

In the short time I have at my disposal I desire to present to you the leading features of the Passion Play; its effect on those who witnessed it; its power over them for good, and, I am sorry to have to record, its degeneracy during the last twenty years. Various are the estimates we have of the number of people who from time to time have assembled, and on the occasion of which I am about to speak, there must have been well nigh 500 present. The scenery would not be considered extra good on the boards of Drury Lane or His Majesty's Theatre, Haymarket, in London, but the dresses, particularly the dresses of the Jewish and Roman people, were excellent. The play took place in the daytime. And, let me say just at this point that all the actors were from the ranks of the peasantry—not hired players, but simply faithful peasants, who had studied their parts, and it must be said that many of them showed no little ability in the impersonation of the various characters. This was especially noticeable in the impersonation of Pontius and also of Barabas, a part that would be considered at the present day as a minor one.

At the sound of the firing of a gun the actors trooped in upon the stage. I desire to record with pleasure that there was no altering of the story as you read it in the New Testament. Though presented under the auspices of the Roman Catholic Church and by Roman Catholics, there was nothing inserted or added to it that would make one think there was a desire to further the claims of that Church's doctrines upon the consciousness of men. It was the simple story of the martyrdom of that great seer, who "spake as never man spake before, whose life story has moved even the greatest materialists to acknowledge with homage the purity of his life and work. Looking round upon the audience, one would feel that they had not assembled out of curiosity. The spirit of reverence was there. When Joseph Mayer, impersonated Christ, his long hair falling on his shoulders, placid eyes looking down upon the face of the audience, and especially in the scene where Christ, brought before Pontius Pilate was delivered by him over to the scourgers, the vast audience seemed to be trembling with emotion and filled with the desire to rise and denounce the criminal act, and to exclaim with one great voice, "This man is innocent." Friends, had you been present you would have noted that this great audience had for the time being forgotten that they were but witnessing a representation of a great event in the world's history, for it seemed as if they had bridged time, and away back in the first century were witnessing the "meek and lowly one" being delivered to the scourgers. The part where Pilate calls for water and washes his hands, signifying that he had cast away responsibility, was very striking, and just here let me say it struck me that there are thousands of people of the present time who try to cast aside their responsibilities by figuratively washing their hands of them. These responsibilities cannot be set aside by any outward act or symbol. In this act the one who impersonated Pontius Pilate appeared to great advantage. The scene where, leaning on the balcony, he appeared to the crowd of upturned faces, saying "Behold I bring him forth to you, for I find no fault in him," was very fine. There was a tremor upon every lip, and then in the scene where he is led out to crucifixion, laden, burdened under the heavy cross, and Simon is hailed, placing the cross upon him, the Nazarene, weakened, staggers along, and away to Golgotha they go. Then the two thieves are led out, and just at the time they are raised upon the cross darkness begins to fall, and every soul with expectancy listens.

You have often heard the saying that you could hear a pin drop, but now you would have heard almost the falling of a feather. With a great cry he said, "It is finished." Then from the eyes of everyone present the tears, hot and scalding, course down their cheeks, and as I looked round upon them I said, "This is the greatest sermon that has ever been preached since the actual event." Then the thought flashed through my brain—Could the clergy of our churches at the present day but witness the mighty power that is stirring the souls of these people and making so powerful an effect upon their spiritual life, they would not sneer and turn up their noses when they are told of the Passion Play. No preacher yet—and there have been some grand men, such as Henry Ward Beecher—no preacher yet has been able to hold and enthral a vast audience like that which witnessed the Passion Play at Oberammergau. At the foot of the cross, clothed in spotless white, are the women who followed him, faithful until the last—the women who followed him when Peter denied him and fled away.

What must the great master-mind have thought? If it had been a woman I venture to say that Christ would not have been denied. Right to the end, at the foot of the cross, are the faithful women, including his mother! Just before the end, looking down, Jesus said to his follower: "Behold thy mother!" And John, rising steadily going towards the one who impersonated Mary of the manger, he places his hand reverently round her neck and salutes her with a kiss, and, as the narrative tells us, from that hour he took her into his own home.

Such a scene could not be witnessed on any other part of God's earth, my friends. I have had in the flesh a large experience of the good effect of acting upon great crowds of people. I have seen old Drury Lane filled from floor to ceiling, and some of the greatest stars of days gone by hold that vast crowd in the grand passages from the master mind of Shakespeare. I have seen them applaud when virtue has been triumphant, and vice has been cast down; but I have never yet beheld the spirit of reverence that I perceived in that large audience on that memorable day.

Let me tell you something else that is also true. Not only were the audiences affected to tears, but the actors themselves wept as they impersonated the Christ, and as the cruel Roman soldiers, with lances in their hands approached to give him the sponge of Myrrh and vinegar you could notice them turning away and closing their eyes to hide emotion. Nature had endowed and gifted him, and I venture to say that from that little Bavarian village thousands have gone forth telling the story how this grand man had impressed the people for good.

What lesson have I learned from witnessing, and what lesson would you gather from witnessing this remarkable Passion Play? That no matter how hard the hearts of men may be, the placing before them by true, competent actors of the chief scenes in the lives of those who have given their lives in the service and in the cause of humanity, brings out all that is good and noble in human nature. The sensual is suppressed, and if there be but a spark of spirituality it catches the flame and brings forth much fruit.

Again, to Spiritualists, a great and a grand lesson should be received by witnessing the Passion Play. You would learn that the well-spent life brings its own reward—not the reward promised within the veil, but while in the flesh. It brings peace and comfort to one whose life is devoted to the cause of humanity. You would learn that there is a power behind every good man and woman who is striving to uplift the race—a power that cannot be withstood. All the forces of darkness, whether they be allied or not, cannot prevail against this power for good that is in every life devoted to God and man.

At this point I take much pleasure in denying a falsehood that gained currency some years ago. A writer in one of the London reviews said that our friend Joseph had received from the Pope, Leo XIII., an indulgence that pardoned not only all his own sins, but the sins of his family, his children, and their children. This caused the late Cardinal Vaughan great sorrow and indignation. Ultimately it was proved that it was a plenary indulgence, not a pardon for sins to be committed, and he who impersonated the Christ had it framed, and it hung upon his walls for years. He did not need a Christian writer to enlighten him concerning the fact that if he sinned he would be punished, notwithstanding the edicts of Popes and Cardinals.

In conclusion, I am credibly informed that the last two performances of the Passion Play have degenerated. Sorry am I to record it, "'tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true." Numbers of our American friends and those from other Christian lands have witnessed the last two performances as they did in years gone by, but the spirit of reverence has fled. I am told that on the faces of the audience could be seen that look of expectancy and of curiosity that may be witnessed on the first night of Drury Lane pantomime, and it was apparent they had come to see a grand piece of acting. Can anyone tell me the cause? I trust that in the years to come, when the Passion Play will be again repeated, the spirit of reverence, reverence for that which is good, will again be revived, and those who witness it will go away from that building saying "It was good to be there; we have seen the Christ." Good night.—Harbinger of Light.

LOVE'S ALL IN ALL.

Be near, oh, Love, in youth's fair morn,
When Hope is in my veins,
And guide my ways to life adorn
With bright eternal gains;
Be near, oh, Love, e'er let me feel
Thy tender presence dear,
Then budding life will grow so real,—
Be near, oh, Love, be near.

Be near, oh, Love, when busy noon
My life doth occupy,
Inspire me when I faint too soon,
Pray don't thy care deny;
Cool thou my fevered anxious brain,
And warm my inmost heart,
That helpful deeds may for me gain
Those things that ne'er depart.

Be near, oh, Love, when shadows fall,
And eventide draws near,
With courage may I wait Death's call,—
Oh, Love, keep me from fear;
Oh, Love, be near, my summons heed,
Still let me feel thy touch,
My guide, my strength, supply each need,—
Oh, Love, thou art so much.

Be near, oh, Love, oh, heed my call,
All things above, Love's all in all.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES IN INDIA.

The Illustrious Worker in the Cause of Reform Is Putting Up in Calcutta as the guest of Maharaja Bahadoor Sir J. M. Tagore K.C.S.I., and Delivered His First Lecture on "Spiritualism, Its Facts and Philosophy," at the Palatial Residence of the Maharaja Bahadoor in Pathuriaghata. The Illustrious Doctor Addressed an Influential and Respectable Gathering, Most of Whom Were the Invited Guests of the Maharaja.

The Amrita Bazar Patrika of Calcutta, India, has the following:

Last evening, as already announced, the elite of the metropolis assembled in a brilliantly illuminated and decently decorated hall in the Prasad,—the palatial residence of Maharaja Sir Jotindra Mohan Tagore Bahadur, to hear the address of that illustrious Spiritualist, Dr. J. M. Peebles, who has, in his old age, come to us to teach us that there is no such thing as death, or what is the same thing, the sting of death.

The proceedings were opened by Maharaj Kumar Sir Prodyot Kumar Tagore, Kt., who introduced the learned and venerable speaker with the following:

"I have much pleasure to introduce on behalf of my father, whose indifferent health prevents him from doing so, to you, Dr. J. M. Peebles, M. A., M. D., Ph. D., who, though not so well known in this country, is regarded with veneration and respect all over America and Europe as one of the foremost Spiritualists and an earnest worker in spreading the liberal principles of equality and brotherhood of man and the necessity for all men to lead a pure and saintly life for their good here and hereafter. He sought to befriend the slaves, and was therefore mobbed by the slave-holders of his country. He is a friend of the American Indians, and the government availed of his services to win them over. He is a scientist and author of many valuable books. He was appointed Consul by President Grant, in Asiatic Turkey. He is meek as a lamb, simple as a child and his heart overflows with the milk of human kindness. He has come to us to prove that there is no such thing as death, that the soul is immortal and that there will be a reunion of the departed dear ones. He is one who has the proud privilege of declaring, "Oh! Death, where are thy stings?" For he has studied the subject almost all his life and is in the habit of saying that it is not a question of belief merely with him, but he knows that it is true.

"With these words I beg to ask the venerable octogenarian to deliver his lecture, which I doubt not will be heard with intense interest by many."

The Doctor then rose to address the meeting. After speaking of his purpose in coming to India, the lecturer remarked that he had a profound interest in the people of this country, because of their past high civilization, the Vedas, the Mahabharata, the Rishis and their teachings which had streamed like golden sunbeams down through all intervening ages. The present was an age of investigation and research, and the question of what was truth in regard to man's origin and final destiny was of tremendous importance.

There are, he said, about us the souls of things and shells of things; and the soul of things is the spiritual. The spiritual and all powers are unseen. The needle points towards the north pole by an unseen force; gravitation holds material things to earth. Man is a spirit now, clothed in flesh. The spirit world is here. But the spiritual realm, the angelic realm and the arsaphic spheres are far up in the heavens.

It is just natural for spiritual beings in worlds visible and invisible to respond to converse with each other as it is for the steel to respond to the magnet, or love to respond to love. And, then, for all ages there have been spiritual manifestations.

All matter is changeable and largely illusory. This table before me is largely illusory. It may be smashed to rubbish and burned to ashes, and the ashes may be reduced to invisible gases and then vanish. The table as form is gone. But there is no annihilation, the real table exists in the manufacturer's brain. All real things are invisible and spiritual. You do not see me now, said the speaker, unless you are clairvoyant. This which you see is the temple, the fleshy tabernacle in which "I," the "atma," the real kingly man dwells, and death simply severs the co-partnership between the fleshy and the spiritual. And each man enters into that state of consciousness which this life has prepared him for. It is conduct and character that save and not creeds nor rebirths.

I am conscious of the presence of spirits every day of my life. This is not belief, but positive knowledge. If I am now asked to describe what I have seen through mediumistic sensitives it would take weeks and months, for I have been fifty-seven years a Spiritualist and have seen over 2,000 sensitives with gifts of trance, vision, clairvoyance, clairaudience, levitation, gifts of tongues and gifts of healing.

The Doctor described a very remarkable adept in Madras who moved objects by his will, and yet he admitted that in the exercise of this power he felt the over-shadowing presence of spiritual intelligences. The doctor had seen spirit forms materialized, seen them step out into the middle of the room, and while he was yet holding the hand had found the spirit form dematerialized. Spiritualism gives us positive demonstration of future life. He had seen a lady write with both hands different subjects at the same time, and while thus writing she would converse upon still other subjects with persons present.

We boast our light; but, if we look not wisely on the sun itself, it smites us into darkness. The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things, now remote from all knowledge.—Milton.

A good Christian should never go to law; rather should he give up his coat and his pants, and everything that he hath. Churchmen never go to law; they are the most docile and easy creatures in the world on matters of business.—Voltaire.

The glory of science is that it is freeing the soul, breaking the mental manacles, getting the brain out of bondage, giving courage to thought—filling the world with mercy, justice and joy.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Concerning Meetings, the Workers and Work Accomplished.

A large and appreciative audience greeted Mrs. Margaret Gaule-Reidinger, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, February 3, at Elks' Hall, 8th avenue and 59th st., who gave a large number of names and messages couched in her usual sympathetic and refined language, which were promptly recognized, and brought much joy and comfort to many sorrowing hearts. And to those who are earnestly seeking definite evidence of spirit return with a demonstration of the personality of the communicating intelligence they proved very satisfactory, proving the claims made that she stands to-day in high esteem and confidence of the public who have listened to her guides who are controlling her so successfully. It is a pleasure to know that with her Sunday and mid-week gatherings in her spacious parlors, where all seekers for truth are cordially welcomed, at 257 W 113th street, many converts to our cause are being made, who in turn bring their friends, who are sure to obtain the evidence which invariably brings conviction and conversion. Thus through her ministrations large accessions are being made to our ranks, and it is very pleasing to note that her husband is as enthusiastic in the good work as is she. They are ably sustained by Mrs. Henry J. Newton, whose arisen companion was also for years an earnest worker for our cause, and their names have become household words among a vast number of believers who have enjoyed the charming hospitality of their home in days agone.

The vocal numbers rendered by Mme. Voight, who has a very magnetic personality, and a sweet and sympathetic voice of high range, are most helpful in bringing the spirit forces to give a more full expression to their dear ones, which is gratefully recognized by both medium and the audience.

With good weather conditions, there are indications of a large gathering at the mass-meeting of the state association, to be held Feb. 14-16, in this same hall; so come everybody and enjoy the feast of good things that will be dispensed by many of our leading platform workers.

Mme. Voight will have charge of the music, assisted by other talent of a high order. The large hall at 69 W. 125th street, to which Maud Lord Drake was obliged to move to accommodate the crowds which thronged her Sunday meetings at 7:30, was filled almost to overflowing Feb. 3. Dr. Cocke and Prof. Lewis continued their interesting talks upon "The Dynamics of Human Life," after which Mrs. Drake gave many recognized tests and messages in her sympathetic and refined way which appealed to and won the hearts of all. It was a great pleasure for her to receive informal calls from her sister co-workers previous to the opening of the meeting.

Mrs. Nellie J. T. Brigham and Miss Belle Cushman, who proves such an able and popular assistant at her meeting, held in a near-by hall at 74 W. 126th street, every Sunday at 10:30 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Mrs. Henry J. Newton and Margaret Gaule-Reidinger and husband all of whom expressed kind words of appreciation and good will coupled with cordial greetings and a welcome back to the city after many years of successful work in the far west and northwest. Mrs. Drake's new book, "Psychic Light" is a valuable addition to our literature, and should be in the library of every Spiritualist and reformer. It is gratifying to learn it is meeting with a large sale.

We experienced pangs of grief and regrets when informed of the transition of that highly inspired and ever popular worker, Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, whose acquaintance and that of her mother we formed at Lake Pleasant thirty years ago, where she came from her rural home in Vermont, inspired by the angels to recite impromptu poems before the large audiences which gathered there, who were astonished and charmed by the marvelous renditions from subjects given her. Whether of a serious or frivolous nature, a great deal of philosophy and good moral teaching was woven into the same and often of such beauty and length they proved sermons in themselves. Surely her work as recorded in the history of our movement and the influence upon the lives of her hearers will prove a grand monument to her memory. And the sympathy of our appreciative public will be extended to her bereaved husband from all over this country, and from those who have heard of her good work sojourning in foreign lands.

NEBRASKA ASSOCIATION

Setting Forth Their Success and Their Needs.

To the Editor:—I wish to state through your valuable paper the success of the State Spiritualist Association of Nebraska. Since their last convention, in October, we have had regular Sunday evening meetings, which have been a grand success, and the association is in better standing financially than ever before.

We have had about a year and a half of regular Sunday meetings, and the medium that stood by us during that time, cleared about $2000, and his work we very much appreciated. He now being called away to other fields to work, we would like another as good a test medium with us; I am sure any other good medium can make the same amount as he did. The field is in good condition for a worker.

We, as an association will contract with a GOOD TEST MEDIUM for our regular Sunday meetings, encouraging the people to patronize them that they may make as good a salary. We have engaged the Bijou Theater hall that will hold about 700 people, having the latest patent chair seats, that will be very comfortable to the audience, which will stimulate harmony for the work. We are also planning to have moving pictures of a spiritual or religious character for our lecturer to teach the people from. We have a good lecturer who will do that branch of work. We want a test medium that can come well recommended, no other need apply.

THE VOICE DIVINE.

"It Would Be Strange if in a World of Spirits, There Might Be No Communication of Spirits," as Set Forth by Henry F. Cope in the Chicago Tribune—Truly a Liberal Sermon.

"God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets."—Heb. 1:1.

Through the ages men have waited for voices to speak from out the great unknown. Answering to this universal longing for larger light, to this search for truth, there has been the conviction that, where our own scanty knowledge ended, there something akin to revelation would give us light. We have been listening for voices that would speak with an authority transcending that given to our fellows.

Cold reason may mock at revelation, but the soul struggling in darkness, baffled by its problems, lost in the night, still looks up and hopes. For what awaits us but despair if the mysteries of the universe are forever sealed, our questions forever unanswered, and no higher appeal to be known than that to our own selfish interests? It is not strange that men have heeded those who, though often mistaken or but impostors, have cried, "Thus saith the Lord!"

It would be strange if in a world of spirits there might be no communication of spirit. If the fairest thought of our era is that which was given us when man was taught to think of the omnipotent as father, it would be strange if there should be no way by which such a father might speak to his children. Such a world would contradict all our best instincts. Such a world would mean that man was better than his maker.

The divine voice speaks, but we too often listen in the wrong direction. It falls not from the skies; it comes not in strange, unusual ways of visions and portents. But it is ever-speaking through the things of daily life; it is ever revealing truth and beauty to the inner ear, for it comes not from without but springs up within; heard by the heart rather than by the ear.

The best things have not dropped down; they have grown up. Life is not from without, but from within. God speaks not in thunders, but in the hopes and the longings of hearts. Even the voice we hear in the sighings of the wind or the message we read in the rays of setting sun must be in us before it means aught to us.

The ten commandments owe their force not to any writing on stone, but to their writing on our hearts; to them the soul of man answers affirmatively. The only moral code we can follow is that which speaks with authority of a conscience convicted. That does not mean that man is his own God, nor that he knows no law higher than himself; it does mean that by the laws of spiritual development the law is being written on every heart.

Every real revelation is a divine revelation, since all truth is divine. Once we thought the scientist the enemy of religion; now we know that whenever science lays bare one of the facts of the universe we do but look on what the finger of the Infinite has written. When religion fights truth simply because truth speaks an unfamiliar tongue or fails to respect her traditions, she is fighting against God himself.

Our need is not some strange, awe-inspiring voice that shall break the silence of the midnight sky; our need is an ear trained to hear, a spirit, to understand and reverence the sublime voices that are ever speaking in our world, the voices of the beauty of nature, the joy of living, the stories of everyday divine heroism, the forces that are making a new world to-day as truly as ever one was made long ago.

The life of our day has not less of the divine than the life of long ago; but the message is harder to read; it is for an educated race; it is spiritual rather than merely material; it is from within; it is found in every good impulse, in every outgoing sympathy, in the kindling of eye as friend greets friend, in the good that men are doing, in the toleration that is becoming wider, the love stronger between man and man.

God speaks to men now as he spoke to Moses or to David, though the manner may have changed. But the poor in spirit, those with whom pride of the past has not served to make them unwilling to learn, these hear the voice; the pure in heart see Him; the seekers after truth find Him, and to all He comes in the thrilling moment or in the quiet hour when the voice of the heart makes itself heard.

THE PAUPER'S DEATHBED.

Tread softly—bow the head,
In reverent silence bow—
No passing bell doth toll;
Yet an immortal soul
Is passing now.

Stranger, however great,
With lowly reverence bow;
There's one in that poor shed,
One by that paltry bed,
Greater than thou.

Beneath the beggar's roof
Lo! Death doth keep his state;
Enter—no crowds attend—
Enter—no guards defend
This palace gate.

That pavement damp and cold
No smiling courtiers tread;
One silent woman stands,
Lifting with meagre hands
A dying head.

No mingling voices sound—
An infant wail alone;
A sob suppressed—again
That short, deep gasp, and then
The parting groan.

Oh! change—oh! wondrous change—
Burst are the prison bars—
This moment there so low,
So agonized, and now
Beyond the stars!

Oh! change, stupendous Change!
There lies the soulless clod;
The sun eternal breaks,
The new immortal wakes—
Wakes with his God.

A Notable Occasion.

The 80th Anniversary of C. Payson Longley, at Washington, D. C.—A Greeting Long to Be Remembered.

Wednesday, January 30, 1907, being the eightieth anniversary of the birth of that ever youthful singer and composer, C. Payson Longley, the day was observed in a fitting and complimentary manner at his home in the headquarters of the National Association. Greetings without number; poems, speeches, songs, letters and telegrams came to our musical brother from friends far and near during the day. The offices of the Association and the parlors of the home were turned into beautiful festive halls by the plants, flowers and other choice decorations that were employed in their transfiguration. In the evening a large number of the representative Spiritualists of Washington and vicinity assembled to pay tribute to the singer bard, and to congratulate him on his youthful vigor at the age of four-score years. Only the limitations of room prevented twice the number from receiving invitations, for the Longley home has innumerable friends in the district. The Washington Daily Post contained the following notice of the event in its issue of January 31:

"Spiritualist Is Honored.—Friends Celebrate Eightieth Anniversary of C. P. Longley's Birth.—The eightieth anniversary of the birth of C. P. Longley was celebrated by his friends in the National Spiritualists' Association at his home, the headquarters of the association, 600 Pennsylvania avenue southeast. Mr. Longley, who is a well-known song writer, has devoted his talents of late years to the exposition of the tenets of Spiritualism, and is much esteemed by the members of that faith.

"The parlors were decorated with cut flowers and growing plants. E. W. Sprague, the minister of the Spiritualist church of this city, acted as master of ceremonies, and introduced the speakers, who paid hearty tribute to the good qualities of their venerable host. F. A. Wood, the president of the local society, and Miss Susie Clark, of Boston, made short addresses, and I. C. I. Evans read an original poem. E. W. Hatch and C. L. Hatch, Boston vaudevillists, nephews of Mrs. Longley, contributed musical and dramatic sketches.

"A number of congratulatory letters and telegrams were read, and refreshments were served."

At this gathering Mr. E. W. Sprague most creditably acquitted himself as master of ceremonies, both in his reading of the many letters, poems and telegrams received, and in his presentation of the different speakers of the evening. Among the notables present who gave utterance to their congratulations and good wishes for the venerable host were Mr. F. A. Wood, president of the First Association of the city; Miss Susie C. Clark, the well-known author of many works; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague; I. C. I. Evans of the N. S. A. official board; Walter P. Williams, and Mrs. M. J. Stevens—a prominent medium of Washington. The following telegrams were read:

"Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—C. P. Longley—A Happy New Year to you; wish we could be with you. Jim and Carrie."—Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Hatch.

"Seattle, Wash.—Hearty congratulations. Many returns of the day. God bless you. Harrison D. Barrett."

The celebrated Hatch Brothers of Boston, vaudeville and musical artists, who are nephews of Mrs. Longley, were present and rendered choice musical selections during the evening. Mrs. Longley, in giving a brief address of welcome, voiced the sentiments of the spirit world on the occasion, and Mrs. Sprague gave a tender message to Mr. Longley from his spirit mother. Mrs. Longley also spoke of Mr. T. J. Mayer of the N. S. A., who had sent his congratulations and a floral offering of superb carnations, stating that this friend was unable to be present owing to his poor state of health, and asked all present to send him their good thoughts and sympathy.

Among the written tributes received were letters from Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, of New York; Mrs. Lyman C. Howe, Dr. J. L. Zell, of Ohio; Mrs. Carter Rogers of California; Mr. and Mrs. G. F. Wink of San Francisco; Mr. William and Mrs. Cora Richmond, Andrew Jackson Davis, Lyman C. Howe, J. R. Francis, Mrs. C. L. Hatch and Mrs. H. L. P. Russegue. Also a beautiful poem from Mrs. Mary A. Price.

The following "Soliloquy of Titles," by E. W. Hatch, was read and gave much enjoyment, as it was observed to be an arrangements of the titles of many of the songs of the veteran composer, C. P. Longley:

"I Love to Think of the Old Days," "The Dear Old Days" will come back to me and I see "The Home of My Childhood Days" with "Mother's Love Purest and Best." I gaze at "The Ring My Mother Wore" and think of "My Mother's Beautiful Hands." I cry aloud, "I'm Thinking, Dear Mother, of You," and I call you "Back from the Silent Land," "The Beautiful Land of Light." You were my "Bright Star of Hope" and "Aspiration"; I know there is "Only a Thin Veil Between Us," and at "The Lifting of the Veil" I, too, shall go to "Our Beautiful Home Above," "Just Beyond the Gates of Gold."

"Oh, What Will It Be to Be There?" I am "Weary of Watching and Waiting." "Come Back, Dear Mother," "Come in Some Beautiful Dream," "Come, for My Poor Heart Is Breaking," "Come in Thy Beauty, Angel of Light," "Oh, Come to My Heart and Home," and "Open Wide the Golden Portal" of the "Bright Land of the Blest."

"Sad Memories Come, Oh, Heart," as I think of the "Hopes of the Long Ago." "There Are Two Little Shoes and a Ringlet of Hair," "Vacant Stands Her Little Chair," for "Little Birdie's Gone to Rest" in "Our Beautiful Home Over There." She is a "Child of the Golden Sunshine" and is "Hand in Hand With the Angels," Gathering Flowers in Heaven," "Where the Roses Never Fade."

"There's a Day of Triumph Coming," for "The Soul Goes Marching On," "Heavenly Music Fills the Air" and "Echoes From Beyond the Veil." The "War Song of Progress" is "All Hail the Dawning Light." "Truth Shall Save the World" and "Loving Angels Everywhere sing of "Freedom's Grand Triumph"; "Sometime We Shall Know" "The Good Time Yet to Be."

"We Are Journeying Home To-Day," "One by One the Old Friends Fall" from view; but "We'll All Meet Again in the Morning Land." "If You Have a Friend That Loves You," you will find him "Waiting by the Golden Stairs," for "Love's Golden Chain" shall bind hearts together, and so, "When My Soul Shall Be Free," and I know "They Are Calling Me Home," "Beyond the River," with "Dear Pleading Voices" to "The Home of My Beautiful Dreams," "I Shall Be Satisfied."

The following poetic tribute from the inspired pen of Mrs. Longley to her gifted companion was read at this time:

The Song of Life.

I hear a grand, impressive voice
That sings and sings in thrilling tone,
Its pean makes the soul rejoice—
No other cadence like its own;
Oh, grand the music, sweet the theme,
Surpassing all that earth has given,
So worthy of a poet's dream,
So fitting for the souls in heaven.

At first, the melody was fine—
Like threads of birdling notes in Spring,
Like babbling brooks where flowers entwine
The mossy banks where starlings sing;
It told of boyhood's happy days
Of youthful hopes and merry plans,
Of young Ambition's lofty gaze
That fearlessly the whole world scans.

Then, came a note of greater length,
It glorified that mystic voice—
A strain denoting nobler strength
As Manhood made its early choice
Of Honesty and highest worth,
Apart from worldly fame and ken,
Uncaring for applause of earth
But only for the good of men.

A summer sweetness in the song
Of bloom and fragrance, beauty rare;
It thrilled each heart amid the throng
And waked responses everywhere;
For days were bright and nights aglow
With radiant stars that never pale;
As souls uplifted from below
Learn how to do and never fail.

Again the voice, in mellow tone
Awakened echoes grand and sweet,
It caught a note from Wisdom's throne
That made its harmonies complete;
For in the Autumn time of life,
It told of ripening work sublime—
Of triumph over sin and strife,
Of victory over sense and time.

A sacred pause, and then once more
The song arose on raptured wings,
As upward cleaving evermore
The air Celestial with it rings;
For winter, with its whitened gifts,
Its laden hands of work well done,
Gives glory that all sorrow lifts
From those whose victories are well won.

The Song is here—the Singer, Life
Repeats its anthems unto thee—
Immortal cadences are rife
With hints of rapture yet to be;
Through four score years the song has rung
For thee—oh, singer of the world,
The while thy inspirations, sung
Have helped to keep the Truth unfurled—
And thus, we give thee glad acclaim
And recognize thy birth and name.

Among the tributes—in prose and verse—received and read at these exercises, are the following:

Chicago, Ill.

My Dear Brother Longley:—I congratulate you on your 80th birthday, and trust that you may have at least twenty more, thus reaching the century mark, a limit I have set for myself. It must be gratifying to you to know that you have made a deep impression for good in the world through your beautiful songs, which alone will entitle you to a high seat among those who have preceded you. I enclose you a check, which you will please use in buying a little something to remember the 80th mark in your life.

Yours cordially,
J. R. FRANCIS.

Prof. Payson Longley—My Dear Brother:—

I lean my soul toward that wonderful day
When first your voice was heard,
And the echoing silences seem to say,
"A musical genius has come this way,
And we're listening to his word."
A wail is the first note in the song—
That grows with advancing years,
And weaves a spell as it warbles along
To charm away evil and banish the wrong,
With the music of heavenly spheres.
This day is a mile post to proclaim
The nearness of the silver strand,
Lighted with Love's immortal flames
And millions of sweet celestial names—
That border the summer land.
This day that crowns the four score years
With victories wrought in thy soul,
Hath a message of love from the musical spheres
Where every note of thy life appears
As the mystical pages unroll.
The sunshine and shadow that border the way,
Down the vistas of life thou hast trod,
Have a voice and a message that echo to-day
With musical cadences, solemn and gay,
In a hymn from the life of our God.
Thou hast sung to the souls that were famished for love—
Thy music hath softened the pain of despair;
The light of the morning that sparkles above
Into sorrowing hearts descends like a dove—
In the hymns of thy day-dreams hovering there.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Mr. Longley—Dear Professor:—We regret very much that we cannot have our bodies with us here to-night, through the lips of which we could voice our high esteem and fraternal greeting to you, but please accept our congratulations upon this happy occasion.

With its four score years of battling with the elements and the strifes of human life, your physical form still presents the glow and animation of youth, showing the management of a master spirit. But only such a spirit could have poured such sweet songs of hope, comfort, rest to thousands of earth's children and which will continue to uplift weary and hungering mortals for many years to come.

We are glad to be here to-night with your many friends who are present and join in their expressions of love for you and wishes for many more years of earthly happiness and usefulness. We hope you and Mrs. Longley will have many repetitions of this pleasant anniversary. We are,

Your appreciative friends,
CORA L. V. RICHMOND,
WILLIAM RICHMOND.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30, 1907.

My Esteemed, Dear Brother Longley:—Most cordially I greet you to-night, January 30, 1907, on the summit of four score years. To the child-mind, a life of 80 years appears very long, and "all the way up-hill," but to the adult, looking backward, the accumulated years seem impossible to fully realize. I arrived at the summit a few months in advance of you. The body gravitates earthward, the spirit vibrates heavenward. The body grows tired and sleepy and unelastic, while the soul and spirit grow younger and joyous like the goddess of perpetual morning. Somebody has written:

"The solemn murmurs of the Soul
Foretell the life to be,
As travelers hear the billows roll
Before they reach the sea."

Brother Longley, you have enriched the world by your contributions of cheering and consoling music covering inspiring poetry; you have bestowed the harmonious concord of sweet sounds and by so much have lessened the discords of the outer world.

And you are blessed in your companion; she is ever alive to the spiritual world, full of sympathy and industry for the common humanity. May you long enjoy her sweet society and may you both be glad and healthy and happy and prosperous.

Fresh from this oven of fraternal love, I send you an invisible birthday cake; take a bit yourself, chew and swallow it slowly and then divide the rest among your many friends present.

My blessed companion, Della, joins me in loving salutation to you both.

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS.

Hartford, Conn.

I cannot feel that 80 years have waxed and waned for dear Mr. Longley. He has found the elixir of perpetual youth. In spirit such a man can never grow old. You, Mr. Longley, have taken age, and loss of hope and fear for the future from many, many souls. I want to tell you that while at Montpelier, Vermont, last Saturday and Sunday at the state convention, the choir was requested to sing, "Only a Thin Veil Between Us" three times, each time such a response was given as would have gladdened your heart. I feel sure that your heart-songs have indeed carried comfort to many.

I would dearly love to be with you on your anniversary and I shall be with you in thought, and I earnestly pray that you may welcome many happy returns of your birthday. My good husband joins me in congratulations to you, both, and our sincere good wishes for the happiness of Mr. and Mrs. Longley for many years to come. May heaven's blessings rest upon you. I am glad to know one who cannot, will not grow old.

"Old, are we growing old?
Life blooms as we travel on
Up the hills, into fresh, lovely dawns,
We are children who do but begin
The sweetness of living to win;
Because heaven is in us to bud and unfold—
We are younger for growing old."

Affectionately, your sincere friend,
HELEN L. P. RUSSEGUE.

New York City, Jan. 26, 1907.

Prof. C. Payson Longley—Dear Friend and Brother:—Greetings and God-speed to you this, the 80th anniversary of your entrance into this world; what a long and useful life has been yours. And yet, one can hardly realize that so many years rest upon your head. The eye has lost none of its youthful lustre and the mind is ever alert for all those things that keep it from growing old. You certainly have learned the art of growing old gracefully, and may I your friend be bold enough to ask, "Teach me the secret of perpetual youth?" Is it the result of that deep and abiding love for humanity that has been one of the distinguishing features of your whole life? Well, no matter what the secret may be, yours is a youthful age, and you may truly say, after singing innumerable songs, that "The half that is in me has never been expressed."

One of our teachers has said, "Don't let the song go out of your life." Certainly the song has never gone out of your life. Yours has been the song of the angels and the song of a most perfect and abiding love. You have sung these songs into the hearts of the people; they have become one of the most distinctive features of that great religion—Spiritualism—that now is attracting the attention of the most cultured of the earth.

Thus, dear friend, have you gained an immortality among men. Beautiful as this may be, still there rises above it your work in the world as a teacher—for there has been a purpose in all the songs you have sung—you have taught us an exalted faith that is born of knowledge—a faith that has thrown widely open "Those Pearly Gates" and rent asunder "The Thin Veil" that hangs between us and the world of ineffable beauty where all our loved ones dwell.

But there rises something superior to all these gifts of poesy and song—the Real Man revealed as Friend and Brother—here we find a man of positive convictions, strong in the expressions of those ideas believed to be true, yet with a heart that is tender as that of woman, ever feeling for the oppressed and downtrodden.

And is this life spent? Ah, no, only just begun—a few brief years lie behind, but before, Eternity filled with divinest possibilities.

May the years on the earth lead far beyond the century line; may health, prosperity and happiness be yours, until—

"Your barque shall find its anchorage of rest—
When the kind hand which every good has given Opening with wider grace, shall give the best."

This, the wish of your sincere and devoted friend,

GEO. A. FULLER.

Poem by Ouina, via Her Medium, Water Lily—Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond:

Just eighty years young to-day: What a crown
Life and Love weave to place on your brow;
Life, wrought by your labors of beauty and song,
Love, greeting and blessing you now;
Early years, aspiration and struggle were yours,
Later, manhood's endeavors and choice,
Blessings; often revealed amid shadows and tears,
And, oft coming forth to rejoice.
Shadows; Beliefs coined by man here below—
The struggles for freedom of thought—
The seeking for knowledge, the strong wish to know;
At last, all in beauty was wrought.
Songs: oh! how they sang in your spirit and came Forth fresh from the altar of light,
Songs: Oh! they leaped like a beautiful flame
Making your way, and others, so bright.
Thou hast seen many wonders outwrought on earth
Since the stars and the suns cradled these Such wonders of science have sprung into birth,
Such revealing of Thought's potency;
The snorting steam engine o'er land and o'er sea,
The light of the lightning's fierce gleam
Chained to commerce becomes a mild agency
No longer heaven's dire, vengeful dream.

Thou hast seen the old creeds and old errors depart;
Hast helped quench the Hadean fires;
And out of the new world is revealed a new heart
With beneficent, fraternal desires.
Thou hast seen Death die; for the once closed gate
Is unlocked and unchained and wide open flung
By the strong, loving angels who nevermore wait
But are here; all of this thou hast sung.

Thou hast seen many hundreds of thousands arise,
Freed from fear of the future, and lo:
The garments of mourning are dropped, and their eyes
Are anointed with gladness; they go
Not as slaves to their dungeons; the graves hold no more
The loved; but enfranchised and blest
The loving above, meet the loving here to pour
Balm of comfort at Truth's glad behest.

Thy gentle companion, heaven-gifted, to bless,
Crown thy life with this joy-time to-night,
Thy friends gather near, each longing to press
Thy hand, and to express their delight.
The unseen world throngs to a concourse above,
With blessings unnumbred they bend,
And for thee there's only the one voice of love,
One wish and one prayer all inblend.

May thy life be as long as is best for thee here,
May thy songs be as birds that return,
Each blessing and singing from year unto year;
May the fountain of life fill its urn
With joy; and whatever gifts others may know,
They may teach, they may write, yours are sung;
For the songs of a people their natures best show;
Sing on: You are eighty years young.

To C. Payson Longley:

You are eighty years old to-day—
That seems like a long, long time
If we stop to look back on the way
O'er the hills you have had to climb;
For there have been hills in your life,
Yet they never have caused you to stop—
But boldly you entered the strife
And climbed till you mounted the top.

We read in the pages of old
Of a star that had signalled the word,
That a leader was born to the world
To accomplish the work of his God;
And up in the heavens afar,
I know there is shining away
The beautiful orb, of a star
That is guiding you, day after day.

It has watched over you since your birth
On your various journeyings bent,
It connected the heavens with earth
And wherever it led, there you went;
Thus you have accomplished the work
That you God mapped out for you—
And ne'er have you been known to shirk
That, which was your mission to do.

For you with your glorious songs
Have appealed to the hearts of mankind
You have taught him to rise from the wrongs
And develop the God in his mind;
And by their sweet message of love
Have brought out the good and the true—
Through the spirit of God from above
That has been developed in you.

'Tis a glorious honor to say—
"We have entered the struggle and won
And cleared the mounds out of the way."
Yet, this my dear friend, you have done;
Your record of life as we know
Stands out as a model so clear—
Its influence ever will grow
As a monument lasting and dear.

I. C. I. EVANS.

Many beautiful gifts including boxes of exquisite flowers were received by Brother Longley from friends far and near; the Ladies' Auxiliary presenting through its interpreter, Mr. Sprague, a set of Emerson's works handsomely bound, and other gifts. The exercises were concluded by a dainty collation, followed by music and song till a late hour.

"The Great Work."

As Comprehensively Viewed by a Cultured Leading Liberal Clergyman, Illustrating How it is Forcing its Way to the Front Among the Intellectual Class in Spite of Adverse Criticism.

To the Editor:—As the columns of your paper are now open to a discussion of "The Great Work," it is possible that your readers may be interested in learning what impression this book makes upon a clergyman of one of the old churches, whose point view is naturally somewhat different from that of many of your contributors.

Having given the book a careful reading, and viewing it now in its entirety, I can truly say that in every respect it is the most remarkable production it has ever been my lot to come across. The "lines" upon which it is built are so exceedingly broad, the undertaking proposed and delineated so immense, as to fairly daze the mind. If the accomplishment of the undertaking proposed is a possibility, as the author so ably argues it is, it may well be named not only "the great work," but the "greatest work" the human mind can contemplate. Compared to such an undertaking the mighty works of earth dwindle into the merest pastime. Again, if human employments are often called (and many of them justly so) "groveling in the dust," here is a work proposed which is well worthy of the devotions of a royal race. One can hardly imagine the magnitude of such an undertaking until he meets the proposition face to face. He experiences a decided shock when it is coolly and deliberately proposed that he at once begin to scale the heights of heaven,—that, without waiting for death to liberate him from the body, he to-day begin a journey to the "Undiscovered Country!"

The spirit in which the author approaches and deals with this great subject is most commendable and impresses the serious reader favorably from the first. In this as well as in many other respects, he stands in striking contrast to many of our present-day "intermediaries" who claim to transact business between the two worlds. The finer sensibilities of thinking men and women are often shocked by the ignorant, irreverent and illogical utterances of such people, who show by their thoughtless words that they have no just appreciation of the great subject with which they are dealing. While ridding the doctrine of a future life of the fables and superstitions of the past, reformers would do well to remember that the subject is one which deserves our sauest, most candid, reverent, and scholarly treatment, and which indeed must have such treatment, if the attention of serious thinkers is to be gained.

In this respect "The Great Work" is all that could be desired. The author is intensely in earnest and thoroughly awake to the magnitude of the undertaking proposed. Not only is there manifested on every page the deep seriousness which one might reasonably expect to find, but also the language, logic, in fact the whole treatment are those of a scholar and master mind. It is with consummate skill that the author lays the broad, ethical foundation, and then proceeds step by step to erect thereon the edifice of mastership.

Concerning the possibility of developing "independent spiritual sight" the average reader of the book may not care to express an opinion without further investigation, but there is one phase of the subject as here presented that cannot fail to impress everyone as eminently fitting and proper, and that is the author's insistance upon the absolute necessity of a thorough moral foundation for the proposed spiritual structure. The thoughtful investigator feels that, if such high and holy gifts are within the reach of mortals, then, according to the eternal fitness of things, they ought only be accessible to those whose uprightness and stability of character insure a proper use of them. If, as John Fiske so ably shows, there is in the unfolding universe an "Omnipresent Ethical Trend," then it is most fitting that such attainments, than which we can conceive of no higher, should come, if at all in this life, as the fruitage of a normal growth which is strictly in harmony with the "ethical trend" of the universe.

But apart from the subject of the Development of Mastership, which is of course the author's theme, the work contains the best demonstration of the real oneness of science and religion that I have ever seen. In regard to this in particular I most heartily commend the book to every Christian minister. We have all of us often heard, and perhaps often made, the statement that true science and true religion are one, and we have thought that in the writings of Drummond and others this truth was fully demonstrated, but in my judgment a far more able demonstration is to be found in the book under consideration.

In the chapter on "The Law of Compensation" for instance, how manifest is the truth of our Lord's saying that "Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing." Anger, lust, greed, self-indulgence are shown to be, not simply "sins" which one ought not commit, but infractions of unchangeable, though beneficent, LAW, from the consequences of which infractions there is no possibility of escape,—this side of the last "farthing."

Finally, I can think of no comparison which will better illustrate the general effect of this book than that of an intensely brilliant light shining in a dark place and striking the eyes of people who are variously prepared to receive it. In such a case some would hail the light with joy and seek to profit to the greatest possible extent by its revelations. Such would be "in their element." Others whose eyes were in an unhealthy condition would experience pain and consequently condemn the light, seek to shut it out, or flee from it. Still others, whose eyes had been so long closed that they now called darkness light, would see nothing at all and even deny that there was any light. One would hardly like to venture a prediction as to the general reception "The Great Work" will receive from the scientific and religious worlds, yet as long as there are scientists who can say (as some have said regarding the demonstrations of the Society of Psychical Research)—"I would not believe it even if I saw it with my own eyes," and so long as there are equally bigoted and unreasonable ecclesiastics, some adverse criticism may be expected.

There will be those with weak eyes who will seek to evade its brilliancy or lessen it, and there will be those who deny that there is any light to be found in the book.

But there will also be found those whom deep experience has taught that the truly scientific attitude is that of Huxley's "little child," by which expression that great scientist designated the attitude which experience had taught him to assume toward all investigation. These will not deny nor flee from the light, but will approach and investigate.

Two things, I apprehend, will be found necessary in order to justly estimate the claims of this book. One is the intellectual ability to appreciate true, logical reasoning, and the other is a mind sufficiently honest and unbiased to be open to "more light" and to acknowledge such light when seen. Doubtless it will be true in this instance as of old, that those "who have ears to hear" will hear, and that many will be found who see therein possibilities of individual attainment which will in time bring such blessings to the race as are now beyond our fondest dreams. AN INTERESTING LETTER.

In Which Various Matters Are Presented.

The gift with one year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker was gladly received. I wonder if any of our readers realize the amount of reading we get for $1. Readers of the magazines pay $1 for one year, receiving twelve magazines which I doubt containing one-half the reading we receive for the same price.

We will greatly miss the reports Moses Hull made so interesting. Mattie is so brave to continue her work alone; she must miss his help after so long journeying together.

The discussion between Col. Olcott and Elizabeth Harlow is very interesting. Three cheers for Miss Harlow!

Dr. Peebles is a wonderful man. I met him at Sturgis nearly four years ago, perhaps it was three years ago, and I shall never forget the strong, magnetic hand-clasp. I looked at him in amazement, he certainly carries his weight of years lightly.

Spiritualists seem to live to a ripe old age, few commit suicide, because they know what they would have to endure. No one would go to a party uninvited, if they did they certainly would feel uncomfortable, hence a suicide would rush in where he was not wanted and not better his condition one particle. It takes a brave man to live and a coward to die. There are times when death seems preferable, but conditions are not always the same. Waves of depression sweep over us, perhaps, we soon understand the cause and rejoice in living and overcoming the temptation to end it all. A Spiritualist knows that ending our earthly life does not end all.

There is no death.

Will some kind reader please tell us how to distinguish the difference between mundane and spirit influence. A spirit influence affects me in a calm, peaceful way, at times seeming to throw a cold wave over my head and body. Have felt kisses on my cheek, and fingers in my hair in a caressing manner. A mundane influence makes me nervous and often irritable. I would like to know how other people detect the difference.

Truly Spiritualism has worked wonders in changing the dispositions of many of our friends.

The Progressive Thinker keeps me in touch with many mediums I met at Vicksburg camp, and at Grand Rapids, several years ago. I am not a medium, but would be proud to be one, as I am of owning myself a Spiritualist and a friend to all mediums.

The Unknown Life of Jesus.

To the Editor:—Please accept thanks for the prompt remittance of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." I have read it through. The light it sheds will flood the past with a gleam that will set the most profound scholar thinking. It looks more reasonable to my mind than anything on the subject that I have been taught or ever read. Of the truth therein contained, there is no doubt, and I cannot doubt, and must conclude that the theory of reincarnation is true, and that the spirit who was called Jesus Christ in his last incarnation will visit earth again—not in the old name, however. It is a book that the reading public should peruse and prize. It is an ornament to any one's library, and a Guiding Star through the mazes of false teachings, and old superstitions, on to "terra firma."

In your issue of January 12, is an article on "The Theological Center of the Universe," from the pen of C. C. Carter, wherein he explains more in a nut-shell than some astronomers can with lengthy talk on the subject.

Among your many correspondents are some of the highest minds of America, and the dear old Progressive Thinker is progressing and growing gloriously. We could not get along without its fearless sheet. Long may it wave!

As the storm in the heavens is clearing away, so may selfishness, envy, malice, jealousy and bigotry be crushed from the mental visions of those who pretend to follow in the footsteps of their Jesus, who died on the cross to save them from that galaxy of sins. How beautiful, how celestial, how divine to realize that the reincarnation of the Most High has been upon earth, and left a shining light for all to follow. The valuable books that I notice on your list are very alluring to my mind and heart, and I trust that in the near future I will avail myself of some of the richest literature you now offer to your readers.

With the kindest wishes to you all, I remain as ever,

"Science and the Future Life." By James H. Hyslop, is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. Price, cloth, $1.50. 10 cents postage extra.

"How to Train Children and Parents." Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying this little book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

Prayer; Its Uselessness and Unscientific Assumption. By Henry M. Taber. Price 10 cents.

GOD.

Some Trenchant Reflections Thereon.

To the Editor:—Of all the words juggled with by man, the word God has been the most used, the most abused, and the least understood.

So far as man's knowledge of God is concerned, he has none whatever, and never had, for any God, in fact, is just as utterly inconceivable as time and space.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll had the whole thing in a nutshell when he trenchantly said: "To endeavor to explain the mystery of the Universe by the mystery of God, you do not even exchange mysteries—you make one more. The mystery of man cannot be explained by the mystery of GOD. That mystery—still asks for explanation."

To all that has been said and written to prove the existence of God, there is, there can be only one answer—"Words, Words, WORDS!

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
OR
Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Concentration

the Key to Victory

A Practical Sermon, Delivered in Schmidt's Hall, Washington, D. C., January 28, 1907, by Alfred H. Terry.

"There is almost no limit to your power. You can bring beautiful conditions around you, to-day. You are a spirit, and all the harmony in the spiritual universe is in harmony with your soul. The brilliant light of divinity is within you. The kingdom of heaven is within you. There are a thousand chords of music vibrating around you; lift yourselves into their atmosphere. You are the player, Life the instrument. Play only good tunes. Strike no discords. Let life be a beautiful chord, sounding and resounding through the corridors of the Infinite. Your life to-morrow will be stronger than it is to-day. Each day is one step higher in the divine ladder of progression. Be illumined with the radiance of the Divine, realizing that your life is a divine entity, eternal in the past as in the future. There is life before you and life behind you, in one great unending chain. There is no evil but ignorance, and as the sun melts the fogs of earth, so the sun of spirituality dawns upon us, while gods and guardians and angels forever light and lead us to the world above."

What a spirit of unrest pervades the world to-day, with its life, its hurry and bustle. No matter where we go, we find even the persons we meet on the street with faces tense and anxious, revealing that their minds are clouded with worrying thoughts; every face is imprinted with a care, or some desire that is not satisfied.

There is no peace on the mortal plane.

All are rushing on, on, to reach some particular goal which the spirit has in mind.

As the leaves of the forest in autumn, which the wind blows hither and thither, so are mortals, swayed here and there with little thought of the life to come; and yet they wonder why they do not reach the highest unfoldment, which in youth they longed for. Never for one instant do they allow themselves to think. Their worries hold them as the hypnotist holds the mind of his subject, and thus they hinder themselves from radiating the brightness that is their own by divine birthright. Like a flower which has been covered from the light, when uncovered we find—the leaves turned white and all expression of a divine principle gone. Thus we keep ourselves all covered up with the debris of materiality.

The spark of divinity sleeps in us all. But to bring it forth into expression, we must go into the silence. We must concentrate to gain release from all that holds us down. Concentration is a wonderful power, one which in childhood is practiced, and therefore should be natural to us. See the child with its doll, having no thought or feeling for anything else. It is difficult to divert its attention, and if turned for a moment, how quickly thought returns to the object of its concentration; but when we leave childhood behind, the ability to concentrate seems a thing of the past, yet it should be natural to us all. It is something for us to grow back to, instead of something new for us to acquire. We have lost it and must regain it. It is a bright jewel, and by finding it and polishing its surface, our life will become the power it should be. But very few people can concentrate or focus the mind steadily on one thing in one direction. The trials and cares of life and the hundred and one impressions the mind has received have frittered it away. They have utterly lost control of their own mind, and thus get nervous and irritable.

Much of the nervousness in the world comes from lack of concentration. If we take our duties as they come, and concentrate upon them, one at a time, victory will be assured. To play a beautiful piece of music we must first concentrate upon scales which are very uninteresting, but when we have perfect control of them, we can master the most difficult composition. If we cannot concentrate on a little thing, we cannot on a large matter. When we learn to focus steadily, we will have no weak habits. The mind will so enjoy its duties, it cannot express itself otherwise than excellently. We will not worry, because we will have no time to worry. So much might be won if we did not lose energy by worrying about the future. Concentration leads to success in all branches of life; there is no goal which can be reached without it.

Men in the stock market concentrate to carry the market before them, but we are not working to make millions, to corner the market. We are striving to illumine ourselves, to find out why we are here, what we are here for, and where we are going. This is the most important thing. It should always stand before us as a flaming torch. Money does not bring happiness. It is in circulation; we need it to live, but not to hoard, to worry us night and day. Money makes slaves of its possessors. The dollar is a mighty god. If you worship it, you will become its slave. Make it instead your servant—care nothing for it, and the grander, broader your life will become. In your business, work for the good it will do, and thus receive good yourself. If you are only keeping a corner grocery store, keep only the best and purest foods, and pay your employes well; that's what we are here for, do all the good we can.

We are here also to gain experience. We all have our troubles and these sorrows give us larger opportunities. For through the vibrations of sorrow, pain and anxiety, that our own spirit knows, we can more intelligently sympathize with others. If we have never suffered, we cannot understand the pain of another. Only the soul that sorrows can realize the sufferings of humanity, and thus reach out with all its power to alleviate the same. Life is like a tangled thread because so entwined with the threads of other lives. Every mortal may attain that which any mortal has ever won! every triumph is ours to reach. We do not want to go hence with a spotted soul, but with the record of a pure life and a work well done.

Every thought we breathe forth here leaves an imprint on the soul. Mind is the power behind the throne, ever giving us encouragement, ever reaching our consciousness with the message, "Go on, the world is yours, hesitate not, falter not. Improve every opportunity." Look only for good. Refuse to see the bad. Look for the beauty in everything, from the grass at your feet to the thoughts of love and inspiration from friends and angels, from the stars themselves that burn above you, that sing glorious melodies to you. Nothing can chain the mind. Though the physical body is in a dungeon cell, the concentrated mind is always free. Hold it not back with thoughts that you cannot succeed. The call of your own soul, that star which shines above this cobweb of life, beckons you on.

The clay is in your hand. You can make a statue or a worthless image. It is within your power to make a work of art. Then often seek the silence, where all worldly conditions are annulled, all opposing influences withdrawn, and feel freedom and peace steal over you. Let go of the physical body for a few minutes, and realize the divine life that is before you and behind and above you. Bathe in that ether from the sphere of Spirit. Demand from it all that you desire. In the silence, you can thrill with the vibration of the thoughts of the angels. Only a few moments in the silence changes all conditions, so that you can look through the eyes of the spirit, and not through the glasses of the flesh. Then every day, if only for a few minutes, take the time for silent concentration, and you will go thence out into the world, stronger, sweeter, with all the jealousy, envy and hatred which may have stirred the soul, vanished.

We are the makers of our life, and life will be as we make it. If it is not bright and beautiful, it is often our own fault. Remember if your life is dark, other lives are dark too. Do not be discouraged with yourself. You are placed here to do a work, and are the controller of this work, and by the power of concentration, you can bring forth grand results.

There is almost no limit to your power. You can bring beautiful conditions around you, to-day. You are a spirit, and all the harmony in the spiritual universe is in harmony with your soul. The brilliant light of divinity is within you. The kingdom of heaven is within you. There are a thousand chords of music vibrating around you; lift yourselves into their atmosphere. You are the player, Life the instrument. Play only good tunes. Strike no discords. Let life be a beautiful chord, sounding and resounding through the corridors of the Infinite. Your life to-morrow will be stronger than it is to-day. Each day is one step higher in the great ladder of progression. Be illumined with the radiance of the Divine, realizing that your life is a divine entity, enternal in the past as in the future. There is life before you and life behind you, in one great unending chain. There is no evil but ignorance, and as the sun melts the fogs of earth, so the sun of spirituality dawns upon us, while gods and guardians and angels forever light and lead us to the world above.

We need not envy the spirits for being out of the body for we are not disconnected with the spirit world ourselves. Life itself is a riddle, and our being held here on the physical plane does not prevent our thoughts from sweeping the universe of planets, worlds and suns. By practicing self-control, we can rise to a great height. Self-control, which every mortal lacks, is the secret of spiritual growth. We must acquire it here, or it will not be ours to exercise after we leave the body. There are as many spirits in darkness now as there are mortals, through lack of self-control. Temper is an agency which destroys us, afflicting the person who indulges in it far more than the one toward whom it is directed. We must reach the stage where we do not mind whatever comes. None of these things move us. All difficulties are conquered by self-control.

Fear not for the future. Look not so far ahead in the distance, but look to the present, for it is the present always. In one sense of the word there is no future. It is in the present that we have to think and work, we waste so much power by worrying over what may come into our lives. In the mind's happiest moments the black phantom of the future suggests and reminds us that we have got to die. Even at the banquet, or perhaps the opera, that thought arises. But you are a spiritual being. YOU ARE SOMETHING DEATH CAN NEVER TOUCH.

Everything is an expression of spirit. Spirit is all in all. The light shines ever within you. Let it forth. Above the spirit is the soul trying to express itself. Your mind is leading you ever toward the Infinite Good. Remember the present moment is the most important of all. The present is here, and with it are beautiful harmonies and brilliant opportunities. Learn to appropriate them. Use all your power to concentrate upon today. The greatest solace the spirit can have is victory. We are all being crowned. Every hour which is well used, crowns us. Even if the work is very trifling, of little value, if it is done well, it brings joy to the spirit.

Yearn within your souls for the Light. Demand it. There is the bright, glorious sun; it shines for you. The flowers in the meadow, unfolding their petals, and perfuming the air with their fragrant blossoms, they unfold for you. When darkness comes and all the bright stars shine forth, they shine for you, and the mighty moon, reflecting the light of the sun, it gives back that light for you; and yet man questions if there is a God, and doubts his own immortality. Lift yourself above such doubts, for what you are thinking now will make your life one thousand years from now. Success is yours, failure is yours. Learn how to play the game of life. Would any one attempt to play chess who knew nothing about the game, who couldn't tell a knight from a castle, where on the board he is, or what his move should be? And yet you attempt the game of life. You accept advice and suggestion from one mind and another, and yet cannot tell where your life belongs in this great game of life.

If you question your own soul, it will tell you what no one else can. Draw near to your own soul, and higher voices will speak and illumine your path and your work. All the wisdom of the universe is for you to read, the answers to all the secrets of the ages are all yours, if you seek them. Unhinge the mind from the material things of the world and it will connect itself with the Infinite Mind; and take good care of its instrument—the body. How expect it to give forth melody in the world if it is out of tune? The body should be a harmonious expression of spiritual life. A sound free mind has a sound free body. When diseases receive no sympathy, they will flee away.

Keep in touch with the Divine Spirit. As the caged animals are under such perfect control of their trainer that they forget their power and strength, so we place our spirits behind the bars of limitation and forget our power; we do not realize our strength. When the windows of your soul have opened to the Eternal Light, it will radiate from your eyes, from your voice, and you will breathe forth music wherever you go. No barrier in the world can prevent your progression, therefore take heart. Be not daunted. Fear not. Take the Star of Truth as your guide. Keep your aim high. Go on and on, and victory shall be yours.

A short time ago, at the Christmas tide, our hearts were attuned to the Great Ideal, to that glorious Soul who had reached the state of perfection we are striving to attain. He represents that which we can reach if we will. The ideal slumbers within us all, as the beautiful image sleeps in the slab of marble. The sculptor brings forth from the marble the beautiful figure. The figure was there, for he placed it there. It was his ideal. So we are sculptors who must bring the soul to the surface, for back of us all is the soul, striving to reach expression. We are all unfolding. The image is coming out very slowly as the years roll by. Every year brings us nearer our ideal. It is being realized. Only by progression can we attain it. The Ideal rests in spirit. Then concentrate upon the Ideal. We can only realize our strength when we have a chance to try it. Faith is the guiding star. It should shine in our zenith always; faith in all good, faith in mankind, faith in ourselves and faith in God.

What is prayer? It is concentrated thought, which harmonizes us. When we aspire, we forget self. If we pray for selfish things, or for things we do not need, our prayers will not be answered. The prayer that does the most good to self is when we forget self and pray for others, with that universal love that burns within us, burns forth to expression. We are a part of that Mighty Fire which rules the universe. It is a part of us and a part of God; and when we bring encouraging words, like sunbeams, into people's lives, we add fuel, and kindling wood to that Divine Flame. Then bring forth light and beauty in other lives as in your own. Man is the instrument through which God manifests to man. Yet look not for reward here and now. When one is constantly giving out to others of love and service, he may never have it returned to him on that plane. His recompense must come in a spiritual baptism, from a plane above that which he has labored upon and controlled.

In spite of all the shadow which today stands in the foreground of the world, Life is radiating the Eternal Good, the world is growing better. If we have made mistakes, the soul is still taking its steps upward, emerging from the shadow, ripened by all its experiences while in the darkness. Just as the seed emerges from its sleep in the darkness, amid the dirt and the worms, so the soul while growing in the gloom, is gathering power and strength, to give forth its true beauty, color and fragrance. The Divine Artist is touching us all with our natural, spiritual color.

We walk into a garden at midnight. It may be full of flowers. We can only detect them by their fragrance, or an occasional white one may gleam out, but the others are invisible; yet the flowers are there just the same. Would you question in the darkness, the existence of the flowers because you cannot see them? Do you doubt the existence of your own soul because you cannot see it? Shall we doubt the Light which illumines our conscience? Do we doubt the spiritual influences which manifest through us, because we cannot see them? We cannot see the mind or our own spirits, only their effects; yet we are images of the living God, and above this shadowy existence the world of spirit stands superb in all its glory and perfection. From thence the divine spirit of inspiration touches our minds.

Spiritual life is a life that can be lived right here. This existence is a grand experience for the soul. If we did not need it, if we were already perfect, we would not be here; the very need of such experience brings us here. Life need not be a continual sorrow, and if we learn our lessons rightly to this point, then the way will be clear and bright and strong. If we carve off a sharp edge of our nature here, round off some angle of disposition there, we are building a spiritual grandeur, through which character will be revealed, clear-cut as a cameo. Let us be one grand reflection of the Light above; let our breath be as music, our thoughts as harp-strings that angel fingers may touch, our footsteps treading the pathway of Power and Goodness.

The Light which shines through our own mind may become a search-light to illumine our pathway ahead. Our thought molds us. We are all built by thought. Then think only good thoughts; seek the good, respond to all the goodness and beauty in the world, the world above as well as below. Let thought soar to the majesty of suns. A pessimistic thought takes us away from the sunshine into the caves of life. Admire the power which placed us here. Every loving thought is a stepping stone. Love all you can. You cannot give too much love. Then help on your brother, lift him into the Divine Love. You and he are a part of it all. You will stifle all the Divine within you if you suffocate a good impulse. Give forth every good thought which burns within you. Find the beauty in life, the divine everywhere. All the wealth of the world cannot give you inspiration. Inspiration comes from God. Let our thoughts drift backward into the Infinite. Let us get closer home, nearer to the land of our hearts. We are simply at school, learning lessons that will enable us to enter the eternal realm. And concentration in our life action will prove in our hand, a torch, to illumine our way, our mind, our spirit, our soul, enabling us to realize that we are one with God, that Life is eternal, and that we are walking on toward the glories of the eternal life which awaits us.

THE BEAUTIFUL LAND.

There's a beautiful land near a shining strand,
And its glories can never be guessed,
'Tis the land where our loved ones are waiting for us—
The beautiful land of the blest.

O'er its beautiful rivers, and valleys, and hills
Shines a light that streams down from love's throne,
And no one is sad in that beautiful land,
Or weary, or weeping, or lone.

For Love is the light of that beautiful land—
A love that can never decay—
It speaks to the soul with a rhythm sublime—
And nothing can take it away.

On the beautiful hills of that beautiful land
Are mansions most wondrously fair,
And the dear ones who live in those heavenly homes
Feel never a sorrow or care.

And beautiful music floats in from the spheres
With a rhythm so sweet and so low,
And flowers their fragrance sent out on the breeze
As it sweeps from the valleys below.

Oh, would you but know of your beautiful ones
Who live in the light there above?
Then call to them over the beautiful bridge
They have built from your thoughts of love. ALICE C. BARRY.

TIMELY ACTION.

Protest of the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation Against the Bill of the Woman's Educational Union, to Have Their Book Entitled, "Readings From the Bible" Introduced Into the Public Schools of Illinois.

On page 5 of this book occurs this hypocritical and untruthful statement by their Editorial Committee: "Never aggressive, never thrusting their own religious convictions on others."

Yet, these women are attempting to have the Legislature pass a bill to enforce the reading of their book of "Selections from the Bible" before the children in the Public Schools of Illinois.

This attempt to have religious exercises or Bible readings in our Public Schools is a flagrant evasion of a well known principle, which underlies the Constitution of the United States and of all the States, with reference to the question of religion, in which there is an express provision against the donation of any public money for any such purpose.

We would call your attention to Section twelve, Article Fifteen, of the School Laws of Illinois, which provides as follows:

"No County, City, town, township, school district, or other public corporation, shall ever make any appropriation or pay from any school fund whatever, anything in aid of any Church or sectarian purpose, or to help or support or sustain any school, academy, seminary, college, university or other literary or scientific institution, controlled by any Church or sectarian denomination, whatever; nor shall any grant or donation of money or other personal property, ever be made by any such corporation to any Church or any sectarian purpose; and any officer or other person having under his charge and direction, school funds or property, who shall pervert the same in the manner forbidden in this section, shall be liable to indictment, and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not less than double the value of the property so perverted, and imprisoned in the County jail not less than one (1) nor more than twelve (12) months at the discretion of the Court."

This has been the law in this State for many years and clearly bars out all religious teachings, whether of the Jewish, Christian, Mohammedan or Mormon Sects.

Yet, in defiance of the Constitution of the State that no public money shall ever be used for religious teaching, as also the above quoted school law of Illinois, these women make the hypocritical claim that it is in the interest of morality, when this book in its preface states over and over again that it is religious teaching that they want introduced into the public schools and force our children to listen to and "Chant in Unison" the absurd doggerel, which is the chief contents of the book.

We give a few specimens: On page 33 under the heading, "The King of Glory;" we find: "Who is the King of Glory? The Lord strong and mighty, The Lord mighty in battle. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in. Who is the King of Glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the king of Glory." To find how strong and mighty, the Lord of Hosts is, be sure and get a Bible and look up (Malachi Chap. 2, v. 2, 3), and see the strength of his threats.

On page 106, we find: "Let every soul be subject to the Higher powers. For there is no power but of God; and the powers that be are ordained of God."

Why teach this lie to innocent children, when they know full well that the powers that be are elected by the people?

On page 149 of this book we find: (Being part of the 18th Psalm).

"In my distress, I called upon the Lord,
And cried unto God.
He heard my voice out of his temple,
And my cry came before him, even into his ears.
Then the earth shook and trembled;
The foundation also of the hills moved
And were shaken, because he was wroth.
There went up smoke out of his nostrils,
And fire out of his mouth devoured;
Coals were kindled by it.
He bowed the heavens also, and came down,
And darkness was under his feet.
And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly;
Yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.
He made darkness his secret place;
The Lord also thundered in the heavens,
And the highest heard his voice,
Hail stones and coals of fire.
At thy rebuke, O Lord,
At the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.
He sent from above, he took me,
He drew me out of many waters.
And by my God have I leaped over a wall."

Can a thoughtful man be found who wishes his children to muddle their brains and waste their time reading or "Chanting in Unison" this unmeaning balderdash, given them under the false pretense of moral education?

MY QUEEN.

[Dedicated to Mrs. Alice D. Green, Hamilton, Ill.]

I know a queen, an uncrowned queen,
More bright, more pure, more fair,
Than queens of past and present time,
In jeweled crowns so rare.
Her subjects come at faintest call,
And bow the willing knee,
Each one lets words of homage fall,
In sweet sincerity.

Her subjects all are ruled by love,
By silken cords they're led,
They strive to please the great fond heart,
By whom their souls are fed.
To be a subject of my queen,
Be noble, brave and pure,
And you will surely gain her love,
Then rest from storms secure.

Her great fond heart a haven is,
To downcast and forlorn,
And sheltered in that great fond heart,
They wait the coming morn.
A great white, flaming star she shines,
Athwart the moonlit sky,
A leading and a guiding light,
To the sphere so grand and high.

Oh! pure white soul, Oh! queen divine,
In golden after-time,
When thou dost tread the purple mists,
In the highest golden clime,
May I still claim thy saving power,
May'st thou still hold my hand,
When we have gained the jeweled streets
Of the golden After-land.

Who Wrote This Wonderful MYSTERIOUS BOOK?

Tells of Startling Secrets Jealously Guarded for Ages by Adepts.

Reveals the Marvelous Effects Produced in the Minds and Bodies of Sick and Unsuccessful People Through the Use of a Strange Force That Has Been Overlooked by the Public for Centuries Past.

Shows in Simple Language and Vivid Pictures How Men and Women May Cure Diseases and Habits as if by Magic and Wield a Powerful Influence Over the Minds and Lives of Others.

Why Some Succeed Where Others Fail.

Peculiar Arrangement by Which 100,000 Copies Are to Be Given Away by Mail—Absolutely Free.

A room filled with copies of a strange and mysterious book that contains startling and almost unbelievable evidence of psychic achievements is on exhibition at an institution in New York City. Copies of it have been read with amazement; speculation is rife among the author's friends as to who wrote it; some contend that no mind of his age could describe the possibilities of these carefully guarded systems of the wise old sages and secretive psychic adepts in such simple language and wonderful photographs.

Professor Frederick T. McIntyre, who claims authorship of the work, offers to send a copy free to any person who will, in his own handwriting, send the following peculiar lines to him:

"I want power of mind,
Force and strength in look,
If my writing is satisfactory
Please send me the book."

Professor McIntyre says that he can tell by examining the specimens of handwriting he receives just what the one who penned them is best fitted for in life; what the writer's strong and weak characteristics are, and whether the writer will succeed in using to advantage the many powerful systems of personal influence and healing described in the book. Should the writer be sick or run down physically or mentally, and give the particulars of the trouble in a letter, Professor McIntyre claims he can tell what to do to get well quickly. He does not wish to send this book to any person who would use the system of personal control for any other than honorable purposes free. Like Andrew Carnegie, he believes in the distribution of valuable books.

This book is full of startling explanations and strange pictures proving that any one can master, in a short time, the power to control and sway the minds of others. It describes the strange phenomena of Psychic and Hypnotic Influence; Mystic Healing; Psycho and Suggestive Therapeutics; Personal magnetism, and a combined, simple system of reading the characters of others, though thousands of miles away. It gives you the key to the development of the inner or dormant forces of concentration, force of character, will power, memory, determination, ambition, enthusiasm inspiration, continuity of thought and the ability to throw off the evil effects of diseases and habits through an inner, subjective power, as the Hindoos banish disease and despondency.

It is, indeed, one of the most amazingly interesting books of the age, beaming with interest from cover to cover, and all who receive free copies of it can be thankful. It points out the road to financial and social success; it reveals astonishing facts that have been eagerly sought by the public for many years; proofs that almost carry one back to the days of great miracles.

If you wish a free copy of this wonderful book sit down and write the above verse and send it to Professor F. T. McIntyre, Dept. 1220, No. 126 West Thirty-fourth street, New York, N. Y.

All who write will receive it; no one will be disappointed; it will be sent by mail, postage paid and absolutely free.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

FROM INDIA TO THE PLANET MARS.

A MOST REMARKABLE WORK.

Fascinating, Interesting and Instructive.

By Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva.

"This is an account of the experiments with the 'Geneva Medium,' Helene Smith. In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian princess and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price, $1.50.

The Nemesis of Chautauqua Lake This fascinating Book by the well-known Author and Scholar, HON. A. B. RICHMOND, Should be in the hands of every Spiritualist in the land. It is based on a historical fact, but through the narative is woven a psychic line of thought in the style so natural to the great criminal lawyer that one can feel the author's very presence during its perusal. It is certainly interesting. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

Spencer on Faith and Reason.

Dr. A. A. Bell, of Madison, Ga., who does his own thinking, and has the ability to tell what he knows to others, writes thusly in regard to that grand philosopher, Herbert Spencer, who probably one of the most profound thinkers of the age, lately deceased. Writes Dr. Bell:

"Herbert Spencer, in his autobiography, referring to his twentieth year, wrote:

"'Criticism had not yet shown me how astonishing is the supposition that the Cause from which have arisen thirty millions of suns with their attendant planets, took the form of a man, and made a bargain with Abraham to give him territory for allegiance.

"'I had not at that time repudiated the notion of a deity, who is pleased with the singing of his praises and angry with the infinitesimal beings he has made when they fail to tell him perpetually of his greatness.

"'It had not become manifest to me how absolutely and immeasurably unjust it would be that for Adam's disobedience (which might have caused a harsh man to discharge his servant) all Adam's guiltless descendants should be damned, with the exception of a relatively few who accepted the plan of salvation which the immense majority never heard of.

"'Nor had I in those days perceived the astonishing nature of the Creed which offers for profoundest worship a Being who calmly looks on while myriads of his creatures are suffering eternal torments.

"'But, though definite propositions of this kind had not arisen in me, it is probable the dim consciousness out of which they eventually emerged produced alienation from the established beliefs and observances.'

"The above is copied from the Freethinker, London, June issue, 1906. If the reasoning is not sound in this article I would like some clergyman or theologian to point it out.

"Is it not strange that Christians will insist upon the worshiping of a God who has built a hell of awful torments in which to punish his creatures for the crime of unbelief? (Mark xvi: 15-19.) And that to all eternity!

"I must insist upon asking what joy can come to a God from whom "thirty millions of suns have arisen," and what possible good will come to the individuals—perhaps my father, sister, or my dear mother—to punish their souls for thousands of years, or even one week, after their death?

"How in the name of love and mercy can intelligent men and women worship a being who will consign their children, the darlings of their bosoms, to everlasting torment for the disobedience of Adam, and uphold such a superstition, although encouraged by bishops and doctors of divinity, is astonishing.

"And what is still more astounding, the believers in this horrible doctrine, including bishops, editors and doctors of divinity, stand ready to denounce and persecute those who repudiate the creeds of the churches, as lately evinced in the case of Dr. Crapsey.

"Such a condition of the mind can be accounted for only upon the theory of its being a disease of obsession—a disorder which should engage the attention of the state authorities. I mean a commission should be appointed to investigate its pathology."

Pointed.

Numerous quotations from preachers and Christian journalists have appeared in these columns, showing the church has had its day, and that the institution is in a rapid decline. The Truth Seeker, in closing a vigorous article on "Sabbatarian Cant," leads all in forceful expression in the same direction. The editor says:

"The theological car is rolling down hill rapidly, and the attempt to revive outgrown Sunday laws on any pretext, is putting a big stone in the road. But the ultimate result will be to damage the car, let us hope beyond repair."

There is one consolation; in these days of books, magazines and newspapers, everybody is able to read them, and the law no longer compels attendance on priestly service at church, so we can remain at home all day Sunday and grow wiser by reading. Our ancestors were not thus favored.

The Seed Fell on Good Ground.

Judge W. Grablackoff visited the exposition at St. Louis, as representative of his country, the ancient kingdom of Bulgaria. His home was in Sophia, one of the oldest of cities. Of all the new ideas and treasures of the western world he carried home with him, one was destined to bear most abundant fruitage.

Some one who had the interests of Spiritualism at heart, and seeking what he could do to best serve it, thought of the scheme to give the more distinguished foreign commissioners and officials, each a copy of "The Arcana of Spiritualism," by Hudson Tuttle. Judge Grablackoff was one to receive the book. On his journey home he made it a study, and became awakened to the grandeur of the philosophy of Spiritualism. Before he reached home he had thought out a course of action, which on arriving he at once began. Bulgaria is impoverished by Turkish rule, wars and oppressive taxation, heading apathy to higher spiritual wants. He could not extend the doctrines which filled his soul with joy by publishing a paper, the ready resort of every one who has or thinks he has, something to teach in this country, for his countrymen were not habitual readers, and had not the money to pay subscriptions. He had no means to give them translations as he desired.

There was one way, easy and without great cost. He organized a society, as the parental source from which others could be formed in all the important towns of his country. The subject was new, for there was not a Spiritualist or medium known as such at that time in all Bulgaria. But there was a strong influence over the minds of the most intelligent, like a wave from the spirit side. The society's meetings were profitable in instruction from the start. Portions of "The Arcana of Spiritualism were translated into the Bulgarian tongue, and read at the sessions, explained and discussed. Mediumship began to be manifested. The cause is extending with astonishing strides. Now Judge Grablackoff has written and published a book on "The Spiritual Wonders," in the Bulgarian language. It is the first printed in that tongue. The demand for such literature has grown, and become so insistent that the author felt warranted in this undertaking.

Miracles.

Asked the other day by a good Christian friend, what we thought of the miracles of Jesus, as proof of his divinity, we replied: They were insignificant affairs compared with miracles related of other avatars. Indeed there is one told in your Bible of Joshua, who was never claimed as a God, which excels in grandeur all other Munchausens. He commanded the sun to stand still, and the holy record says, it did so, "and hastened not to go down for about a whole day." That must be conceded the grandest feat in all the ages. Nothing has ever equaled it, and never will. A God could not repeat the act without convulsing the solar system, and probably deranging the entire machinery of the universe. Says Pope:

"One step broken, the great scale's destroyed."

That was a miracle to boast of.

That little affair told of Chrishna, who lifted a mountain, and held it as an umbrella to protect the milking girls from the rain, bears no comparison to the grander feat of Joshua, though Chrishna, too, was a god, if we can trust Oriental literature. He was the eighth in the series of Indian gods, and they all worked miracles in proof of their divinity, as did all the minor gods and goddesses of Greece and Rome. Old Hercules performed a dozen marvelous feats which make his name immortal.

Jesus sending a disciple to catch a fish, and take money from its mouth to pay his taxes, Matt. 17:27; his conversion of water into wine; and his feeding five thousand with five loaves and two fishes, with twelve baskets of fragments left, were brilliant displays of power, we were about to say, if trustworthy; but as the preachers vouch for their genuineness, we shall not controvert their claim.

"I won't talk with you," said our friend.

"Well, then, you will miss some valuable facts in this connection." And thus the seance closed.

A Strange Concession.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, in his published sermons, Vol. II, p. 309, makes the following statement, which we copy verbatim:

"After all that has been so plausibly written concerning the 'innate idea of God,' after all that has been said of its being common to all men, in all ages and nations, it does not appear that man has naturally any more idea of God than any of the beasts of the field. He has no knowledge of God at all; neither is God in all his thoughts. Whatever change may afterward be wrought—whether by the grace of God, or by his own reflection, or by education—HE IS, BY NATURE, A MERE ATHEIST."

Many a pulpit discourse have we listened to in which was the burden to prove that "God in his wisdom has left evidence of himself among all nations and all peoples, and that it was human folly to repudiate that evidence; but here is the positive statement of one of the ablest of his sect, that "man, by nature, is a mere atheist."

Churchmen are in the habit of holding up to contempt those who are brave enough to give expression to their honest convictions on this subject. They who wish to denounce some one, for holding an opinion adverse to their own, should begin and end their vituporative utterances by heaping all of them on the head and memory of Rev. John Wesley.

Incontrovertible Facts.

The loss of natural sleep, during which repairs are made of broken down and worn out tissues, entails risk of health, mind and life. All physiologists and practitioners of medicine know, that reversing the order of nature—laboring nights and sleeping days—entails a break-down and destruction of the nervous system, and insures a lingering death. It is the violation of law inherent in animal life and cannot be trifled with with impunity. Recuperation is possible if the habit has not been too long protracted.

Here, then, is positive proof that nights, not days, were designed for rest and the restoration of wasted energies.

There are no such facts in favor of a rest day. Reasonable hours of labor each day, with no excess, the nights not wasted in gluttony, intemperance or debauchery, but given to repose, then health, contentment and general prosperity will become universal. One-seventh of all the days filched from honest industry, in violation of natural law, in the interest of a worthless priesthood, to teach the fables of a corrupt and corrupting hierarchy, should be suppressed by repressive legislation.

Tried to Blow Up a War Cloud.

The sensational press was late exploiting a war between the United States and Japan. If its reports had been credited we could have expected to hear any day that the Philippine Islands, Guam and the Hawaiian Islands had been captured, and the Japanese war ships were advancing on our cities on the Pacific coast.

Was it the motive of these war-predicting papers to incite discord between the two nations? More likely it was to influence Congress to appropriate a few hundred additional millions to be expended in increasing the army and enlarging the navy.

The truth is, there has been no thought of war on the part of either nation. A trifling question arose between the two powers, a subject for international negotiation, and this, we are glad to learn has been satisfactorily adjusted.

The Truth in a Nutshell.

The Truth Seeker gives as the reason for the decline in Christianity—

"People can no longer be scared as they once were."

The fact is, so many scientists have been sent to hell by the clergy those there have combined their genius, put out the principal fires, and converted the country down there into a lovely summer resort.

Franklin, with his kite, managed to steal lightning from heaven. Others hitched it to the car of progress. Morse spanned the "great gulf between you and us" with a wire, and telephoned Peter of the good things coming; while Thomas Paine, the inventor of iron bridges, as well Republics, at last advices was bridging the points in Satan's empire, where the fire is not yet extinguished. Others are vitalizing the remaining heat for mechanical purposes, and are retaining some of the hottest places in which to fry the clergy who manage to escape the monotony of heaven and stealthily reach this modernized retreat.

A proposition was made to establish a trolley car line across the gulf to heaven, but the wiser ones were fearful of an invasion of idiots, infants and preachers, who, it was said, were the principal residents of heaven, and the only ones who could look across the intervening space, and exult at the miseries, as they supposed, of the damned.

How Is This?

In place of a creed, Latin credo—I believe, how would it do to substitute one of knowledge, taking the Mohammedan assertion as to a God for authority?

"God is God, and there is no God but God," and man's only savior is worthy action. An immortal life is an inference of nature, confirmed by spirit revelation.

Miracles in support of creeds are but fiction, creatures of ignorance and unreasoning faith. The magnitude of a miracle is contingent on the ability of the relator, and its acceptance as a truth depends on the credulity of the one to whom it is told.

Not Compelled to Worship.

At an Ohio military post, Major Glenn in command, an order was issued to a sergeant to take a part of the command to religious services, and attend on the same in person. The order was obeyed so far as taking the soldiers to church was concerned, but the sergeant refused to enter. For this act of insubordination the non-commissioned officer was placed under arrest.

The case being referred to the authorities at Washington, it was ruled, "hereafter officers in command shall not compel men to attend church for religious worship."

Such an unwise order enforced, only the most bigoted orthodox churchmen would enter the military service.

Not Good Teaching.

A pastor of a Christian church in New York is reported to have insisted that boxing, billiards, dancing, card-playing, and other harmless amusements should be taught in churches. Probably the dominie saw the nearest route to heaven was along these lines. Well, on February 5, in that pastor's church in New York a dear brother received a blow in a boxing match, which ended his life soon after. Who was responsible for that life? Churchmen are found who commend anything that puts money in the treasury from which they draw their salaries.

SOME EXPERIENCES THAT HAVE MYSTIFIED

Gets Advance Information in His Sleep

In 1893 I was employed by the Wabash railroad as telegraph operator; at this particular time I was on the extra list and working as night operator at Antwerp, O. About 2 o'clock one morning, while awaiting the arrival of an east-bound freight, I became exceedingly drowsy, and leaning over on the desk immediately fell into a deep sleep, which lasted not more than a minute or two.

While in this condition I dreamed—don't know what else to call it—that it was about 8 a. m., that I had returned to the office and was endeavoring to take a telegram, but for some reason or other was unable to read the dots and dashes, so the day operator sat down to the instrument and copied the message, which was addressed to me and stated that I was to return to Okolona (my home station) at once, until needed elsewhere.

This dream was so real, so vivid, that I awoke with a start and for the rest of the night I was positively nervous and much disturbed over the affair, not that there was anything out of the ordinary about the telegram, but by reason of the weird, unexplainable, peculiar nature of the dream.

At 9 a. m. I went to bed and before noon that same morning a messenger came to my room and handed me the following telegram:

Peru. Ind., Oct. 28, 1893. Filed 10:25 a. m.

To H. H. B.:

Mr Marcombe will relieve you at Antwerp to-night. You may return to Okolona until needed elsewhere. Pass on No. 46. J. J. S.

The above message, while not written or filed until 10:25 a. m., or eight hours after my dream, was identically the same as the one I saw in the "vision." H. H. B.

Sees a Ghost in Flat Above; Had to Move.

There were three of us sisters living in San Francisco, and in a flat on Bush street two of us saw a ghost, or thought we did. It was a two story flat, the upper rooms being unfurnished, and it was there the shade walked. One night at midnight the rumbling and rattling and banging in the empty rooms above roused everybody. I ran from the room I occupied with one sister to my sister at the front of the flat, looking up as I raced along through the doorless arch leading to the upper story, and I distinctly saw the figure of a woman in white sharply outlined against a window, and so vivid was the impression that I noted her hair hung loosely.

My sister followed me, the rumbling and rattling still continuing, but finally ceasing. Returning I again looked for the ghostly woman, but she was gone. I said nothing to anyone, but at breakfast my sister exactly described the woman with flowing hair. She also had seen it. Well, we thought it was a ghost, for always our search showed rooms thick with undisturbed dust and empty.

I don't know if the ghost continued nightly to walk. We never looked, but the terrifying rumbling still keeping up, it got on our nerves, and we moved. Later we heard that a murder had been committed at that number, and six months after a morning paper reported a suicide at the place. But the ghost can no longer walk—it was burnt out—the earthquake utterly destroying our uncanny flat. D. M.

Son Dies Just as He Had Dreamed.

In the year 1822 my grandfather's oldest son left Yale college determined to continue his studies at Oxford, England. Indeed, he checked his trunk as far as Boston, and then returned to his Connecticut home to tell of his decision and get means to carry out his plans.

My grandfather had other sons and daughters and objected to the great expense, although in full sympathy with his son's ambition. The young man made up his mind to teach until he could earn sufficient funds to send himself, and went at once to Baton Rouge, La., and began his labors. Here he suddenly died of yellow fever.

His father dreamed one night that Benjamin had only a half hour to live. When at last, in those days of slow mails, the dread news reached him he found that Benjamin had died on the night of his dream. A. E. B.

Buried Alive; Appears to Her Parents.

When I was 14 years old, in 1872, a terrible epidemic of cholera prevailed in northern Europe. In the portion of Poland snatched by Germany called Oberschlesien (Slonsk), in my native city, Ujest, nearly one-half of the population fell victims to the plague. The hysterical fear of contagion created a municipal order to bury the victims immediately after they ceased to groan and move. I had a cousin, Catherine, an 18-year-old girl, who after a visit to a friend, who succumbed to the plague in her presence, on return home became sick and after a few hours apparently died, and was buried in the churchyard cemetery. Next day, when her parents, Andrew and Hegewich Goiny, were sitting motionless in the despair of their grief in the dining-room, Catherine suddenly entered the room and wringing her hands repeated desperately several times, "Father!" "Father!"

It took nearly half an hour for the old couple to regain their faculties and hasten to the parish priest, Father Anthony Meiser, with the request that he open Catherine's grave. When near the church they met on a run the churchyard gravedigger, Joseph Czech, who told them in excitement that several minutes before, while digging a grave next to that of Catherine's, he hard her crying and calling, "Father! Father!" and hurried to report the accident to the priest.

When they all reached Catherine's grave and by digging opened it she was still warm, her face and fingers terribly bruised and cut—but this time really dead. MRS. P. G.

Forewarned of Danger, Life Is Saved.

Early in the summer of 1894 I was visiting the home of relatives in the town of H. It was proposed, one afternoon, that we visit Sulphur Springs, possibly twelve miles distant. The party consisted of four and an easy riding surrey was used. Nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of the trip to the springs, and a delightful time was spent at the famous resort.

However, before the time arrived to start on the return trip I became nervous, and I had a clear presentiment that something fatal was about to happen. I communicated my fears to the others—only to be met with laughter. Finally, I decided to return on the trolley line. I told them it was unnecessary to meet me at the nearest point on the trolley line, for I would walk home the last half mile.

Imagine, if you can, the news that reached me as I neared home. The surrey, with its three occupants in a joyful mood, was crossing the railway tracks. A freight train had just passed, going north, and they started to cross, not seeing the express rushing towards them on the south-bound track. In a twinkling it was all over, and I too would surely have been numbered with the dead had I occupied a seat in the surrey. P. H.

Dreams of a Check and Gets the Cash.

Late in the summer of 1906, I wrote a short story and sent it to a magazine which sometimes used amateurish stuff like mine. Weeks went on; arrived neither rejection slip nor check; then, in the stress of busy times, the whole matter quite slipped my mind. On the night of October 4, 1906, I dreamed of getting letters and opened one, not seeing whom it was from; out of it fell a yellow slip which I saw to be a check for $6.

The next morning, while preparing breakfast, I told of my vivid dream, but was laughed at and asked why I didn't dream of a "twenty." Soon after letters came—quite a bunch for me.

"Now for the check," my brother teased. The first letter I took up bore a typewritten address and I did not notice where it came from. As I opened it a slip of yellow paper fluttered to the floor; my fingers shook as I opened it and saw that it was a check for $6. The story which I had forgotten was accepted and this was the payment. D. A.

She Whistled to Girl Friend After She Died.

Two girls whom I once knew lived in our quiet neighborhood, and they grew into young womanhood together in one of the most beautiful friendships it has been my good fortune to look upon. These girls were opposites in many of their physical characteristics, but they were inseparable and unfailing companions.

One of them, as she grew to young womanhood, grew noticeably more spiritual and less vigorous of body—"not long for this life," as the neighbors said. Her life was beautiful in the way only such lives can be, but her strength failed and she seemed to fade day by day.

Her companion's grief was, of course, something only to be imagined. To see them together, one would think no cloud obscured their sunshine, for neither ever spoke of what both knew, but the anguish endured by each in silence will never be known.

These two had, since early childhood, made use of a peculiar bird call whistle to call each other in the morning, or at any time, in fact. This call possessed a plaintive falling cadence and a trill, which I have never been able to imitate, nor has any one else who has ever heard it.

The days came, early one fall, when the invalid was obliged to keep her bed. Still the two friends were inseparable, except during their sleeping hours. Then quite late one night after a trying, restless day, the invalid dropped off to sleep, and the faithful but tired companion crept out of the house, across the lawn, and into her own home next door, going straight to her room, where she stretched herself wearily across her bed just as she was and closed her eyes in sleep.

She had not been there ten minutes, it seemed to her, when she was aroused from a sound sleep and sat up straight, intent and listening. What she distinctly heard was the soft bird note and falling cadence of her friend's call to her, perfectly rendered and unmistakable.....

Scarcely believing her ears, the girl crept to her window, which was open, and, looking out upon the gray dawn, she answered the call clearly and distinctly, then held her breath. Again she heard the call come back to her once, then twice, the second time faintly as if from a distance.

The tired watcher could not keep back a weird feeling of something uncanny about the whole thing. As she thought more and more of the circumstances, she was on the point of going back to bed, but, finally following an undefined impulse, she left her own house and stole back over the lawn to that of her friend, and in at the side door to which she always had access. She did not pause until she reached the sick room, then she pushed aside the curtain, and bent closely over the form lying there in the dim light of the lamp. She found it lying quietly, with a beautiful smile upon the lips, which were cold and lifeless. D. E. B.

Hears Voice of Dying Girl Across the Sea.

In the '50s, about 1858, I resided in Rochester, N. Y. We came from England. About that time my mother's brother came from London, intending, if possible, to make a home for his family. One evening we were at the supper table, a jolly, happy family, when suddenly Uncle John fell back in his chair, ghastly pale, and we all jumped to our feet, watching him. His hand raised pointing to the ceiling, and with a look of terror on his face the hand slowly swept across the room. Then he broke down, crying, "Patty is dead."

Patty was his favorite daughter in London.

"She called me as she crossed the room, 'Papa,' 'Papa,'" cried Uncle John.

In those days it took about a month to get a letter from England. Time passed and we had almost forgotten the incident when, going for the mail one day, I got a black bordered letter addressed to John Denham. Now, he never got home from work before 7 p. m., but on my going home about 5 o'clock he was standing at the gate and as I came up said, "San, give me the letter."

The letter was from his wife, saying Patty had died and that her last words were: "Papa!" "Papa!" And figuring the difference in time between London and Rochester, she must have died just at the time he saw her. Did he see her? S. G.

Girl Reveals Burial Place of Her Skeleton.

The family lived on a farm. The eldest daughter left the house one evening, and never was heard from again. No reason for her disappearance could be given. Ten years after the son of the family brought home his college chum on Christmas vacation. The guest occupied the room which had belonged to the missing girl.

The morning after his arrival he came to breakfast, looking pale and disturbed. To account for his conduct he said:

"Last night, after I had been asleep perhaps an hour, I awakened with the impression that some one was in my room. I had left my lamp burning in the wall bracket, and as I looked up a tall young girl was going over toward it. I had never seen her before. She wore an old sailor hat and a way out of date shirt waist.

"She took the lamp and left the room without noticing me. I jumped up and softly followed her. She went downstairs, set the lamp on the hall tree, and went out the front door. When I reached the door she was at the gate. Then she started down the walk, and when she reached an old building at the end of the road, she suddenly disappeared. That is all, except when I came to look for my lamp this morning it wasn't in the bracket on the wall, but down on the hall tree."

The family questioned their guest more minutely as to the girl he had seen. He described perfectly the daughter who had disappeared ten years before, even to the dress she wore that night.

Then the old house at the bend of the road was searched. There, among a heap of rags, they found, with positive identification of finger rings, watch, and other trinkets, the skeleton of the ten years dead girl. A. B. C.

Weird Tale That Was "Made in Germany."

Grandma is a German, and in Germany in her time was a personage called "the good man." Now it seems that my grandmother had a brother named John, who, as the old people in Germany called it, "was possessed of the devil," as he would fall in a sort of fit, and when in them would talk to an unseen person, and become so heavy that five men could not raise him from the ground.

One time grandma and her sister and mother and father were sitting at the fireplace, when there appeared at the window an animal for which people paid a high price for the fur. It reared upon its hind legs at the window, and my great-grandfather removed his slipper, with the intention of throwing it, but just then he turned, and there stood John in his night robe, and said: "Do not touch him," and walked to the window and said: "So you have come; as you came, so shall you go."

Previously the boy, childlike, had threatened his sister "that the black devil would come," and I suppose this was the fulfillment of his threat; at least, so they thought, and became much alarmed and again took him to specialists, but they could not learn what malady he had.

The people of the village at last said the boy should be taken to "the good man" as a last resource. This old man seemed to have a sort of second sight, and would not aid people unless they were thoroughly good and honest. On the steps of the house the boy was seized with another spell, and several men carried him to the house. As soon as he entered the living room he ran to an open fireplace and hid. The old man then entered the room, and, staring hard at the boy, said: "Come here." He obeyed immediately, and the old man blessed him and said to the mother: "Go home; he is cured."

As the boy went out of the house there was a glass of water standing on a table, and he turned to his mother and said: "Mother, if that glass had weighed a ton it would represent the weight that has been lifted from my heart."

The child never had another spell, and grew to be an old man, and not till he was in middle life would any of his family tell him of the awful curse that seemed to have been on him as a child. E. B.

TRUE LOVE.

True love is like the ivy bold,
That clings each day with firmer hold;
That groweth on through good and ill,
And 'mid the tempest clingeth still.
What tho' the walls on which it climbs
Have lost the grace of former times?
Will then the ivy lose its hold,
Forget the sunny days of old?
Nay, rather will it closer cling
With loving clasp, remembering
That it had hardly lived at all
Without the kindly, shelt'ring wall.

True love is like the ivy green,
Than ne'er forgetteth what has been.
And so till life itself be gone,
Until the end it clingeth on.
What though the tree where it may cling
Shall hardly know another spring?
What tho' its boughs be dead and bare?
The twining ivy clingeth there
And clasps it with a firmer hold,
With stronger love than that of old,
And lends it grace it never had
When time was young and life was glad.

The Unknown Life of Christ.

A New edition of the Unknown Life of Christ is just from the press, and we are able to supply all demands. For the benefit of new subscribers we have added thereto two remarkable lectures, one by Prof. Henry S. Olcott, and the other by Miss Elizabeth Harlow, on the "Dangers of Psychism," a very valuable, attractive and instructive addition to this excellent book, and which should be carefully read by every Spiritualist, investigator and occult student in the land. This book is gotten up in fine style, and the additions thereto will enable it to serve a double purpose. It is still sent out as an absolute gift to all who send in $1.00 for The Progressive Thinker one year, and 10 cents in stamps to pay postage on the book.

WHITE'S SPIRIT ADMITS GUILT—SAYS "ACQUIT."

"Evelyn's Story Is True and Thaw Did Right in Killing Me," Asserts Spirit's Voice Through Medium.

A Chicago Spiritualist, Mrs. Emma Caird, 598 West Monroe street, claims to have established communication with Stanford White. Mrs. Caird today gave this story of the messages sent to her by the spirit of the man murdered by Harry Thaw:

By Mrs. Emma Caird.

"Harry Thaw will be acquitted!"

"The spirit of Stanford White, earth-bound by his sins, speaking to me from the spirit world, gives me this message.

"The jury as it now stands is eight for acquittal, four for conviction. It is possible that the minds of the four against Thaw may be changed so that this jury will not disagree.

"But the final result in any case will be Harry Thaw's acquittal.

"Thaw was justified in killing me from what he knew and from the way he looked at it.

"I would have done the same to him under the same circumstances.

"I went armed for over a year because of Thaw. If I could have had a chance, I would not have hesitated to kill him.

"I deserved death for the crimes I committed, but my murder is not the proper way of atonement.

"The publication of the truth in my life-time would have been a thousand times worse for me.

Spirit Admits Mrs. Thaw Told Truth About White.

"Evelyn Nesbit Thaw told the whole truth absolutely in what she said.

"My friends and the prosecution are seeking to discredit her story by trying to prove that before she knew me she was a frequenter of the 'Tenderloin' district and that she was better off after her acquaintance with me than she was before.

"This is not true, and they will not be able to prove it.

"The prosecution will bring forward nothing that will be able entirely to discredit the impression made by the defense.

"I am bound to do my utmost to help Thaw's cause now, since my spiritual emancipation can come only through sacrifice on my part, and I will be held on the lowest planes of the spirit world until I have done this.

"I know that I did terrible and unforgivable wrongs in the later years of my life. In the last four years my mind was diseased, I believe, so that I had no idea of right and wrong.

"There were other girls whom I wronged as I did Evelyn Nesbit.

"Two of these girls are willing to take the stand in her behalf to supplement her story, but their testimony will not be allowed for technical reasons.

Loved Evelyn More After Her Marriage

"Evelyn Thaw still possesses a wonderful fascination for me and always did, even more after her marriage to Thaw than ever before.

"Thaw was right from his code and my own in ending my life—but I know and am glad to know that he will finally be acquitted.

"There is plenty of evidence in existence that would free Harry Thaw that has not yet been brought to light. His defense has brought out the best it has, but there are men in New York who could do more for him.

"I am doing my utmost to induce them to bring this forward, although I do not believe that it is entirely necessary. I am absolutely certain of Thaw's ultimate freedom.

"As I now see the minds of the jury the eight men who stand out for his acquittal are firm in their belief, although the others are wavering as to his proper punishment. He has had his punishment and will have it in his life, as I am having mine in the spirit world.

"Thaw must go free! By all the laws of right he shall and will.

"If my murder might have atoned for the vile sins I was guilty of, I would now be free; but it was not enough even for that, although God knows, I deserved death at the hands of Harry Thaw if ever man did."—Chicago Evening Journal.

Lyceums, Attention!

Help us to obtain a complete list of all lyceums before March 31. Since my former request many have complied and sent list and report, but am sure there are more to hear from. Those who have reported are as follows: Los Angeles, Cal.; Parkland, Pa.; Chesaning, Mich.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Decatur, Iowa; Portland, Me.; Portland, Ore.; Galveston, Tex.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Billings, Mont.; San Diego, Cal.; Hoboken, N. J.; St. Louis, Mo.; Seattle, Wash.; Rupert, Ark.; Washington, D. C. So you see the list is growing. Send in the name of your lyceum and the number of children or adults who are members. Address me during March and April, at 180 Calhoun street, Battle Creek, Mich.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

"The Great Work."

A Review, by Lyman C. Howe, and Reply by Wm. Omer Butler.

Truth and Light.

The author draws a very pretty parallel between physical light and intellectual knowledge. He illustrates with imaginary experiences in the use of light, from one candle to twenty, and the electric light, and finally the great light of the sun; and notes the impressions on the lone observer, and finally a most radical and wonderful change surprises him. I will let the author tell this in his own ingenious way:

"But in the midst of your contemplation of this interesting vision the sun slowly rises and adds its majestic and transcendent light to that already in the room. Slowly but surely there comes to your consciousness the realization of a remarkable change. A complete transformation has occurred in the colors which everywhere before were distinctly apparent. The various objects have taken on added hues and more delicate shadings. Their beauty and richness are many times intensified.

"Under this flood of combined light you find yourself able to say, with seeming certainty, that you now see things as they are. You seem to realize that any stronger light would only dazzle your sense of sight and obscure your vision, because your capacity for light is limited by the power of resistance of the physical optic nerve.

"You now note the fact that you seem to be alone in a large and beautiful room. Its furnishings are of rare quality and exquisite workmanship. Its walls are hung with the paintings of great masters and its decorations are works of rarest art and the most fascinating beauty. You stand in mute admiration and wonderment. To your charmed senses the vision is complete. It would seem impossible to add to or take from it without marring its perfect symmetry of expression.

"Not so, however, for even in the midst of your wondering there comes from an unknown source a sudden burst of added light. It is a light to which your soul seems a stranger. It is not within your memory of earthly things. It is the light of another world. You understand its meaning. You now realize for the first time in physical life that your spiritual eyes have opened. Again you survey the splendid palace. A seemingly magical change has occurred. To your amazement you observe that you are no longer alone. All about you are men, women and children of matchless grace and unrivaled loveliness. The robes and the flowers they wear far surpass anything ever beheld by mortal eye. They reflect the delicate colors of a world above and beyond all that we know as physical.

"So completely is your consciousness absorbed in this fascinating vision of spiritual life, light and loveliness that for the time being you forget this under-world of grosser physical things. But your intelligence is not asleep. All your mental faculties and powers are awake and active. You find yourself instinctively asking yourself the question: 'If this be true, may it not be possible that there are yet more wonderful, glorious and exalted truths out in the infinite realms of nature which lie above and beyond the range of my present limitations?'

"At last the great and solemn truth has dawned upon you, that you have present limitations. No more stupendous fact ever impressed itself upon human consciousness; for this is the birth of true humility which is the beginning of wisdom.

"Now let us go back and draw the analogy.

"A single truth, however seemingly insignificant or unimportant, gives the intelligent possessor some slight vision of conditions most nearly related to it. The light of another truth added to it concerning the same subject matter does not extinguish, annul nor destroy the first truth, nor in any manner militate against nor conflict with it. To the observer its value and importance are only multiplied.

"He now begins to reason. From his reasoning he draws conclusions. sees dim outlines of other truths or seeming truths. He longs to see them yet more clearly. He seeks to know them with greater certainty. One by one they come within the range of his intellectual vision. One by one they are added to his increasing store of knowledge. Their augmenting light illumines his surroundings. The darkness of superstition and ignorance recedes. The value of truth is established.

"At last he comes to know himself in the full light of earth's physical conditions. He has reached the limitations of 'physical science.' In his pride of intelligence he says: 'At last I see the world in its true light. I am but a physical entity. Only this and nothing more. I am but making my own little round and playing my own little part, along with the bee and the ant, in a world of purely physical things. When the round is completed and the play is ended my life is done. Nature is hostile to all life, and I am but one of her countless millions of victims.'

"Then comes that opening of the spiritual vision. With it also comes a sublime illumination from the finer world of spiritual truth. In an instant the darkness of physical materialism is banished from its life forever. Physical death is not the end. It is only a second birth. It is a new gateway which opens to individual intelligence the seemingly infinite possibilities of other and higher realms of being. This new and wonderful truth of another life sheds its radiance over all the experiences of the remembered past. It gives to individual existence a new motive and a new inspiration. Here, in the higher realm of spiritual truth, he comes to recognize and appreciate the vital fact that he has 'present limitations.' And here again he is at the beginning of wisdom.

"A critical study of the foregoing analogy should disclose to the thoughtful student a number of interesting and significant facts. Among these it would seem that the following might be of special value:

"1. The presence of one light does not extinguish another light. It only multiplies its intensity and effect.

"In like manner, one truth does not extinguish, nor in any manner conflict with, another truth. It only adds to its potency and value.

"2. The greater the candlepower of light the more definite and distinct is the sense of physical vision, until the limit of the power of resistance of the physical organ is reached.

"Equally true is it that the greater the number of correlated truths at our command the more definitely and clearly we are able to distinguish the subject matter under consideration, within the limits of our rational powers.

"3. Light dispels darkness.

"So also, truth dissipates ignorance (which is intellectual darkness).

"4. Light is a fundamental necessity to the proper growth of all physical organisms.

"With added emphasis, truth is the vital principle at the foundation of all Constructive Spiritual Unfoldment and Soul Growth.

"5. The greater the candlepower of light the more perfectly we discern the true colors of things physical.

"In like manner, the greater the volume of truth at our command the more clearly we are able to discern the delicate shadings of principle which color all life.

Those who possess the patience and the courage to amplify the analogy in all its bearings cannot fail to obtain a clear and definite understanding of the purpose of the preceding chapter on 'The Classification of Data.' That purpose is to establish beyond all question the true relation which mere dogmas and beliefs sustain to actual knowledge, and suggest the relative value and importance of each to the individual.

"It appears to be a well considered axiom that, 'Those who believe the most know the least.'"

No one, I think, is likely to frown at this charming picture even though it be but allegory, or "analogy." Who would not like to enjoy such a splendid surprise? It is what we are all sure to experience as a sublime reality, soon after we arise out of this limiting clay and enjoy the opening of all of our spiritual senses, which shall nevermore be closed. But if the author means to assume a complete parallel and agreement between physical light, and spiritual truth there is one statement that will hardly bear the light of science. It is this: "The presence of one light does not extinguish another light. It only multiplies its intensity and effect." In ordinary experiences this may be true; but physical science has demonstrated that "by adding light to light we can produce darkness." So, too, "by adding sound to sound we can produce silence." If the intellectual and spiritual correspondence is complete, as the author seems to think, then truth added to truth might produce falsehood. Knowledge added to knowledge might produce ignorance! Although it be not the usual experience, if it is found in any case, and under any conditions possible to occur, that truth added to truth produces falsehood, we have something to deal with that is evidently not anticipated by the author; and this must be the case if the close parallel which the author seems to claim really exists; for it is a scientific certainty in physics that one light may extinguish another and produce darkness.

"The Lineal Key."

This chapter, covering 33 pages, is a historical sketch of the "Great School," and might justify an extensive commentary, if the limits of this review would permit. But there are twenty-four chapters in the book and the editor wants me to confine my review to a few letters. This will make it necessary to pass much interesting matter unnoticed, and to condense the rest to an extent that will not bring out the significance of much that the book contains; for, as we advance, the matter grows in importance, and startling statements, and astounding theories assumed to be accurately scientific; and becomes radically revolutionary in its philosophy of life and evolution. It is claimed that this school of science has existed, and has a definite record, reaching back to the dawn of history, and far into the shadows of prehistoric time; that it was the source and origin of Freemasonry; that "to this great school is clearly and distinctly traceable the original impulse of many of the organized movements of the intervening centuries for the establishment of human liberty and the protection of human happiness"; that the ceremony of initiation into the Great School is founded upon an exact science; that "Jesus was an initiate" and "to this school Jesus went for his spiritual instruction." "In it he spent the years of his special preparation." "The records of the Great School contain a detailed history of the life of Jesus, of his education and preparation for his work in the world."

The "Birth of a New School" was accomplished by the ambitious scheming of men having a knowledge of the influence of the Great School in guiding Egypt "over the rough pathway to the summit of its splendor and power." This New Departure became "The School of Egyptian Black Magic," represented by Paganism, Egyptian and Roman; Mohammedism; the Greek Church, and Roman Catholicism. This is but a very hasty glance at this interesting and instructive chapter; but it is all that my limits permit.

Chapter 5 follows with interesting quotations, and reasonings on "The Conflict of Authorities." Professor Lodge, Robert Kennedy Duncan, and Prof. A. E. Dolbear are shown to hold opposite views on great questions. This is supposed to prove that physical science is not the end of the law—is not wholly reliable. In fact the author regards the School of Natural Science, or the "Great School" far superior to the scientific schools known to civilization. This "Great School" is in the sphere of civilization, but seems to be not of it. Its students and masters are among us, distributed through every land, but unknown to the people thereof. Our author, I think, aims to be accurate and just in all he writes.

This gives to his occasional inaccuracies, even in the statement of facts, and quotations, more emphatic significance. If in writing a book, and presumably examining it when published, he is found to have committed errors as to facts stated, we may reasonably conclude that his study of science, and presenting its claims, there is some allowance to be made for mistakes, and possibly such mistakes as radically change his whole system of reasoning. There are statements to which we will soon arrive in this review, that seem to me so thoroughly absurd and contrary to the best knowledge we have, that I can see no other way to reconcile them with reason. He quotes from "New Knowledge" by Professor Duncan, this: "There are certain new conceptions which, while we can hardly say they are ascertained truths, shadow themselves as such. It is in the realization of two of these conceptions that during the next two hundred years the great work of the world will lie." "The first is the transmutability of the elements. Our reason bids us assent to its actual accomplishment, not with our aid, but in spite of it, in the case of the heavy elements." This seems to imply that Professor Duncan believes that there has been transmutation of the elements. But I see nothing in his words to indicate that he knows it, or even thinks he knows it. His reason "assents" to it; that is all. But in using this scientific authority our author puts it in these words: (after quoting an opposite opinion from Prof. Dolbear.) "His distinguished contemporary, however, of equal intelligence and scientific standing, informs us that the transmutability of the elements is an accomplished 'fact' in the case of the heavy elements."

Here is a statement in reference to the language of an author, which clearly was intended to be correct and truthful, which so changes his language as to make him assert as "fact" that which he only claims as entitled to the "assent" of his reason. There is a radical difference between a reasonable belief, or assent to a fact, or an apparent fact, and the fact itself scientifically demonstrated. This is not a quibble for the empty satisfaction of finding fault, or with any purpose to impair the merits and value of the work under review. But it shows that no author, however brilliant and sincere, can be taken as final authority in the settlement of grave questions, no matter how vigorously the claim of scientific certainty, and perfect demonstration may be made. This whole chapter is replete with interest, and valuable collections from some of the ablest and most famous schoolmen, as well as original reasoning by the author. At best I can but lightly touch the rare expressions, or analyze the apparent errors of the book, in the limits allowed for this review. But I think the interest will grow as I proceed.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

A Reply to Mr. Howe's Article of February 9.

To the Editor:—It gave me much pleasure to read the review of "The Great Work" by Mr. Lyman C. Howe, in The Progressive Thinker of Feb. 9. I have read this much-discussed book and must confess that it made a profound impression upon me. The author's position is, it seems to me, impregnable, and his argument constitutes such a complete defense of his claims that I am sure no words of mine could add anything thereto. Yet I may possibly venture a few remarks upon a difficulty which is suggested in Mr. Howe's article. I desire to add, however, that what I am about to say is in no way intended as a criticism of Mr. Howe's very excellent and impartial article, but is offered as what appears to me to be an answer to the difficulty in question.

The passage to which I refer, in which the difficulty or objection is raised, reads as follows: "It seems to me that if they (the claims of the Great School) are entirely true, it should have been possible and easy to have settled the question of a future life for every intelligent person in the world centuries ago." The question occurs to me, Do we as believers in the genuineness of the phenomena and claims of Modern Spiritualism, dare raise an objection of this kind? Will it not apply with equal if not greater force to Spiritualism, which in some form has been known on earth or ages? The objection or difficulty, I repeat, might be raised with even greater force against Spiritualism for the reason that it is a comparatively easy matter for any one to test its claims. Its best exponents claim that in almost any home circle the test can be made and the demonstration obtained, by meeting a few simple conditions and patiently sitting for a few weeks or months. This claim is undoubtedly true, and has probably always been true, and still the world is debating the question of immortality. Why has it not been settled long ago by this comparatively easy method?

On the other hand the disciples of the Great School frankly admit that the seeker after a personal (the only real) demonstration of immortality, following their system, cannot hope to obtain it until he has, through a course requiring some years, undergone a veritable evolution, moral, mental, and physical, whereby spiritual sight becomes easy and natural. Is it to be wondered that the world has not as yet availed itself of this system, granting its claims are true? The objection proves too much. Like a two-edged sword it cuts both ways.

As I understand the teaching of the book in question, the scientific demonstration of a future life, which the Great School offers to the world, is, and in the nature of the case must be, only the result of personal experience and actual knowledge resulting therefrom. It cannot be hearsay, or second-hand, which evidence might well serve for constructing a "creed," but counts for little with him who demands exact knowledge. The only way that I can surely know that any mortal has ever survived the grave is to actually meet such a one, see, hear, and touch him, and that under such conditions and for such a length of time as actually precludes all possibility of deception of the senses. In other words, if I am to actually know that there are "spirits," I must acquire the ability to see them. Not simply a materialized form, which at best is but a temporary and abnormal condition, but I must learn to see spirits, in the spirit world, and on their plane of life.

The philosophy of spirit-seeing then is, according to the teaching of "The Great Work," that he who would know of the existence of spirits and the spirit world must learn to "rise" to that world which is "above" us, not in miles but in altitude of being, and for this the long training referred to above is said to be necessary. It is also claimed that a considerable part of this training is purely ethical,—a moral unfolding. Now, these two facts alone—the time required and the requisite moral development, easily answer the question as to why the world has not as yet demonstrated immortality by this method, and it may be doubted whether even now, with the race enjoying the highest development it has ever known, any considerable percent of seekers will be found who are willing to make the sacrifice required. From our knowledge of human weakness it is far more reasonable to suppose that the multitude would avail itself of the comparatively easy method of mediumship in settling this question, rather than that method which might truly be called "The Way of the Iron Cross." The race as a whole has hardly yet passed out of its stage of infancy, and we do not expect an infant to reason nor to consider, in endeavoring to obtain a desired object, which is the safest way so much as which is the easiest and shortest way.

With apologies to the author of "The Great Work," I should like to introduce here, as further illustrating this point, and for the benefit of those who have not read the book, one of his most forceful analogies. It is that of a chick being hatched in an egg. It may be truly said of the chick that it is not yet in this world, but in a world of its own. Yet it is plainly destined to be an inhabitant of the world in which we live. It is forming lungs with which to breathe this air, organs of digestion suitable to earthly food, wings with which to fly, etc. Yet for the present it is entirely shut out from this world by a covering which Nature, or God, in great wisdom has provided, which covering is intended not only to keep it in its own world until the proper time to enter the next, but to keep the outside world out until that time. Finally, there are two ways in which the shell may be removed and the chick brought in contact with the outside world,—It may be broken from within (the natural method) or from without (the unnatural method).

The natural method is absolutely safe, for a chick which has vitality enough to pick its way out of its shell is sufficiently developed to safely enter upon the new life. But the breaking of the shell of an undeveloped chick from the outside is, to say the least, extremely dangerous. It is certainly not Nature's method, and that for obvious reasons.

The analogy between the chick and the human soul will be readily seen. More than one wise man of old has told us that the human soul is in every way comparable to an egg. This soul, like the chick, is destined and (under normal conditions) developing for another world,—a "higher" world. Infinite wisdom has likewise provided it with a covering which is intended not only to keep the soul in its own world, but to keep the outside world from it until the proper time. Spirit control, which brings the soul in immediate contact with the spirit world, is the breaking of the shell from the outside, and an unfailing analogy proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that such a method is unnatural and hazardous in the extreme. Nor should an enlightened mind longer listen to the Jesuitical sophistry that "the end justifies the means." We may not "do evil" (break the laws of nature) "that good may come from it."

The chick growing, developing organs, becoming strong, corresponds to the physical, moral and mental development which the Great School insists should precede the breaking of Nature's protecting shell. What could be more rational, more scientific, more in harmony with that Infinite Wisdom which governs the universe. Yet, as before suggested, that such a method is not as yet popular on earth is not at all surprising. The time will doubtless come, in the evolution of the race, when this and all other laws of Nature will be cheerfully sought and followed, but it will not be until man has learned by many sad experiences that in reaching a desired goal there are other things to be considered besides the shortness of the route.

A Loving Spirit Message.

It Comes to L. H. Warren, of Albany, Wis., and is Given Through the Mediumship of Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley.

My Dear Husband:—I know your soul yearns for knowledge regarding the spirit world, and especially the conditions of your loved ones there, and I am going to try to appease that longing to an extent by telling you of some of our conditions and privileges.

First, we are real entities—not vague specters, for we have bodies as real and tangible as the one you possess, yet more refined. The basis of these bodies is, as I understand, spirit matter, or matter in a more sublimated form.

These bodies have sensations as my experience teaches me, and as we move from place to place or change conditions our vibration changes to harmonize with the changes of condition.

On coming close to earth we experience heavier sensations much according to the state of things and persons we come in contact with. On these occasions we even sense depression of spirit and pain, although temporary, as real for the time as such sensations are to mortals

The more we have progressed, the greater the knowledge and we are able through will power to rise above those conditions immediately if we choose, and we generally chose to do this at once, as the person freed from pain and depression is more capable of assisting those they come in contact with than one who is not free from such condition, as in sickness a well person or healthy nurse is always preferred.

We generally come to our friends on earth through the law of sympathy and a desire to assist them. Chiefly to assist them mentally and spiritually, but frequently materially, the latter help has come about by the longing of mortals, for the arisen ones will try to aid along that line when possible, although it would be better for mortals if they depended chiefly on themselves in this line. We would progress more rapidly and they would become more self-reliant. As a rule a mother, and father care for their young, but when they become men and women the world expects them to use their own judgment in all affairs. The birds of the air and the beasts of the fields do likewise. We would be astonished if we saw a mother bird trying to fly for her grown offspring, or the father bird carrying them food, but we often see mortals doing as much for strong sons and daughters, often to their detriment.

We have houses and homes in our world, also some very beautiful ones with gardens and such ornamentations as pleases the inmates of these homes. Writing desks, musical instruments, etc., are in many of these homes, and in speaking of music let me tell you the spirits produce such much as you of earth do, and we find them studying along various lines here as on earth. There are also instruments connected by something like wires and tubes to the great musical centers that produce music for those who do not care to manipulate an instrument. You have such mechanical means for music and sight-seeing on earth, but nothing as yet to compare with what is in our world.

A highly progressed soul need not use time or energy moving from place to place in order to enjoy a beautiful scene, concert or lecture, but has the faculty of connecting itself with any center desired and reap the benefit therefrom. It is the same in making connection with earth and its inhabitants, all spirits do not visit earth in person; some send messages, while others, through growth and knowledge, connect themselves as direct as though they were using a telephone or other instrument to communicate with their friends.

This method of seeing and communication with earth friends requires much study and practice, but thousands of spirits are very proficient along such lines.

Work is never labor to us here, and I believe it is because everything is a mission of love instead of what we often felt as duty while on earth. The more one does the more of love they are and have; the greater their ability to do and the greater their happiness.

Our great pleasure is seeing oneself and others occupied in such work as suits their nature—no misplaced individuals, and if you should hear of a spirit being in a seemingly unhappy condition, you may know at once it is right or natural for them to be thus. The experiences gained generally help them to rise above said conditions, and is just the lesson and discipline that soul requires.

While higher spirits look on seemingly unmoved by other spirits' condition, it does not signify they are bereft of sympathy, but indicates growth and knowledge—they fully understand the situation, as well as often realize the outcome. They always aid when it is best, but not just to satisfy or amuse the lower spirit. A mother's kiss often takes away the pain from the child, and help from a higher spirit works the same way often by aiding the ones assisted to arise from their state of sorrow or lethargy with the desire to associate with others good and pure, Thus in time they become self-reliant and need not be carried alone by missionaries or spirits who lead the way.

We grow from within; outside objects and suggestions may stimulate that growth, but the self-centered man or woman on either side of life is the grown man or woman and is never turned nor swayed by outside conditions. A state of poise prevails at all times, and they radiate power, strength and sunshine to souls less grown. It is a grand privilege to be in their presence or follow in their path; one feels the stronger and better for it, and this is why the leaders have followers, the latter sensing the benefit of their light, though often not able to explain the cause and tell why they love to follow such leaders.

Association in our world is according to the law of attraction; we draw to us and are drawn to those we need, hence less inharmony and friction prevail than upon earth. No home is marred by uncongenial associations. Many families who occupied the same home on earth are apart here—many relatives were friends, yet no feeling exists as to slight or indifference, as often noticed on earth. All understand, consequently all abide in peace.

By this last remark do not be led to think there are no unhappy spirits in the spirit world, for there are many souls working their way into higher conditions through suffering from sin and error while in the flesh. These are the growing pains of the spirit, and cease after more progress has been made.

I have experienced no such pains and now feel like saying "How glad I am that you and I began our growth on earth." 'Tis grand to know of truth then. 'Tis still grander to live the truth as all is gain to the spirit.

The first to meet me when I entered my new life, was our dear child, Eva. She had watched me for some time and had anticipated the change, and everything was in readiness for me. I saw many forms coming into the room before I left my body, and the old faithful Indian kept moving his hand in a circular motion directly over my head. When our dear girl took my two hands and said, "Come, mother, I followed as she led, but turned and looked back, as I reached the door, and saw he was still moving his hands thus,

I also saw you still holding my hand, but just as I left you, laid them down, and I shall never forget that look of sadness and sense of loneliness that came over you, nor the kiss you gave that I could only return in spirit.

Earth scenes with its sensation of suffering soon faded from me as we floated or glided along, and I soon found myself happy and quite strong. I now feel young, or much as when we first joined our hands and hearts to start on our earth's journey of married life.

I was taken to a beautiful home of rest, and there left alone. I soon fell into a sweet, restful slumber and on awakening found I was perfectly well.

While lying on the couch in a kind of peaceful reverie our dear one reappeared, saying, "Mother, Dear, we will now resume our journey," and we were soon on the way.

I cannot describe the beauty of the country we passed through, words can never do justice; beautiful landscapes such as artist soul would long to put on canvas, rivers, lakes, and streams of water with such clearness as I never saw before; trees large and green as well as smaller ones and no dead leaves to be seen. Flowers of all colors and shades, and a sense of freshness and real life everywhere.

As I was admiring all this beauty of nature, what appeared to me as buildings began to show up in the distance, and as we drew nearer, a city or village of magnificent splendor was seen.

Beautiful architecture was manifested in all the structures and one at once began to admire.

We passed through this city, meeting many grand looking men and beautiful women. No confusion or hurry was noticed, and a perfect sense of harmony and peace prevailed.

We neared the outskirts of said city, and I looked into our girl's eyes and said, "We are nearing home." She answered, "Yes."

Our soul possesses knowledge, and we know many things here without being informed by others.

A neat little cottage drew my attention, vines covered the front door and roses bloomed in profusion in the yard. A border of pansies was a frame around a beautiful green lawn, making an ideal picture for one who loved nature as I did to enjoy.

We entered, and I was invited to rest on a convenient couch near the door. Such rest and comfort as comes to the traveler was mine and I fell into a quiet sleep.

When I awakened my dear mother, and father, as well as your dear parents and many of our dear relatives, as well as children were there to greet me and welcome me home.

I cannot tell you of the delight that was mine, but, dear one, you will experience the same some day when you join me in that happy home.

In time I was drawn away from all this peace and beautiful, by a power I could not resist, and on following the impulse of my soul I soon found myself by your side. You had been looking at what I had left behind—the cold body.

The funeral time was drawing near, and I remained. I thank you for your thoughtfulness in the arrangement of that affair. I was pleased with the words spoken, as they were full of feeling and explained to others who did not understand much of our beautiful philosophy. I returned to my spirit home after hearing those comforting words spoken, and remained there until again being drawn earthward by a thought wave emanating from yourself.

On this occasion I found night had thrown her mantle of darkness over your earth, and on entering our home I found you sad and lonely, but not that sadness void of hope, or loneliness of entire despair, but the sadness and loneliness as comes from long and happy associations being broken. It was your first night without the presence of my outer self to look upon, but dear one, you knew I was with you. You also knew I was free from pain, and I knew that while at times you still feel your loneliness, you would not have me back to suffer physically pain again.

Be of good cheer, we'll meet again and continue on in our life of love. I am waiting on my side of life for your coming, and you are waiting on your side for the change.

Be faithful and patient and you will be rewarded. I am still your loving wife and companion, even though a thin veil is drawn between us, but you will know as I now know, that we have not been misled in looking forward to reunion with loved ones, and a continued life after the change called death.

EM, your loved one.

SOME TIME.

Last night, my darling, as you slept
I thought I heard you sigh,
And to your little crib I crept,
And watched a space thereby;
And then I stooped and kissed your brow,
For oh! I love you so—
You are too young to know it now,
But some time you shall know!

Some time when, in a darkened place
Where others come to weep,
Your eyes shall look upon a face
Calm in eternal sleep;
The voiceless lips, the wrinkled brow,
The patient smile shall show—
You are too young to know it now,
But some time you may know!

Look backward, then, into the years,
And see me here to-night—
See, O, my darling! how my tears
Are falling as I write;
And feel once more upon your brow
The kiss of long ago—
You are too young to know it now,
But some time you shall know.

AN INSTRUMENT THAT RESTORES EYESIGHT.

SpectaelesCan Be Abandoncd.

This instrument, which the inventors have patented, is called "Actina"—a trade-mark word.

In the treatment of eye diseases the inventors of "Actina" claim there is no need for cutting or drugging the eye for most forms of disease, Cataracts, pterygi, and other abnormal growths can be removed and weakened vision improved or restored by the new and more humane method. If this is a fact there will be no need to go blind or to wear spectacles.

"Actina has been tested in hundreds of cases and has affected marvelous cures. So confident are the inventors that this device is an article of great merit that they give absolutely a free trial. They want everyone interested to make a thorough investigation and a personal test of "Actina." One will be sent on trial postpaid:

They issue a book of 100 pages—a complete dictionary of disease—which tells all about "Actina," the diseases it will cure, what others think of it, what marvelous cures it has affected, and all about the responsibility of its owners—all is sent absolutely free upon request. This book should be in the library of every family. Address Actina Appliance Company, Dept. 342R, 811-813 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end, it is chockful of stirring incidents. Price of this large volume, only $1.50 postpaid.

OCEANIDES

A Psychical Novel.—Price Paper, Cover, 50 Cents.

This great novel is written with a distinct purpose, to set forth certain phases of spirit life and experience, as related to the gifted and inspired author. The question of soul mates or of the united male and female constituting the completed ego or angel, is advanced as a vital truth of spirit experience in the higher realms. The work radiates a good spiritual influence, and is very interesting.

It is a spiritual book for Spiritualists, and interesting for everyone.

MARY ANNE CAREW

Wife, Mother, Spirit, Angel.—Neat Cloth Cover, Price $1.00.

This great work relates the experiences of a young wife and mother, early called to the portals of death. It is very realistic, and the narrative is charmingly natural, and beautiful in its tone of sweetness. It brings that other world very near to us; the comfort it brings to those bereaved of the dear ones of the home and family, is beyond one's power to describe. All readers will be charmed with it as well as spiritually aided and uplifted.

STARTLING FACTS,

OR

Deeds of Darkness Disclosed

This work devotes special attention to Auricular Confession and its relations to sacerdotal celibacy, convents, monasteries, morality and civil and religious liberty. It is intended to be an embodiment of facts and documentary evidence of the pernicious influence of the confessional; a trenchant showing up of Romanism, based upon standard Catholic authorities; an eye-opener concerning the methods and spirit, the moral turpitude and evil works of Romanism. Cloth, 75 cents.

MAHOMET His Birth, Character and Doctrine. By Edward Gibbon. This is No. 6 of the Library of Liberal Classics. It is conceded to be historically correct, and so exact and perfect in every detail as to be practically beyond the reach of adverse criticism. This work will be found intensely interesting. Price, 25 cents.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Clio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

COMMON SENSE By Thomas Paine. A Revolutionary pamphlet, addressed to the inhabitants of America in 1776, with explanatory notice by an English author. Paper, 15 cents.

Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; The Relation of Its Principles to Continued Existence and to the Philosophy of Spiritualism. By Prof W. M. Lockwood. Paper, 25 cents.

THE AGE OF REASON.

Why I Am a Vegetarian. An address delivered before the Chicago Vegetarian Society By J. Howard Moore. Price, 25 cents.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

The Song Cards for sale at this office at $4 per hundred, are the help you need in society work.

Mattie E. Hull is continuing the work in San Jose, Cal., as had been arranged for herself and her arisen companion. Arrangements are being made for a course of lectures by Mrs. Hull in Los Angeles, commencing the first Sunday in March, and continuing four Sundays.

Mrs Anna L. Gillespie fills an engagement during March and April at Battle Creek, Mich. She would like to make a few more camp-meeting engagements. Mrs. Gillespie ranks high as a lecturer and medium. Address her at No. 321 South Highland avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

Mrs. L. J. Curtis, inspirational speaker and teacher of occult science, is now located at 2330 Lincoln avenue, Denver, Colo., where she can be addressed. She has been highly recommended by Spiritualists in Lansing, Mich.

Miss Ada M. Came writes from Cambridge, Mass.: "The Cambridge Industrial Society of Spiritualists held its regular meeting, Feb. 8, in Cambridge Lower Hall, 631 Massachusetts avenue. Mr. James S. Scarlett, formerly of Cambridge, but now of New Bedford, was the speaker, and gave a most interesting lecture, followed by messages. Mr. Scarlett gives a good report of the society in New Bedford, which at present is in a flourishing condition. He has recently been elected president of that society.

Correspondent writes: JAMES E. COE, the old veteran Spiritualist, will celebrate his seventy-fifth birthday at Star Lodge Hall, No. 378 South Western avenue, on Saturday, evening, March 2, 1907, where he hopes to meet all his friends. There will be a fine musical program of old-time songs, recitations, short addresses, etc., by friends, and a fine collation served. Come one, come all."

Mrs. Sarah A. Crossfield writes: "I am serving the New Thought Society of Grand Rapids, Mich., for the months of February and March. I find the Spiritualists here are wide-awake, progressive and inspiring to a speaker or medium. The social part is a feature not overlooked in this society; in fact it is an all around live organization. I should judge that good workers have preceded me, and the seeds sown have taken root. We held a most interesting and well-attended meeting, Feb. 10, Mrs. Jackson following my lecture with messages, which were, with few exceptions, recognized. I consider Mrs. Jackson one of our honest and conscientious workers who should be kept constantly in the field. The friends may address me at No. 301 Twelfth avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, one of the few remaining survivors of the old school of Spiritualistic workers, whose home for thirteen years has been in Denver, Colo., has just got over another of those severe attacks of nervous and physical prostration, which since the two paralytic strokes he had in 1902, comes around periodically. Captain Walrond is in harness and on active service again.

Mrs. Alice Sexsmith writes: "Meetings of interest are still being conducted by the Christian Spiritualist Society every Sunday afternoon and evening. Each meeting brings new faces. We had as speaker, Feb. 3, and 10, Mr. H. R. Henay. He is a young man of 19, and is endowed with a power which only comes to those that lead a life of truth. His discourses are of a high order. He will address us again on Sunday evening, Feb. 24. Don't fail to hear him. Messages by Miss Thomas, Mrs. Susie Thompson and the writer were well received. Miss Thomas will conduct test circles in her own home, 389 West Madison street, every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Remember the meeting every Sunday afternoon and evening at 3 and 8 o'clock, at Conway Hall, Western avenue and Lake street, over drug store."

E. R. Kidd writes from Canton, Ohio: "My Progressive Thinker arrives weekly, and through it we are kept posted as to the work being done throughout the country in the ranks of Spiritualism. While we have some active workers here in Canton, we have no society. Cause—same old story—inharmony and lack of unity on the part of those who call themselves Spiritualists. Off and on some good medium comes to town for a few days, and at present Mrs. Nina C. Challen of Toledo, is in our city, having recently arrived from Sharon and Youngstown, where she did some excellent work. However, Mrs. Challon's stay in Canton will be of short duration, since she has been called to her home in Toledo where she as a rule is kept quite busy."

Wm. Hassmann, president, writes: "The Sunday evening meeting of the North Star Spiritual Union in its hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue, on Feb. 10, was largely attended. For the past two months untold numbers of strangers have visited our meetings, showing that Spiritualism and the unseen forces are forcing their way into homes where heretofore the knowledge of a life hereafter was unknown, or the angelic forces were not strong enough to inspire them to seek for the truth, and break away from pulpit promises. They join these gatherings in spiritual halls to get a message from their loved ones. Mrs. T. Mueller, the lecturer and medium, is doing grand work; her tests are praised by all. She has certainly done grand work on the Northwest Side, and has brought new life, love and harmony to many homes."

E. R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "The auxiliary of the First Association gave an entertainment, consisting of musical and literary selections. The Hatch Brothers of Dorchester, Mass., favored us with some comic sketches and musical selections. As they are professionals, we were treated to the best to be had. Mr. E. W. Sprague read a very unique poem entitled the 'Germ La Grippe.' This poem will be better appreciated by having Brother Sprague read it in German dialect. Mr. Allen Hodge and son Fred sang several comic songs which called for applause. The auxiliary is presided over by Mrs. Mary T. Longley, who is president of the auxiliary, and May Price, vice-president, and Mrs. Morgan, secretary. Mr. and Mrs. Newell White was given a surprise party by a number of their friends. Mr. and Mrs. Sprague are doing good work. Many have joined the association. The lyceum will give a masquerade party the last Saturday in the month. They hope for a large attendance, thereby encouraging the children."

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

Fred C. Suhrer writes: "The Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, Hygeia Hall, Dr. Alex Caird, president, are well attended, and on Sunday, February 16, a larger congregation than usual was present. The addresses by Rev. Thos. S. Warner and Mr. V. Howie were interesting and well received. Our supper committee is covering itself with glory, and surprised us with a "Valentine Supper." Our song service at 6:30 is receiving its share of appreciation and our concert at 7 o'clock displays some of the best talent in the city. The Hon. Charles E. Hughes lectured at 8 o'clock, taking "Nature" as his subject, which proved interesting and instructive. Our platform mediums for the 17th are Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs Barbara Hilbert, Mrs. J. Staner-Adams, and Mr. Chas. A. Thompson. Circles will be held as usual at 4 o'clock, giving everyone an opportunity to get a message. Come and get yours. Just tell the folks at home you won't be there for supper—stay for the evening and see what we give you for 15 cents. our concert alone being worth more than that. In the evening at 8, we will again be favored with an address by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. Don't miss this opportunity. The supper and socials of the Fraternal Daughters are becoming popular. They meet in the same building, 2nd floor, the 1st and 3rd Wednesdays each month. If you want a reading on a week day, there's the place to get it; also a good hot supper at 6:30

Mrs. Carter writes from Lexington, Ky.: "Mrs. A. E. Kibby of Cincinnati, has just finished her engagement of three months with the First Spiritual Temple of Newport, Ky., which was a very successful series of meetings. She will be in Lexington, Ky., during February and March. All mail should be addressed to her at 110 East Third street."

Hattie F. R. Peet writes: "The fourth of the series of the Illinois Sunflower Club dances will be given in Washington Hall, 70 Adams street, Monday evening, Feb. 25. Tickets 25 cents. Lunch will be served. All friends cordially invited to be present on these enjoyable occasions, whether you dance or not."

Rev. Alice Baker, state Missionary for Oklahoma, writes: "Spiritualists of Oklahoma, I am now making dates for a spring tour of the state. To those who have not written, either to the state board or myself, this is for you. Can you arrange for one or more meetings where you are? Write to me at once. Are you a member of the state association? If not, send name, address and $1 membership fee to R. G. Lee, secretary, Headrick, Okla., at once, and have a vote in the state meeting. Every Spiritualist in Oklahoma has a niche to fill, something to do. We have the light; let us let it shine. Write to me at once at my home address, 449 Live Oak street, Dallas, Texas."

S. A. Huntington writes from Malden, Mass.: "Sunday services, Feb. 10. The president presided at both sessions. At the 3 p. m. circle Mrs. Carter, Miss Morton and Mr. Berry occupied the whole session in voicing messages. The evening meeting, as usual, opened with praise, reading of scripture and invocation. Mrs. Annie R. Chapman of Brighton, Mass., was the speaker and message bearer. She prefaced her work with reading a poem entitled 'Love Thyself Last,' and chose the same for her theme, giving a very interesting address, after which she devoted an hour to giving messages. Mrs. Chapman is an interesting speaker and good message bearer. Mrs. Carrie H. Tainter of Manchester, N. H., will be the speaker on Sunday evening, Feb. 17, and Dr. C. L. Willis of Boston, Feb. 24. It is understood that Rev. F. A. Wiggin of Unity Church, Boston, will resume his work for the society on Thursday evening, Feb. 21."

James I. Mettler writes from Helena, Mont.: "I have had a stroke paralysis, affecting my left side, and compelling me to abandon writing any further articles on the Home Circle, for which I am sorry, for I had a number of interesting as well as instructive subjects I was holding in reserve, but it is too late. I am 68 years old and for forty years have been investigating Spiritualism."

Prof. E. E. Rex writes from Frankfort, Ind.: "We are holding services every Sunday, afternoon and evening, and while the audiences are small they seem to be appreciative, and we hope in time to have more than we can accommodate in the small hall we have secured, which seats only about 100; as yet it has been but half filled, and there is supposed to be over 400 Spiritualists in Frankfort. We hope many of our good friends in life will give us their best thoughts for success, and that our spirit friends will open the eyes of many here and show them the way to these meetings."

H. J. Cameron writes: "The Golden Rule Spiritualist Society held their usual Sunday services on the 10th of this month, at O'Donnell's College Hall, 43 S. Paulina street. The afternoon was devoted to short talks by the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, which were greatly appreciated, as were also the messages given by Mrs. Minnie Field, Mrs. Ingeldue and Mrs. Nora E. Hill. The speaker for the evening, Dr. J. H. Randall, being absent on account of illness, Mrs. Nellie Kusserow presided, and delivered an interesting address, the subject being, 'The Higher Development of Man.' The message bearers were the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill and Mrs. Kusserow. A beautiful solo selection was rendered, entitled, 'We Shall Know His Angel Name.' The society has noted with pleasure the steadily increasing attendance. The speaker for the next Sunday evening (Feb. 17) will be the Hon. Charles Hughes."

Boston Meetings.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society meets in Appleton Hall, 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass., every Friday.

The Ladies' Lyceum Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, Boston, Mass., every Wednesday.

The Ladies' Industrial Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, every Thursday.

Wanted by a business woman, three modern unfurnished housekeeping rooms, with liberal-minded people, or small flat. Address 40 Loomis street, Chicago.

Mid-Winter Mass-Meeting of the State Spiritual Association of Minnesota, February 22, 23 and 24, 1907, I. O. O. F. Hall, corner Wabasha and Fifth streets, St. Paul, Minn. An excellent programme throughout. A silver collection will be taken at the door for the afternoon and evening meetings. Dinner and supper will be served by the ladies in the dining room. You are requested to visit the sales tables of the Ladies' Aid. See your home agent as to reduced rates covering this period on all railroads.

T. J. Haynes writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "In the past I have written you about the good things we have been having in the spiritual line. Well, at the present we are having more. Mrs. Crossfield of Muncie, Ind., is with us, and also Mrs. F. V. Jackson of this city. Their work is fine, and too much cannot be said in their favor. We have large audiences in spite of the stormy weather, and they never have to go away disappointed. Mrs. Jackson has lived here a great deal of the time since 1888, and is well acquainted and has many friends who are glad to welcome her again to our city. Mrs. Crossfield came to us a stranger, but has made friends with all she has come in contact with. I can not speak in too high praise of their work."

The Tribune-Republican of Meadville, Pa., speaks as follows of Mrs. Cooley: "Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, delivered the fifth lecture of her present series Sunday night, under the auspices of the local Spiritualist society, and will give the closing lecture next Friday evening. The Sunday evening meeting was held in the main room of the Odd Fellows' temple and the room was packed to the doors. In the course of her talk Sunday evening Mrs. Cooley described a very remarkable experience. She said she was once summoned to the bedside of a lady friend who was dying ('passing to the other side'). Mrs. Cooley said that when she arrived at the bedside she found her friend so far gone that she could not recognize anybody, and as she, Mrs. Cooley, stood watching her, she saw her spirit pass out from the body. Mrs. Cooley said she (herself) passed into the clairvoyant state and in that condition followed the departing spirit until she had witnessed the complete transition from the mortal to the spirit life; had seen the departed spirit received on the other side. This very wonderful story was listened to with rapt attention. Following the lecture Mrs. Cooley received spirit messages, each of which was acknowledged to be recognized by some person in the audience."

Prof. Hyslop, well and favorably known in connection with the investigation of psychical matters connected with Spirit Return, was in the city last week. He is doing a great work along the lines of scientific investigation of occult phenomena.

J. W. Ring, after filling an engagement in Indiana, arrived in the city last Saturday on his way to St. Joseph, Mo., to occupy the rostrum there last Sunday. He then goes to Crystola, Colo.

The Illinois Sunflower Club holds meetings the second and fourth Tuesday of every month at Lincoln Hall, Fraternity Building, 70 E. Adams street, at 2 o'clock. The second Tuesday is the business meeting. The fourth Tuesday a social gathering when tea is served and the mediums read the cups.

Carrie L. Hatch, secretary, writes: "The Massachusetts State Association of Spiritualists will hold anniversary exercises in Berkeley Hall, 4 Berkeley street, Boston, Mass., on Tuesday, March 26, all day and evening. The best of speakers and mediums will be presented. Admission free. Full list of speakers will be printed later."

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale has an engagement at Galveston, Tex., for March. She is president of the State Association.

We regret to learn that Mr. G. H. Brooks, President of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association is dangerously sick in Milwaukee, Wis., and is under the care of a trained nurse. Let everyone send him cheering health-thoughts, and assist in his recovery. Owing to his sickness he is compelled to cancel present engagements. Friends wishing to have meetings in the State will address the Secretary, Miss L. G. Loebel, 202 North avenue., Milwaukee, Wis.

C. L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies Aid Society met as usual, with the President, Mrs. Mattie E. A. Allk in the chair. The Valentine Supper proved a great success, each A. Allbe in the chair. The Valentine heart with varied sentiments pasted upon the same. The social hour after supper is always enjoyed by all. The evening exercise consisted of the following talent: Mrs. A. S. Waterhouse, Mrs. Hattie C. Mason, Mrs Lewis, Mrs. Steinen, and Mr. Blackstone. Mrs. Lewis sang two original songs, accompanying herself on the autoharp. Next Friday a Martha Washington Party will be held, and the evening will be devoted to a social time, dance and whist. Supper at six, p. m. Friday, March 1, Mrs. Kate R. Styles will give a benefit for the society, giving a short address, poems, and communications, and a rare treat is expected. Be sure and come."

Rev. A. P. Blinn, the popular pastor of the First Spiritual Union, Norwich, Ct., writes: "As mentioned in the letter from our secretary, published in a previous issue of The Progressive Thinker, this society by unanimous vote of the committee has given the writer a call to remain as its settled speaker for another year, the call having been accepted. As a matter of fact I could do nothing but accept when, ever since my work began here two years ago, every encouragement has been given me, and the members have been as earnest workers for success and as interested, as the speaker and most prominent officers. Harmony, good fellowship, and every support, moral and financial, is our working theory and it has spelled success. The young people are to present a drama on the evenings of March 7 and 8, entitled 'Above the Clouds' and are making elaborate arrangements for it. Special scenery is being built at an expense of over $50, and the play will be staged in a thoroughly artistic and up-to-date manner with appropriate costuming. Our services continue to attract good audiences each Sunday, both morning and evening, and our fortnightly suppers are always largely patronized. The lyceum is thriving and prosperous. On Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Feb. 20 and 21, the well known test medium, Mrs. S. C. Cunningham of Cambridge, Mass., will hold seances that will undoubtedly attract large audiences to the Academy, as her work for us before was very satisfactory. Our custom of presenting only the philosophy Sundays, and occasionally having a medium, but generally having the phenomena at week-evening services, has proved for the best interests of this society, and the excellent music rendered by our organist and quartette has met with general appreciation. At each service special mention is made of the splendid work of The Progressive Thinker, and we always have copies on hand for sale or distribution. It is a sign of progress when a society appreciates the spiritual press and cooperates with it."

A FRATERNAL ORDER.

With Some Side-thrusts at Certain Other Subjects.

I consider the above title a good one. The article by Alex Caird concerning the matter, I consider to be excellent in general.

I believe that the bible and Christianity, which have been such a curse to the world, should be excluded from Spiritualism entirely. Christianity has caused more war, bloodshed and strife in the world than anything and every thing else put together; and is still causing trouble in various parts of the earth. Missionaries are sent from the United States to China (who stir up trouble) to convert the "heathen," while at the same time, in the United States, lynching and burning people at the stake takes place. An American here was talking to a Mexican against bull fighting, stating that it was cruel, which the Mexican admitted, and said that they did not burn people here in Mexico at the stake. The American had no more to say upon the matter.

Mr. Caird favors worship. I consider worship to be idolatry, no matter what the object worshiped. What good would it do any being or power to be worshiped, and what good would it do the worshiper?

Spiritualists sometimes open their meetings with prayer. I do not believe that prayer has any effect further than upon the one who utters it, and those who hear it.

It does not look well to me, as is often the case, for a Spiritualistic writer to prefix "Rev." to his own name. WM. HART.

LETTER FROM ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

After Months of Needed Rest She Resumes Work.

After nearly three months of rest, the first in many years, I am about taking up the work again. Will lecture for the Battle Creek, Mich., society for the months of March and April. My address during the time will be 180. Calhoun street. Will answer calls for funerals through that section, also a few open dates for camp work and will be glad to hear from some needing my services during the camp season.

The home society here in Pittsburg, is in good condition, under the able President, Mr. C. Stevens, who is a splendid chairman and leader, aided by a most efficient and harmonious board. They have a church second to none. Since my coming home, have had the pleasure of listening to Mr. Brooks, who is a good lyceum worker. He was followed by Mrs. C. Fanny Allyn, Who was, like Mr. Brooks, so well appreciated they are to be with us another year. Mrs. Allyn is, as all know, a most capable lyceum leader, as well as lecturer. She was of great service in assisting the little lyceum which will soon, under the directorship of Miss Mary Clouse, be the Big Lyceum. It is wonderful how the movement is growing here. During Mrs. Allyn's stay she introduced many of her methods with good results. Miss Clouse is young in work, but you would not think so to see the able manner in which she attends to every duty. Mr. Oscar Edgerly is the speaker for the present month, and by his scholarly lectures is attracting large audiences who are delighted with his teaching.

The blind organist, Mr. Evans, takes care of the musical part of the work, and his songs are always a comfort and a pleasure to the listener. The months have gone by with lightning speed, and returning strength and courage is making me feel like a new woman, and I shall hope to be kept busy the rest of the year. Let me say in closing, how much we are enjoying the Great Work review by Brother Howe. Mr. Howe always writes in a manner to call the attention of the thinking readers, and we watch for it each week.

ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, Jan. 27, 1907, John Resch, a life long resident of Brooklyn, N. Y. For years he had been a Spiritualist, having been one of the founders of the Church of Divine Light. Dr. George Fuller of Onset, Mass., the well-known lecturer and author, officiated. Mr. Resch leaves two daughters, Miss Emma Resch, a medium of the Church of Divine Light, and who is widely known by her good Christian work, and Mrs. P. J. Loeb. COR.

Mrs. Charles V. Lively, aged 78 years and a resident of Salt Lake City, passed to spirit life early in the morning of the first of February, calm and peaceful in the arms of his only and true companion. The world at large makes much noise about the glory of those famous generals who earn their laurels on the battlefield of bloodshed, but this same world is silent about these heroes who encompassed by the darkness of selfishness, ignorance, superstition and hatred have to fight life's battle guided by their only star, the hope for a future life and more convenient conditions in a better world than the present. To that latter class of people belonged our brother Charles V. Lively, a man of stern conviction, strengthened by the experiences of a forty years belief in the Spiritualist principle, besides being a careful reader of The Progressive Thinker and other occultistic literature. Peace and happiness to his memory.

C. K. FLANDERKA.

Passed to spirit life, at 10:20 a. m., Feb. 5, 1907, Brother Henry Bass, aged 70 years, at his residence, 1802 Virginia avenue, Joplin, Mo. Father Bass was a devoted Spiritualist. Nine years ago he arranged for a Spiritualist funeral and engaged the writer to hold the service. Being an old resident of Joplin, a very large attendance at the funeral proved the esteem in which the deceased was held. Death came a sweet release to the wearied soul. SARA C. SCOVELL.

Mrs. Louisa Eckhardt, wife of Herman Eckhardt, passed to spirit life from her home in Canton, Ohio, Feb. 6, 1907, from paralysis, aged 67 years. She was born in Mullheim Baden, Germany. She was a dutiful wife and mother, a Spiritualist for over twenty years, and a regular reader of The Progressive Thinker.

A. H. ECKHARDT.

Canton, Ohio.

Mary J. Lindsey, of Grand Rapids, Mich., aged 64, passed to spirit life on January 20. She was a medium from birth, and gladly welcomed the call, 'Come home." She was a genial companion, a hospitable, sympathetic friend, with a heart keenly sensitive to the sorrows of all.

K. L. CHILDS.

WANTS A STATEMENT VERIFIED.

A Lady of Jamestown, N. Y. in Search of Information.

I was born in Batesville, Panola, county, Miss., as far as I know, but as to whom were my real parents I have always had a doubt. I was taught to believe that Dr. Jesse A. Bounds and wife were my father and mother.

They were kind in their way, but from my earliest infancy I perceived a difference in their treatment of me. There was that tender affection for the others that I missed. I was never taken in their arms and caressed as were the rest; never had playthings like the rest, and yet their own were denied an education that I might have a thorough training in the best of schools. They were poor as thousands of other Southern people were after the war, for they were of the oldest aristocracy of the South. Like many another girl, I sometimes demurred when it came to going to school. At such times I was told that I must perfect my education in order that some day I might be fitted to occupy my rightful position in society. Once in an angry mood mother told me that I was not their child, or rather she said that I was not her child. If I was not her child, I know that I was not a child of the Doctor, for there was a girl older than I, the best beloved of that family.

Another curious thing—I was called Agnes Valentine Bounds, but told that, when only three days old, a physician friend of father had adopted me, and that in all legal papers I must sign or prefix by hyphen the name of Pearson. I never saw this Dr. Pearson, but just before my marriage father wrote him, and he wrote me a very kindly letter. He was then very aged. I was married near Little Rock, Ark., and shortly after moved North. I have never from that day to this seen one of my people, and all that I then knew have passed beyond. Just before father's death he called me repeatedly, but none let me know of his illness until he was buried. Now comes the strange part of my story, and I would like to verify it if I can. I was not a Spiritualist, and did not believe in mediumship, but was recently persuaded to visit a medium. Before this I know positively that none knew of my history, for it is contrary to my nature to be very communicative. She told me that someone was looking for me, a man and a woman; that during the war my father and the one I thought my father became separated in the heat of battle, each thinking the other killed; that my own father heard of my mother's death, and did not know of my birth until years after, for it seems that my people had lived in Maryland and migrated to Mississippi after the war. She says the doctor had a purpose in educating me to fit a position that even he considered above himself. This would seem so strange to me, for I thought him a king among men.

I am all alone in the world, a physician by profession. I need no one to care for me, for I have had my share of success, but there may be some one whom I may comfort, and I am so lonely. This medium said that I could prove what she said to be true by publishing this in The Progressive Thinker. I am told I was born February 14, 1867. Dr. Bounds was a surgeon in the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia, ranking as captain.

The World Has Never Seen the Like!

At Great Expense we have secured the copyright of Mr. Ghandi's translation of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." It is to be sent forth as a gift to our subscribers, as set forth in the following:

It is an absolute fact. We are enabling our subscribers to form a valuable library at a nominal cost. One of them writes:

"I have your THIRTEEN premium books, which if I had bought in the open market at the usual price would have cost me at least $15. Sending each year for one copy at the cost of 25 cents, the whole thirteen volumes have cost me exactly $3.25. As you paid the postage thereon, which amounts to not less than $1.40, all you receive for the thirteen copies I have, is exactly $1.85, causing you to lose in the aggregate each year a large amount of money in order to benefit your subscribers."

The above is an accurate estimate. All we have received for the thirteen premium books when they have been ordered one at a time for thirteen consecutive years, is approximately $1.85, a little more than the price of a single book.

We now offer as a GIFT OUTRIGHT, one of the most valuable books of the present age—THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. In order to obtain this book, you must send TEN CENTS in stamps to pay the postage thereon, and ONE DOLLAR for The Progressive Thinker one year. Your library is not complete without this remarkable book. Every Spiritualist should have it for study and reference. Every orthodox Christian should read it, and thus learn the whole truth in regard to Jesus. Remember it is a GIFT to you on the TERMS MENTIONED above. We expect to distribute at least Twenty Thousand copies as GIFTS.

Have You Read OUR PREMIUM BOOK OFFER?

Truly, the world has NEVER SEEN the like before. Search the annals of history, ANCIENT AND MODERN; critically examine the history of Spiritualism; look here and there, in every nook and corner of the world, and you CANNOT find a parallel to the offer made in reference to these THIRTEEN remarkable PREMIUM BOOKS. They constitute a wonderfully valuable Spiritualistic and Occult LIBRARY, and are furnished at a nominal sum. All are substantially bound and neatly printed, and those who purchase them are DELIGHTED WITH THEM.

We have now THIRTEEN magnificent PREMIUM BOOKS which you can select from.

GEMS OF THOUGHT, by SEVENTEEN leading authors, is our last Premium Book.

Any one of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 25 cents. This is the price, remember, when you order only one book in connection with a yearly subscription. The paper, one year, and one Premium Book, $1.25. But if you order more than one Premium Book the price is as follows:

Any two of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 70 cents.
Any three of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.
Any four of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.
Any five of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.75.
Any six of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.05.
Any seven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.
Any eight of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.65.
Any nine of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.
Any ten of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.10.
Any eleven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.40.
Any twelve of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.85.

Lastly, all of these THIRTEEN Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for 4.15, something never before equalled in this country or Europe.

Bear in mind that every order for a Premium Book must be accompanied with a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker, which is $1. We repeat that the world has never seen the like of it before.

THE BIBLE

New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

The Poetical and Prose Works —BY— ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

Mrs. Wilcox's writings have been the inspiration of many young men and women. Her hopeful, practical, masterful views of life give the reader new courage in the very reading and are a wholesome spur to flagging effort. Words of truth so vital that they live in the reader's memory and cause him to think—to his own betterment and the lasting improvement of his own work in the world, in whatever line it lies—flow from this talented woman's pen.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

The Song Cards for sale at this office at $4 per hundred, are the help you need in society work.

Mattie E. Hull is continuing the work in San Jose, Cal., as had been arranged for herself and her arisen companion. Arrangements are being made for a course of lectures by Mrs. Hull in Los Angeles, commencing the first Sunday in March, and continuing four Sundays.

Mrs Anna L. Gillespie fills an engagement during March and April at Battle Creek, Mich. She would like to make a few more camp-meeting engagements. Mrs. Gillespie ranks high as a lecturer and medium. Address her at No. 321 South Highland avenue, Pittsburg, Pa.

Mrs. L. J. Curtis, inspirational speaker and teacher of occult science, is now located at 2330 Lincoln avenue, Denver, Colo., where she can be addressed. She has been highly recommended by Spiritualists in Lansing, Mich.

Miss Ada M. Came writes from Cambridge, Mass.: "The Cambridge Industrial Society of Spiritualists held its regular meeting, Feb. 8, in Cambridge Lower Hall, 631 Massachusetts avenue. Mr. James S. Scarlett, formerly of Cambridge, but now of New Bedford, was the speaker, and gave a most interesting lecture, followed by messages. Mr. Scarlett gives a good report of the society in New Bedford, which at present is in a flourishing condition. He has recently been elected president of that society.

Correspondent writes: JAMES E. COE, the old veteran Spiritualist, will celebrate his seventy-fifth birthday at Star Lodge Hall, No. 378 South Western avenue, on Saturday, evening, March 2, 1907, where he hopes to meet all his friends. There will be a fine musical program of old-time songs, recitations, short addresses, etc., by friends, and a fine collation served. Come one, come all."

Mrs. Sarah A. Crossfield writes: "I am serving the New Thought Society of Grand Rapids, Mich., for the months of February and March. I find the Spiritualists here are wide-awake, progressive and inspiring to a speaker or medium. The social part is a feature not overlooked in this society; in fact it is an all around live organization. I should judge that good workers have preceded me, and the seeds sown have taken root. We held a most interesting and well-attended meeting, Feb. 10, Mrs. Jackson following my lecture with messages, which were, with few exceptions, recognized. I consider Mrs. Jackson one of our honest and conscientious workers who should be kept constantly in the field. The friends may address me at No. 301 Twelfth avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, one of the few remaining survivors of the old school of Spiritualistic workers, whose home for thirteen years has been in Denver, Colo., has just got over another of those severe attacks of nervous and physical prostration, which since the two paralytic strokes he had in 1902, comes around periodically. Captain Walrond is in harness and on active service again.

Mrs. Alice Sexsmith writes: "Meetings of interest are still being conducted by the Christian Spiritualist Society every Sunday afternoon and evening. Each meeting brings new faces. We had as speaker, Feb. 3, and 10, Mr. H. R. Henay. He is a young man of 19, and is endowed with a power which only comes to those that lead a life of truth. His discourses are of a high order. He will address us again on Sunday evening, Feb. 24. Don't fail to hear him. Messages by Miss Thomas, Mrs. Susie Thompson and the writer were well received. Miss Thomas will conduct test circles in her own home, 389 West Madison street, every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Remember the meeting every Sunday afternoon and evening at 3 and 8 o'clock, at Conway Hall, Western avenue and Lake street, over drug store."

E. R. Kidd writes from Canton, Ohio: "My Progressive Thinker arrives weekly, and through it we are kept posted as to the work being done throughout the country in the ranks of Spiritualism. While we have some active workers here in Canton, we have no society. Cause—same old story—inharmony and lack of unity on the part of those who call themselves Spiritualists. Off and on some good medium comes to town for a few days, and at present Mrs. Nina C. Challen of Toledo, is in our city, having recently arrived from Sharon and Youngstown, where she did some excellent work. However, Mrs. Challon's stay in Canton will be of short duration, since she has been called to her home in Toledo where she as a rule is kept quite busy."

Wm. Hassmann, president, writes: "The Sunday evening meeting of the North Star Spiritual Union in its hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue, on Feb. 10, was largely attended. For the past two months untold numbers of strangers have visited our meetings, showing that Spiritualism and the unseen forces are forcing their way into homes where heretofore the knowledge of a life hereafter was unknown, or the angelic forces were not strong enough to inspire them to seek for the truth, and break away from pulpit promises. They join these gatherings in spiritual halls to get a message from their loved ones. Mrs. T. Mueller, the lecturer and medium, is doing grand work; her tests are praised by all. She has certainly done grand work on the Northwest Side, and has brought new life, love and harmony to many homes."

E. R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "The auxiliary of the First Association gave an entertainment, consisting of musical and literary selections. The Hatch Brothers of Dorchester, Mass., favored us with some comic sketches and musical selections. As they are professionals, we were treated to the best to be had. Mr. E. W. Sprague read a very unique poem entitled the 'Germ La Grippe.' This poem will be better appreciated by having Brother Sprague read it in German dialect. Mr. Allen Hodge and son Fred sang several comic songs which called for applause. The auxiliary is presided over by Mrs. Mary T. Longley, who is president of the auxiliary, and May Price, vice-president, and Mrs. Morgan, secretary. Mr. and Mrs. Newell White was given a surprise party by a number of their friends. Mr. and Mrs. Sprague are doing good work. Many have joined the association. The lyceum will give a masquerade party the last Saturday in the month. They hope for a large attendance, thereby encouraging the children."

Fred C. Suhrer writes: "The Fraternal Order of Spiritualists, Hygeia Hall, Dr. Alex Caird, president, are well attended, and on Sunday, February 16, a larger congregation than usual was present. The addresses by Rev. Thos. S. Warner and Mr. V. Howie were interesting and well received. Our supper committee is covering itself with glory, and surprised us with a "Valentine Supper." Our song service at 6:30 is receiving its share of appreciation and our concert at 7 o'clock displays some of the best talent in the city. The Hon. Charles E. Hughes lectured at 8 o'clock, taking "Nature" as his subject, which proved interesting and instructive. Our platform mediums for the 17th are Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs Barbara Hilbert, Mrs. J. Staner-Adams, and Mr. Chas. A. Thompson. Circles will be held as usual at 4 o'clock, giving everyone an opportunity to get a message. Come and get yours. Just tell the folks at home you won't be there for supper—stay for the evening and see what we give you for 15 cents. our concert alone being worth more than that. In the evening at 8, we will again be favored with an address by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. Don't miss this opportunity. The supper and socials of the Fraternal Daughters are becoming popular. They meet in the same building, 2nd floor, the 1st and 3rd Wednesdays each month. If you want a reading on a week day, there's the place to get it; also a good hot supper at 6:30

Mrs. Carter writes from Lexington, Ky.: "Mrs. A. E. Kibby of Cincinnati, has just finished her engagement of three months with the First Spiritual Temple of Newport, Ky., which was a very successful series of meetings. She will be in Lexington, Ky., during February and March. All mail should be addressed to her at 110 East Third street."

Hattie F. R. Peet writes: "The fourth of the series of the Illinois Sunflower Club dances will be given in Washington Hall, 70 Adams street, Monday evening, Feb. 25. Tickets 25 cents. Lunch will be served. All friends cordially invited to be present on these enjoyable occasions, whether you dance or not."

Rev. Alice Baker, state Missionary for Oklahoma, writes: "Spiritualists of Oklahoma, I am now making dates for a spring tour of the state. To those who have not written, either to the state board or myself, this is for you. Can you arrange for one or more meetings where you are? Write to me at once. Are you a member of the state association? If not, send name, address and $1 membership fee to R. G. Lee, secretary, Headrick, Okla., at once, and have a vote in the state meeting. Every Spiritualist in Oklahoma has a niche to fill, something to do. We have the light; let us let it shine. Write to me at once at my home address, 449 Live Oak street, Dallas, Texas."

S. A. Huntington writes from Malden, Mass.: "Sunday services, Feb. 10. The president presided at both sessions. At the 3 p. m. circle Mrs. Carter, Miss Morton and Mr. Berry occupied the whole session in voicing messages. The evening meeting, as usual, opened with praise, reading of scripture and invocation. Mrs. Annie R. Chapman of Brighton, Mass., was the speaker and message bearer. She prefaced her work with reading a poem entitled 'Love Thyself Last,' and chose the same for her theme, giving a very interesting address, after which she devoted an hour to giving messages. Mrs. Chapman is an interesting speaker and good message bearer. Mrs. Carrie H. Tainter of Manchester, N. H., will be the speaker on Sunday evening, Feb. 17, and Dr. C. L. Willis of Boston, Feb. 24. It is understood that Rev. F. A. Wiggin of Unity Church, Boston, will resume his work for the society on Thursday evening, Feb. 21."

James I. Mettler writes from Helena, Mont.: "I have had a stroke paralysis, affecting my left side, and compelling me to abandon writing any further articles on the Home Circle, for which I am sorry, for I had a number of interesting as well as instructive subjects I was holding in reserve, but it is too late. I am 68 years old and for forty years have been investigating Spiritualism."

Prof. E. E. Rex writes from Frankfort, Ind.: "We are holding services every Sunday, afternoon and evening, and while the audiences are small they seem to be appreciative, and we hope in time to have more than we can accommodate in the small hall we have secured, which seats only about 100; as yet it has been but half filled, and there is supposed to be over 400 Spiritualists in Frankfort. We hope many of our good friends in life will give us their best thoughts for success, and that our spirit friends will open the eyes of many here and show them the way to these meetings."

H. J. Cameron writes: "The Golden Rule Spiritualist Society held their usual Sunday services on the 10th of this month, at O'Donnell's College Hall, 43 S. Paulina street. The afternoon was devoted to short talks by the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, which were greatly appreciated, as were also the messages given by Mrs. Minnie Field, Mrs. Ingeldue and Mrs. Nora E. Hill. The speaker for the evening, Dr. J. H. Randall, being absent on account of illness, Mrs. Nellie Kusserow presided, and delivered an interesting address, the subject being, 'The Higher Development of Man.' The message bearers were the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill and Mrs. Kusserow. A beautiful solo selection was rendered, entitled, 'We Shall Know His Angel Name.' The society has noted with pleasure the steadily increasing attendance. The speaker for the next Sunday evening (Feb. 17) will be the Hon. Charles Hughes."

Boston Meetings.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society meets in Appleton Hall, 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass., every Friday.

The Ladies' Lyceum Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, Boston, Mass., every Wednesday.

The Ladies' Industrial Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, every Thursday.

Wanted by a business woman, three modern unfurnished housekeeping rooms, with liberal-minded people, or small flat. Address 40 Loomis street, Chicago.

Mid-Winter Mass-Meeting of the State Spiritual Association of Minnesota, February 22, 23 and 24, 1907, I. O. O. F. Hall, corner Wabasha and Fifth streets, St. Paul, Minn. An excellent programme throughout. A silver collection will be taken at the door for the afternoon and evening meetings. Dinner and supper will be served by the ladies in the dining room. You are requested to visit the sales tables of the Ladies' Aid. See your home agent as to reduced rates covering this period on all railroads.

T. J. Haynes writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "In the past I have written you about the good things we have been having in the spiritual line. Well, at the present we are having more. Mrs. Crossfield of Muncie, Ind., is with us, and also Mrs. F. V. Jackson of this city. Their work is fine, and too much cannot be said in their favor. We have large audiences in spite of the stormy weather, and they never have to go away disappointed. Mrs. Jackson has lived here a great deal of the time since 1888, and is well acquainted and has many friends who are glad to welcome her again to our city. Mrs. Crossfield came to us a stranger, but has made friends with all she has come in contact with. I can not speak in too high praise of their work."

The Tribune-Republican of Meadville, Pa., speaks as follows of Mrs. Cooley: "Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, delivered the fifth lecture of her present series Sunday night, under the auspices of the local Spiritualist society, and will give the closing lecture next Friday evening. The Sunday evening meeting was held in the main room of the Odd Fellows' temple and the room was packed to the doors. In the course of her talk Sunday evening Mrs. Cooley described a very remarkable experience. She said she was once summoned to the bedside of a lady friend who was dying ('passing to the other side'). Mrs. Cooley said that when she arrived at the bedside she found her friend so far gone that she could not recognize anybody, and as she, Mrs. Cooley, stood watching her, she saw her spirit pass out from the body. Mrs. Cooley said she (herself) passed into the clairvoyant state and in that condition followed the departing spirit until she had witnessed the complete transition from the mortal to the spirit life; had seen the departed spirit received on the other side. This very wonderful story was listened to with rapt attention. Following the lecture Mrs. Cooley received spirit messages, each of which was acknowledged to be recognized by some person in the audience."

Prof. Hyslop, well and favorably known in connection with the investigation of psychical matters connected with Spirit Return, was in the city last week. He is doing a great work along the lines of scientific investigation of occult phenomena.

J. W. Ring, after filling an engagement in Indiana, arrived in the city last Saturday on his way to St. Joseph, Mo., to occupy the rostrum there last Sunday. He then goes to Crystola, Colo.

The Illinois Sunflower Club holds meetings the second and fourth Tuesday of every month at Lincoln Hall, Fraternity Building, 70 E. Adams street, at 2 o'clock. The second Tuesday is the business meeting. The fourth Tuesday a social gathering when tea is served and the mediums read the cups.

Carrie L. Hatch, secretary, writes: "The Massachusetts State Association of Spiritualists will hold anniversary exercises in Berkeley Hall, 4 Berkeley street, Boston, Mass., on Tuesday, March 26, all day and evening. The best of speakers and mediums will be presented. Admission free. Full list of speakers will be printed later."

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale has an engagement at Galveston, Tex., for March. She is president of the State Association.

We regret to learn that Mr. G. H. Brooks, President of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association is dangerously sick in Milwaukee, Wis., and is under the care of a trained nurse. Let everyone send him cheering healththoughts, and assist in his recovery. Owing to his sickness he is compelled to cancel present engagements. Friends wishing to have meetings in the State will address the Secretary, Miss L. G. Loebel, 202 North avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.

C. L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies Aid Society met as usual, with the President, Mrs. Mattie E. A. Allk in the chair. The Valentine Supper proved a great success, each A. Allbe in the chair. The Valentine heart with varied sentiments pasted upon the same. The social hour after supper is always enjoyed by all. The evening exercise consisted of the following talent: Mrs. A. S. Waterhouse, Mrs. Hattie C. Mason, Mrs Lewis, Mrs. Steinen, and Mr. Blackstone. Mrs. Lewis sang two original songs, accompanying herself on the autoharp. Next Friday a Martha Washington Party will be held, and the evening will be devoted to a social time, dance and whist. Supper at six, p. m. Friday, March 1, Mrs. Kate R. Styles will give a benefit for the society, giving a short address, poems, and communications, and a rare treat is expected. Be sure and come."

Rev. A. P. Blinn, the popular pastor of the First Spiritual Union, Norwich, Ct., writes: "As mentioned in the letter from our secretary, published in a previous issue of The Progressive Thinker, this society by unanimous vote of the committee has given the writer a call to remain as its settled speaker for another year, the call having been accepted. As a matter of fact I could do nothing but accept when, ever since my work began here two years ago, every encouragement has been given me, and the members have been as earnest workers for success and as interested, as the speaker and most prominent officers. Harmony, good fellowship, and every support, moral and financial, is our working theory and it has spelled success. The young people are to present a drama on the evenings of March 7 and 8, entitled 'Above the Clouds' and are making elaborate arrangements for it. Special scenery is being built at an expense of over $50, and the play will be staged in a thoroughly artistic and up-to-date manner with appropriate costuming. Our services continue to attract good audiences each Sunday, both morning and evening, and our fortnightly suppers are always largely patronized. The lyceum is thriving and prosperous. On Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Feb. 20 and 21, the well known test medium, Mrs. S. C. Cunningham of Cambridge, Mass., will hold séances that will undoubtedly attract large audiences to the Academy, as her work for us before was very satisfactory. Our custom of presenting only the philosophy Sundays, and occasionally having a medium, but generally having the phenomena at week-evening services, has proved for the best interests of this society, and the excellent music rendered by our organist and quartette has met with general appreciation. At each service special mention is made of the splendid work of The Progressive Thinker, and we always have copies on hand for sale or distribution. It is a sign of progress when a society appreciates the spiritual press and cooperates with it."

A FRATERNAL ORDER.

With Some Side-thrusts at Certain Other Subjects.

I consider the above title a good one. The article by Alex Caird concerning the matter, I consider to be excellent in general.

I believe that the bible and Christianity, which have been such a curse to the world, should be excluded from Spiritualism entirely. Christianity has caused more war, bloodshed and strife in the world than anything and every thing else put together; and is still causing trouble in various parts of the earth. Missionaries are sent from the United States to China (who stir up trouble) to convert the "heathen," while at the same time, in the United States, lynching and burning people at the stake takes place. An American here was talking to a Mexican against bull fighting, stating that it was cruel, which the Mexican admitted, and said that they did not burn people here in Mexico at the stake. The American had no more to say upon the matter.

Mr. Caird favors worship. I consider worship to be idolatry, no matter what the object worshiped. What good would it do any being or power to be worshiped, and what good would it do the worshiper?

Spiritualists sometimes open their meetings with prayer. I do not believe that prayer has any effect further than upon the one who utters it, and those who hear it.

It does not look well to me, as is often the case, for a Spiritualistic writer to prefix "Rev." to his own name. WM. HART.

LETTER FROM ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

After Months of Needed Rest She Resumes Work.

After nearly three months of rest, the first in many years, I am about taking up the work again. Will lecture for the Battle Creek, Mich., society for the months of March and April. My address during the time will be 180 Calhoun street. Will answer calls for funerals through that section, also a few open dates for camp work and will be glad to hear from some needing my services during the camp season.

The home society here in Pittsburg, is in good condition, under the able President, Mr. C. Stevens, who is a splendid chairman and leader, aided by a most efficient and harmonious board. They have a church second to none. Since my coming home, have had the pleasure of listening to Mr. Brooks, who is a good lyceum worker. He was followed by Mrs. C. Fanny Allyn, Who was, like Mr. Brooks, so well appreciated they are to be with us another year. Mrs. Allyn is, as all know, a most capable lyceum leader, as well as lecturer. She was of great service in assisting the little lyceum which will soon, under the directorship of Miss Mary Clouse, be the Big Lyceum. It is wonderful how the movement is growing here. During Mrs. Allyn's stay she introduced many of her methods with good results. Miss Clouse is young in work, but you would not think so to see the able manner in which she attends to every duty. Mr. Oscar Edgerly is the speaker for the present month, and by his scholarly lectures is attracting large audiences who are delighted with his teaching.

The blind organist, Mr. Evans, takes care of the musical part of the work, and his songs are always a comfort and a pleasure to the listener. The months have gone by with lightning speed, and returning strength and courage is making me feel like a new woman, and I shall hope to be kept busy the rest of the year. Let me say in closing, how much we are enjoying the Great Work review by Brother Howe. Mr. Howe always writes in a manner to call the attention of the thinking readers, and we watch for it each week.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, Jan. 27, 1907, John Resch, a life long resident of Brooklyn, N. Y. For years he had been a Spiritualist, having been one of the founders of the Church of Divine Light. Dr. George Fuller of Onset, Mass., the well-known lecturer and author, officiated. Mr. Resch leaves two daughters, Miss Emma Resch, a medium of the Church of Divine Light, and who is widely known by her good Christian work, and Mrs. P. J. Loeb. COR.

Mrs. Charles V. Lively, aged 78 years and a resident of Salt Lake City, passed to spirit life early in the morning of the first of February, calm and peaceful in the arms of his only and true companion. The world at large makes much noise about the glory of those famous generals who earn their laurels on the battlefield of bloodshed, but this same world is silent about these heroes who encompassed by the darkness of selfishness, ignorance, superstition and hatred have to fight life's battle guided by their only star, the hope for a future life and more convenient conditions in a better world than the present. To that latter class of people belonged our brother Charles V. Lively, a man of stern conviction, strengthened by the experiences of a forty years belief in the Spiritualist principle, besides being a careful reader of The Progressive Thinker and other occultistic literature. Peace and happiness to his memory.

C. K. FLANDERKA.

Passed to spirit life, at 10:20 a. m., Feb. 5, 1907, Brother Henry Bass, aged 70 years, at his residence, 1802 Virginia avenue, Joplin, Mo. Father Bass was a devoted Spiritualist. Nine years ago he arranged for a Spiritualist funeral and engaged the writer to hold the service. Being an old resident of Joplin, a very large attendance at the funeral proved the esteem in which the deceased was held. Death came a sweet release to the wearied soul. SARA C. SCOVELL.

Mrs. Louisa Eckhardt, wife of Herman Eckhardt, passed to spirit life from her home in Canton, Ohio, Feb. 6, 1907, from paralysis, aged 67 years. She was born in Mullheim Baden, Germany. She was a dutiful wife and mother, a Spiritualist for over twenty years, and a regular reader of The Progressive Thinker.

Mary J. Lindsey, of Grand Rapids, Mich., aged 64, passed to spirit life on January 20. She was a medium from birth, and gladly welcomed the call, 'Come home." She was a genial companion, a hospitable, sympathetic friend, with a heart keenly sensitive to the sorrows of all.

K. L. CHILDS.

WANTS A STATEMENT VERIFIED.

A Lady of Jamestown, N. Y. in Search of Information.

I was born in Batesville, Panola, county, Miss., as far as I know, but as to whom were my real parents I have always had a doubt. I was taught to believe that Dr. Jesse A. Bounds and wife were my father and mother.

They were kind in their way, but from my earliest infancy I perceived a difference in their treatment of me. There was that tender affection for the others that I missed. I was never taken in their arms and caressed as were the rest; never had playthings like the rest, and yet their own were denied an education that I might have a thorough training in the best of schools. They were poor as thousands of other Southern people were after the war, for they were of the oldest aristocracy of the South. Like many another girl, I sometimes demurred when it came to going to school. At such times I was told that I must perfect my education in order that some day I might be fitted to occupy my rightful position in society. Once in an angry mood mother told me that I was not their child, or rather she said that I was not her child. If I was not her child, I know that I was not a child of the Doctor, for there was a girl older than I, the best beloved of that family.

Another curious thing—I was called Agnes Valentine Bounds, but told that, when only three days old, a physician friend of father had adopted me, and that in all legal papers I must sign or prefix by hyphen the name of Pearson. I never saw this Dr. Pearson, but just before my marriage father wrote him, and he wrote me a very kindly letter. He was then very aged. I was married near Little Rock, Ark., and shortly after moved North. I have never from that day to this seen one of my people, and all that I then knew have passed beyond. Just before father's death he called me repeatedly, but none let me know of his illness until he was buried. Now comes the strange part of my story, and I would like to verify it if I can. I was not a Spiritualist, and did not believe in mediumship, but was recently persuaded to visit a medium. Before this I know positively that none knew of my history, for it is contrary to my nature to be very communicative. She told me that someone was looking for me, a man and a woman; that during the war my father and the one I thought my father became separated in the heat of battle, each thinking the other killed; that my own father heard of my mother's death, and did not know of my birth until years after, for it seems that my people had lived in Maryland and migrated to Mississippi after the war. She says the doctor had a purpose in educating me to fit a position that even he considered above himself. This would seem so strange to me, for I thought him a king among men.

I am all alone in the world, a physician by profession. I need no one to care for me, for I have had my share of success, but there may be some one whom I may comfort, and I am so lonely. This medium said that I could prove what she said to be true by publishing this in The Progressive Thinker. I am told I was born February 14, 1867. Dr. Bounds was a surgeon in the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia, ranking as captain.

The World Has Never Seen the Like!

At Great Expense we have secured the copyright of Mr. Ghandi's translation of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." It is to be sent forth as a gift to our subscribers, as set forth in the following:

It is an absolute fact. We are enabling our subscribers to form a valuable library at a nominal cost. One of them writes:

"I have your THIRTEEN premium books, which if I had bought in the open market at the usual price would have cost me at least $15. Sending each year for one copy at the cost of 25 cents, the whole thirteen volumes have cost me exactly $3.25. As you paid the postage thereon, which amounts to not less than $1.40, all you receive for the Thirteen copies I have, is exactly $1.85, causing you to lose in the aggregate each year a large amount of money in order to benefit your subscribers."

The above is an accurate estimate. All we have received for the thirteen premium books when they have been ordered one at a time for thirteen consecutive years, is approximately $1.85, a little more than the price of a single book.

We now offer as a GIFT OUTRIGHT, one of the most valuable books of the present age—THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. In order to obtain this book, you must send TEN CENTS in stamps to pay the postage thereon, and ONE DOLLAR for The Progressive Thinker one year. Your library is not complete without this remarkable book. Every Spiritualist should have it for study and reference. Every orthodox Christian should read it, and thus learn the whole truth in regard to Jesus. Remember it is a GIFT to you on the TERMS MENTIONED above. We expect to distribute at least Twenty Thousand copies as GIFTS.

Have You Read OUR PREMIUM BOOK OFFER?

Truly, the world has NEVER SEEN the like before. Search the annals of history, ANCIENT AND MODERN; critically examine the history of Spiritualism; look here and there, in every nook and corner of the world, and you CANNOT find a parallel to the offer made in reference to these THIRTEEN remarkable PREMIUM BOOKS. They constitute a wonderfully valuable Spiritualistic and Occult LIBRARY, and are furnished at a nominal sum. All are substantially bound and neatly printed, and those who purchase them are DELIGHTED WITH THEM.

We have now THIRTEEN magnificent PREMIUM BOOKS which you can select from.

GEMS OF THOUGHT, by SEVENTEEN leading authors, is our last Premium Book.

Any one of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 25 cents. This is the price, remember, when you order only one book in connection with a yearly subscription. The paper, one year, and one Premium Book, $1.25. But if you order more than one Premium Book the price is as follows:

Any two of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 70 cents.
Any three of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.
Any four of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.
Any five of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.75.
Any six of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.05.
Any seven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.
Any eight of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.65.
Any nine of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.
Any ten of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.10.
Any eleven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.40.
Any twelve of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.85.

Lastly, all of these THIRTEEN Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for 4.15, something never before equalled in this country or Europe.

Bear in mind that every order for a Premium Book must be accompanied with a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker, which is $1. We repeat that the world has never seen the like of it before.

THE BIBLE

New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

The Poetical and Prose Works —BY— ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

E. R. M.: Q. I am told that I am a medium. I write readily, and the dial planchette moves freely, spelling messages and answers, yet I know before what my hand writes and the words as they are being spelled. I cannot tell whether it is myself or not.

A. This correspondent meets with an experience which has created doubts in the minds of many, even those who are the best mediums. Mrs. Underwood, one of the most marvelous automatic writers, mentions the fact in her book containing the writings she thus received. Sometimes she was pre-conscious of whole sentences before they were written. Yet she could not keep her hand from writing, or change the phraseology. My own experience emphasizes this experience.

I cannot explain this subject more clearly than has been already done by the spirits themselves in "Mediumship," page 100, which I quote:

"This cognizance of the thoughts as they are written is common to all mediums in a greater or lesser degree, and reflection on the method of communication will show any one that such must be the fact. The spirit does not directly take hold of the arm and use it as a writer would a pen. The influence must be exerted through the brain of the medium and hence his mind, however passive, will be cognizant in greater or less degree of the thoughts of the controlling intelligence."

It may be difficult for the medium to distinguish his own thoughts from those received by inspiration, especially when that inspiration is given by the spirit intensifying the activity of the brain, instead of through passivity of the will. There is always this means, however, which is conclusive. The character of the communications and answers, often so different from what the medium normally would or could give, indicating a variety of individualities, and if continued through many seances, demonstrating identity of the spirits claiming to communicate, is strong and sufficient evidence that the mentality exhibited is distinct from the medium.

In automatic and inspirational writing, with this light thrown on them, it will be seen that there is always liability of the medium's thoughts blending with, shading, or distorting those inflowing. Only when the process is most favorably conditioned will there be perfect transmission, often so perfect that the handwriting of itself will guarantee the genuineness of the writing.

To succeed, one should allow the hand to move freely, and not hesitate and question, if he knows what it is writing. If there are mistakes, pass them by as a school-boy his illegible attempt. The communications written are of themselves the best evidence.

If a spirit comes and writes understandingly of matters you know nothing about, in science, affairs or business, signing a perfect autograph, would you hesitate in acceptance of the conclusion that the writing was by an independent personality?

The theory has been proposed that such fact may be, and are accounted for by "recurring memory"—that is, that the mind had at some time received these impressions and forgotten, and the seance revived them. But impressions never received can not be forgotten nor can they "recur." It is true the mind is a wondrous storehouse and experiences seemingly passed from memory, often flash up vividly from whence we know not, yet this by no means justifies us in saying that for every thought which thus comes we have had an experience.

Peter Wickstrom: Q. (1) The command is, to love thy neighbor as thyself, and love thy enemy; one may love his neighbor, but how can he love an enemy?

(2) What is the difference between belief and knowledge? For instance I have investigated and studied Spiritualism until to me it is a positive fact, beyond possibility of doubt. When asked if I believe in it, what shall I say?

A. (1) It is impossible for one to feel the same responsive love for an enemy as for a friend, for love is based on reciprocity, similarity, and responsiveness. Yet the mind may be so trained in its spiritual qualities as to feel none of the lower desires for revenge, and the return of blow for blow. We may put ourselves in our enemy's place, understand his views and overlook his antagonism with divine charity. If the command has a meaning it must be this. We cannot command our love to accept disagreeable and hateful things; but we can school ourselves to charity and not to scorn and hate.

In its bold significance as understood and taught by sermonizers, this command like many others is as it would be for the sun to shine into the recesses of a cavern. Its reception by the Christian churches gave rise to the dogma of non-resistance of evil, one of the most harmful and pernicious of pernicious dogmas. It agreed with Oriental apathy, but when it came to the sturdy common sense of the western nations it was practically ignored, and while serving to impress the Christ doctrine, is no more than a rhetorical flourish.

It is illustrated after almost 2,000 years of preaching by the countless millions of money spent in armament for war, cannon, fortifications, armored navies, and several million men, drawn up to defend the borders of each kingdom, anxiously waiting the command to murder each other!

All along these 2,000 years Christians have loved their enemies so well, they have torn them limb from limb, kept them in loathsome dungeons, put them on the rack, roasted them with fagots, all in Christ's dear name, and for the fraternal love to save them from worse torments in the world to come! It was a business only men believing in loving their enemies could engage in. Only the promise of saving souls from perdition could have raised up a crop of such demons! From any orthodox church in this blessed country to-day you can easily select a dozen or score of men who, given the power, would re-enact the scenes of the bloodiest days of the inquisition. The world moves and there are continually a greater number on the side of freedom of thought, but there is always present the stolid unchanging element and reversion to the savage type. Often with parents eminent as scientists and of the most liberal views one child will mature into a religious enthusiast, as bigoted as those of the Dark Ages.

The Quakers or Friends, made the doctrine of loving their enemies and non-resistance a corner-stone of their religion, and failed because in this world, it is impractical. Why? Because the brute can only be held in abeyance by force, and the savage,—and all criminals are reverts to savage life—cannot be met by love alone. Love must have force back of it. No law or command has any value except there is within it the power to enforce. This is best seen in Nature where every law, to the least, is enforced with infinite energy.

(2) There is the widest difference between belief and knowledge. Belief is simply a person's opinion, faith; and is often strongest when there is least foundation for it.

A child believes in Santa Claus because his parents, in whom he has confidence, tells him the wondrous tale. Mankind have believed the wonder-myths of the various religious systems, because the priests, in whom they had confidence, said these myths were true. Were any of these dogmas of religions demonstrated to be true they would become knowledge. They never have been, never can be, and hence are "faiths," matters of belief, in which the belief of one man is as authoritative as another. It was belief that the sun revolved around the earth; it is knowledge that the earth revolves around the sun.

If an astronomer was asked what his belief was in regard to this matter, he would answer, "I have no belief; I know. It is not faith with me; it is knowledge, demonstrated by unerring mathematics.

If Mr. Wickstrom has arrived at that point where he knows Spiritualism to be true, he has long passed the initial period of belief; he can only truthfully say: "I know."

An Effort to Purify Our Ranks

Mr. Paul McArthur, the Efficient President of the Missouri State Spiritualists' Association, Gives some Items of News That Will Prove an Object Lesson for Spiritualists Everywhere to Consider, and Will Arouse Them as Never Before.—President McArthur is to be Congratulated on the good work He Has Been Doing.

To the Editor:—If any further experience had been necessary to convince me of the importance and vital necessity for the good of Spiritualism of a systematic campaign being waged against those who use our religion as a cloak to cover questionable practices, it was furnished me a short time ago.

When over a year ago, one known as August Ries, alias Jno. A. Ries, landed in St. Louis, and in the name of a Universal Spiritual Association, peddled ordination certificates at $10.00 each, I am informed that Josie K. Folsom-Stewart, Allan Drumm, Katherine Graham, Mrs. N. Cameron, and Carrie M. Sawyer purchased. Some of the friends brought me word and were greatly excited over the matter and wanted me to take steps to find out by what authority he was able to thus WHOLESALE ordanations.

At the time I thought it was up to the people who were buying these certificates to find out whether they were getting VALUE RECEIVED, and stated that in view of the fact that all who had purchased had been either EXPELLED from organized Spiritualism for questionable practices or had never been permitted to hold membership, that it was (in my opinion) the best thing that could have happened: The sheep and the goats would be separated and we would then be able to show the public the difference between practical common sense Spiritualism lived out and the kind these speculators were using as a means to an end and that end THE COINING OF THE HEART YEARNINGS OF THE MOURNERS INTO DOLLARS AND CENTS. Whether my opinion was correct may be judged from recent occurrences.

Six weeks ago Sister E. B. Price, pastor of the Spiritual Research Society of this city, related to me the following: A young orphan girl, went to one of the Ries brand of reverends, Allan Drumm, who, however, has several other names that he uses on convenient occasions, one especially under which he banks the money he receives from the dupes whom he bleeds in the name of their angel loved ones; but to my tale: The young girl wanted a reading; she needed the advice of her loved ones to strengthen her in her hour of temptation. A man whom she loved was endeavoring to seduce her under promise of marriage. Mark you, ye fraud sympathizers, the spirit "friends" of this poor girl, it is alleged, spoke through the "Reverend" and told her to yield her honor up, it would be all right, and that the man would marry her.

The girl (poor weak, ignorant soul) heeded the advice and is to-day a deserted, ruined outcast, whom good Sister Price was treating without cost.

When I heard that tale I vowed I would have Drumm punished (if it cost me all I had). Sister Price was to get the girl's address for me so that I could get all the necessary facts, but the girl disappeared without leaving a trace behind and for awhile I was in despair.

About this time Ries again landed in town and the first news I heard was, that he had ordained for $10 that poor, ignorant, easy mark, whom I wrote you of a few months ago, who had been duped with bogus spirit pictures by a Mrs. Milleron.

This woman (who cannot speak plain English) was made to believe by Ries that by and through this certificate she would be made a bright and shining star on the Spiritualist rostrum; that the barriers which the State Association had erected against promiscuous ordination would be thrust aside, and they would be compelled to do her justice (?), place her on their platforms and listen reverently to the words of wisdom (?) which would fall from her inspired lips. Even the railroads would scramble for the privilege of giving her half-rate fares over their roads. She bit.

When Brother Grimshaw and myself waited on the woman for the purpose of learning, if possible, the address of Ries, we found the poor soul in the seventh heaven over her new toy. She declared she would prove worthy of the trust placed in her, offered to assist Mr. Grimshaw with his meetings, and also tendered to me for the State Association her services, and insisted on reading to us some of her inspirational writing while controlled by a very "high" spirit. If the writings were a sample of the wisdom of the spheres, about the quicker we hang up the receiver the better.

We finally secured Ries' address and went at once to his headquarters. He was stopping in a cheap lodging house on Morgan street, in company with a young woman he introduced to us as his wife.

We asked by what authority he was enabled to sell with such disregard to character and ability, religious ordinations. He produced certificates of incorporation granted a Universal Spiritual Association by the Cook County Circuit Court. The names of some of the applicants were, Aug. Ries, president; Fred N. S. Solsem, M. D., secretary; Lucy A. Hodge Koonz, and others, whose names I do not remember.

Mr. Grimshaw remarked to Ries that while his papers might be all right, yet they had not been granted his association for the purpose of peddling ordination certificates to all who had the price, irrespective of mental or moral qualifications, and could be canceled on proof of such misuse.

I told him that I was after one of his reverends (without mentioning the name) and might land him in jail for his methods. He at once declared that he (Ries) was all right, that that he had simply made a mistake in ordaining Drumm and Josie K. Folsom Stewart, and was going to revoke both of their ordinations.

When we left he hurried at once to Drumm (as I aftermards found out) and warned him to look out as we were evidently after him. From there he went to Mrs. Bertha Lippman, a woman who is Roman Catholic in belief, but a medium for the sake of the coin. She is about of the same mental calibre as the one I first mentioned, and who want ordination because it would assist to draw in the suckers. Ries told her he had received letters from Minneapolis from people who wanted ordination, and must leave town at once so that if she wished to be ordained she must cough up. She coughed, and he left for green fields and new suckers. It is up to the Illinois Association to get their papers canceled.

On December 24, in the afternoon, a lady came to my home and said she was looking for Mr. McArthur. I pleaded guilty to being the party and she said: "Mr. McArthur, I have been deceived by Allan Drumm for over one year. He has such an influence over me that I gave him money, help him commit questionable acts, SECURE INFORMATION ABOUT PEOPLE FOR HIM, in fact, do anything HE COMMANDS ME. I want to break away and need your help. I know you have no use for Drumm, for I have heard him curse and denounce you as a fraud-hunter. I asked her in and drew out the following story:

About one year ago the lady, Mrs. Rose Cordes by name, of 4052 Shenandoah street, was induced to attend a trumpet seance at Allan Drumm's home, 804 No. Jefferson avenue, by a lady friend. It was a dark circle (of course) and she being an uneducated impressible woman was carried away and became a regular attendant at his developing circles. Having some property, the income of which enables her to live quite comfortably, she became an easy mark for Drumm. His guides told her that Allan's clothes were too shabby, and ordered her to buy him a new outfit, which she did. Next his coal and furniture bill became due, and she was ordered to pay them; she obeyed. Next she had a piece of property that she wanted to dispose of, and again she was commanded by the guides to let Drumm sell it and earn the commission. She agreed, and left the matter in his hands for several weeks without results. Finally she put it in the hands of a real estate agent who sold it, whereupon the guides said that they had brought about the whole sale, and she must give Drumm the $100 as agreed. She rebelled, as she had already paid the agent, and told them that she was afraid to do so on account of her husband (who was a skeptic). They replied that they would fix him, and wanted her to give him some powders which their medium would prepare under their direction; she refused. After several weeks' nagging from the guides (?) who scored her for her lack of faith, she handed over the money. From that time on she was a helpless infant in Drumm's hands, and obeyed him without question.

He was challenged by a skeptic to hold a test seance where he (the skeptic) could hold Drumm's hands during the trumpet manifestation. He agreed as he wanted the man's money, and told Mrs. Cordes she must work the trumpet in his stead, and told her what to say and do. She obeyed.

Another time he was to hold a seance in East St. Louis for some investigators, and ordered her to go over and endeavor to secure all the information possible regarding their history, number of deaths, etc. He told her he was a genuine medium, all right, but that the spirits were weak and needed assistance.

Her husband about that time lost his position, and when she refused HIM money he pawned his watch for $10. When she found it out she made him give her the ticket, and Drumm, on learning that it was valuable solid gold, time piece, commanded her to give it to him; he would redeem it, and whenever her husband wanted it, she could pay him, and he would turn it over to her. She did so and whenever she has since tried to redeem it, he has asked her what she wanted it for? "You would only lose it, or your husband pawn it again. The angels want me to have it," and that has settled the matter.

This "medium" (according to Mrs. Cordes) has quite a number of weak-minded women, and one or two young men who attend his so-called developing circles (?) and obey his instructions.

It is alleged that he has been married six times. Two of his former wives live here, and both denounce him bitterly. Two young girls (whose names and addresses I have) were badly treated by him, while at his home for a reading. A peculiar feature is, that the mother of one of the girls, although aware of the insult, is apparently unable to break away, and still attends his developing circles.

In the name of common sense, what kind of development can she hope to attain through such channels? Here is the charm he sells to negroes and ignorant whites at $10. There are some "mystical" figures with the charm which reads as follows:

"THE GOOD, WISE AND CELESTIAL SPIRITS PROTECT FROM ALL HARM THE WEARER OF THIS CHARM."

Besides this, he has quite a trade in love powders, a bottle of which we have as an exhibit for the trial.

After listening to this mass of filth, I told her to come with me and we would get a warrant out for his arrest. She refused and said she did not want to publish to the world how weak, guilty and foolish she had been. Her husband, too, was not aware of how much money Drumm had tricked out of her, and she was afraid if he knew it he would leave her. At last she agreed to prosecute Drumm on condition that I would break the news to her husband, to which I gladly consented. The day after Christmas, Brother W. F. Peck (whom I invited to accompany me) and myself set forth; we found her husband to be a plain, unassuming man, crippled in one limb. He was overjoyed at the news that his wife had woke up, that he said but little about the money she had been induced to part with. He was in hearty accord with Brother Peck and myself regarding the prosecution of Drumm.

The End—The Penitentiary.

Since the above was written the St. Louis Post Dispatch, of February 8, contains the following, the end of Drumm's career in St. Louis:

"Spirits Use Trumpets to Cheat Woman. Prof. Drumm Is Given Two Years in Prison on Charge of Fraud."

The St. Louis Star-Chronicle of same date, says:

"Victim's Plea Fails to Save Prof. Drumm, Who Gets Two Years. Spiritualist Convicted of Unlawfully Obtaining $100 From Mrs. Rose Cordes Who Turns Trial Into a Farce."

MY MOTHER'S TREASURE BOX.

Fond memories live within this dear old box,
So quaintly fashioned, with such tiny locks,
And small white knobs upon the drawers below,
That when a child I ofttimes sought to know
What it contained, and in its recess peer
To find the wondrous gems that seemed so dear
To mother's heart—alas! they all are gone,
And I possess the dear old box alone.

Now other treasures in the box are hid,
There are no little hands to lift the lid,
No prying eyes in wonderment to view
The mystic gems as I once used to do;
But over all there hangs a magic spell,
And each fond relic doth a story tell;
Again I roam through vistas of the past—
Sweet dreams and visions all too bright to last.

Here is a bow of ribbon trimmed with lace,
This is a picture of a pretty face,
And underneath are letters tied with blue,
On one is written, "Will you still be true?"
Here is an old song with a sweet refrain;
(Oh! how it brings the old days back again;)
And here a locket with a broken spring,
And in this casket, mother's wedding ring.

Some verses marked, entitled "Sunny Hours,"
And in this little box are faded flowers;
A silken badge, a colored Meerschaum pipe,
A soiled white fan, an old daguerreotype—
A bookmark "Think of Me." a ring of hair,
And here are gewgaws from a fancy Fair,
A tarnished epaulet; ah, me! ah, me!
I'll hide them all away and turn the key.

What magic with unhidden power holds swey?
Who is the Genii of the bok to-day?
W / breathes from every token some regret—
And why no Lethe waters, to forget?
Not smiles nor tears the memories can efface;
I see some witchery in every place.
Whate'er my destiny; come joy or pain,
Still like Pandora's box, let hope remain.

Now draw the veil; I'll dream no more to-day;
Hope on, faint heart, and firmly tread the way,
For "all the world's a stage:" I'll learn my part
And strive to play it with a cheerful heart.
The summer days with sunshine and with showers
Will bring again the song-birds and the flowers,
And when the curtain falls, the last act o'er,
May I be welcomed at the new stage door.

MENTAL PYROTECHNICS.

Some Opinions Expressed in Verse and Prose.

To the Editor:—I take The Progressive Thinker to please myself, and give you credit for being impartial as far as one can afford to be who has an axe to grind. But if you expect me to endorse the N. S. A. or any other system of priestcraft, I will simply say, "A burnt child dreads the fire."

I noticed lately some of your most advanced spiritual thinkers and writers speak respectfully of the great Medium of Nazareth. As I see it, it is impossible to strike the key note of a safe Spiritualism through any other medium.

While it is interesting to read and note the various mental pyrotechnics that egotistical God-makers use, it is more interesting to me to note that such a savant as N. F. Ravlin, have I the name correct?) quotes an ancient Indian as the source from whence he got these divine precepts. This was of uncommon interest, and I am waiting to hear more from him.

This ancient Indian may have been one of the wise men from the East that saw the star over the stable at Bethlehem and came to worship the child in the manger.

I enclose a squib in rhyme in my line of thought. Also $1 for renewal of subscription and 10 cents in stamps for that gift.

THE BETTER WAY.

There is a better way
Than living here in sin;
Just imitate the Christ
And you are sure to win;
Not in houses and land,
Nor bonds at twelve per cent,
But in a useful life
And heart in sweet content.

Hold steadfast to the truth,
Maintain your self-respect,
Be patient with the frauds,
Ignore both creed and sect;
Progress is being made,
Whether we will or not,
So do not be afraid
To do right on the spot.

Two forces are at work,
We call them good and evil,
But this is evolution
Instead of God and Devil.
We are so constituted,
That happiness and health
Depend on being good
Instead of getting wealth.

Christ solved this problem just (About) two thousand years ago.
No one will call it false
And we believe 'tis true;
Priestcraft and sophistry
Have loaded it with creed,
And used as a hobby
To ride us they have need.

The spirit of the Christ
Is potent everywhere.
It frees the present life
From darkness and despair;
It opens up to view
Of future life and bliss,
And says our God is love,
And, I believe he is!

The Next N. S. A. Convention

The Next One Will Be Held in Washington, D. C.—The Californians Gracefully Yield the Point.

The following letters, published by order of the Executive Board of the California State Spiritualists' Association, are self-explanatory.

N. S. A. Headquarters, Washington, D. C., December 2d, 1906.

To Officers and Members of the Board of the California State Spiritualists Association; California at Large:—Dear Friends and Co-workers:—It gives me much pleasure to extend to you, one and all the sincere tnd Cordial Greetings of the N. S. A. Trustees and to assure you of our commendation of your constant good work for the Cause of Spiritualism and your loyalty to the N. S. A. We recognize your value to us and to humanity and can never cease to be grateful for all you have done for the Cause of Truth. Our best wishes for your continued success and progress are extended to you.

I am instructed at this time by the N. S. A. Executive Board of Trustees to ask your reconsideration of a grave and important question;; viz: the placing of location for the next convention of this National Body.

In view of the following facts we earnestly and urgently plead with you as a body to withdraw your invitation to the N. S. A. to meet in assembly at Los Angeles or any point in your glorious State in October, 1907.

We ask this because the expense to the N. S. A. will be more than One Thousand dollars—one trustee alone from Los Angeles to Chicago and return at last convention cost one hundred and twenty dollars to the N. S. A.—which was a low figure; the N. S. A. will have to pay for eight of its officers, five of whom will be transported from far east of Ohio.

The average cost to the N. S. A. of its trustees to last convention was sixty dollars each.

We ask that you reconsider the invitation and vote for Washington, D. C., because the N. S. A. hopes by 1908 to be richer in treasury than now and to better afford going west; also because 1907 the Jamestown Exposition will be held in Norfolk, Va., and R. R. rates will be very cheap all over the country to this section—excursion tickets will have stop-over privileges at Washington, D. C. and all the delegates can come here to convention at a small fare.

We ask, because every convention since 1903 his promised that the city in which exists our Headquarters and in the District of which the N. S. A. is incorporated, should have the convention every once in two or at most three years.

We also ask you to withdraw invitation for 1907, because at time of voting for location, many delegates were absent from meeting a good percentage of whom had started for their homes after receiving their vised R. R. tickets on Friday, that they might be at their posts on the following Sunday—had the location vote come up in regular order—in place of being delayed by election of officers taking precedence of Constitutional routine, the members absent at night session would have been present to cast their vote.

Important changes at home office in 1907—including the placing of a new Secretary therein—seems to demand that the convention should be held in Washington.

The majority of the N. S. A. have voted to appeal to a Referendum for place of next Convention, objections have been made by two that it may not be Constitutional to do so; a competent Lawyer in the District of Columbia, where the N. S. A. has been incorporated, has been consulted by our Executive Board and he renders his opinion that an appeal can be taken from decision and the delegates can be asked to cast another vote.

Before resorting to such appeal the N. S. A. Board has decided to petition our good friends of California—through their State Association—to kindly and generously withdraw their right and title to the next Convention and to allow the same to be held at Washington, D. C.

We trust to receive a favorable answer through your State Secretary at an early day.

With Cordial Greetings to you, one and all; Fraternally yours,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

California's Answer.

Headquarters California State Spiritualists' Association, Room 108, 223 W. Second Street, Los Angeles, Cal., January 5, 1907.

Mary T. Longley, Secretary, and the Officers and Members of the National Spiritualists' Association, Washington, D. C.:—Dear Friends and Co-Workers: Acknowledging the receipt of your communication under date of December 20, 1906, requesting the State Spiritualists Association of California to withdraw its invitation upon which was based a resolution of the late N. S. A. Convention at Chicago, Ill., to hold the Annual Convention for 1907 at Los Angeles, Cal.; The Secretary of said State Association was instructed by the Board of Directors to reply as follows:

At a regular meeting of said Board held on Saturday, January 5, 1907, your communication and its request were thoroughly and impartially considered, and the following decision and the reasons therefor were ordered to be forwarded to you:

In the first place; your many protestations of friendship and esteem and best wishes for our success, etc., have been, we hope, received in exactly the same spirit in which they were tendered, and we also trust, have been accepted at their full true value. Had they been received under different circumstances, the motives which prompted them would have been more fully reciprocated, and their value greatly enhanced. But standing as the prelude to a request for us not only to relinquish an unquestionable right of ours, but also to ignore the unquestioned rights of others for reasons that seem to us entirely inadequate, they amount to little more than the customary sugar coating to a very bitter pill.

The great cost of transportation; the implied promise to hold Biennial or Triennial Conventions at Washington, D. C.; the contemplated change in Headquarters management; the slim attendance when the vote on location was taken, and all the facts urged by you as justifications for our withdrawal, were all well known to the delegates when the vote was taken, and were doubtless considered by them; nor was this Association nor the Spiritualists of this Coast in any way responsible for these obstructions. If they counted for nothing then why should they now?

The further fact that the vote on location was postponed until such an inopportune hour, was not caused by the connivance or suggestion of the California Delegation, and is in no sense a sufficient excuse for disregarding the expressed will and wish of those acting at the meeting; for the reason that it was the organic representative of the N. S. A., acting in a business capacity, and in the absence of undue influence or ballot stuffing, the vote then taken has the same force and effect in law and in ethics as though taken earlier in the proceedings. And no assurance has been or can be given by anyone but what the result would have been the same at any other hour.

You ask us to coolly disregard this expressed wish of the Delegates who voted there, believing they were advancing the best interests of the Cause.

The opinion of a lawyer was not to inform us of the fact that those choosing the location by their legal votes are the ones having the right to rescind that choice and make another selection; and yet you ask us to withdraw OUR invitation AND VOTE FOR WASHINGTON, D. C.

Upon what do you base that request? State Associations and local societies have no more rights in the matter than the Mormon Church or the Sultan of Sulu.

Their legal representative acted legally and within the scope of their delegated authority; and while there may be some question about their right to annul that vote and name a new location at this date, after the Organic Body in which they acted has been dissolved, there can be no question whatever as to the State and local societies. They have absolutely no right to interfere. Hence, without impugning the motives of anyone, and suggesting none but the kindliest and most filial sentiments, we feel constrained to ask, where would be the use of a Delegate Convention adopting any measure if the official head of the Organization can annul it at pleasure?

Therefore, waiving entirely all the considerations urged by you as reasons binding upon us, let us direct your attention to other matters.

Your wish to have that vote rescinded, and the next convention held at Washington has been widely discussed in the Spiritualist and other journals, and the proposed disregard of the expressed wish of the Chicago Convention is well known to the Spiritualists on the Western Coast, and has by no means been favorably received or commented upon. The expressions of satisfaction and enthusiasm with the announcement was received that the next Annual National Convention would be held on this Coast, have not only been silenced, but are being supplemented by expressions of disgust, disappointment and indifference. A careful canvass of the situation convinces us that it would be unwise to attempt to thwart your cherished ambition.

It was not the State Association alone that invited your presence here; but the City Council, the Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association joined in the invitation, while other societies and organizations readily pledged assistance in the enterprise.

The State Association and the cause it represents had received a damaging blow from the April disaster, and not only we, the recognized Spiritualists, but friends of the cause outside felt a grand inspiration and upliftment would be gained by having the Organic Center, the "brains," so to speak, of the movement, strengthen the Cause here by their presence. This has all vanished into thin air. We feel confident that the promised assistance will not now be forthcoming. The kindly buoyant feeling which prevailed is gone, and our bright hopes have withered under the blight of the shadow cast by the Almighty Dollar.

Now, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter."

For reasons that WE deem good and sufficient, We, the Board of Directors of the California State Spiritualists Association do hereby formally withdraw the invitation extended to the National Spiritualists Association to hold its Annual Convention for 1907 at Los Angeles, California, and do hereby consent that said Convention may be held anywhere the Trustees of the N. S. A. may name. But we emphatically decline to vote in favor of the same being held in Washington, D. C. or any other locality; as that act is not within the scope of our authority as an Association, and we have no wish to encroach upon the prerogatives of the Trustees of the said National Spiritualists' Association.

With cordial greetings to all.

By order of the Board of Directors of the California Stat Spiritualists' Association J. L. DRYDEN, Sec'y.

THE SPIRIT HOME.

The home of the spirit is where we shall dwell,
Surrounded by pleasures no mortal
can tell,
No sickness nor pain, neither sorrow
nor care,
No cloud from the earth ever wearies us there.
Home, home, spirit home,
We're freed from all care in our dear spirit home.

Our friends were so dear, but they soon passed away,
The spirit was gone from the body of clay;
Yet still they do live and will ever us greet,
With other dear friends whom they always can meet.
Home, home, spirit home,
Each friend we here lose, but attracts toward home.

No homes on this earth with these mansions compare,
Their joys nor their pleasures are e'er
found elsewhere,
These homes to inherit we'll seek to do well,
And thus with blest spirits we ever
shall dwell.
Home, home, spirit home,
Each day spent on earth brings us nearer our home.

These homes are surrounded with beautiful bowers,
Where deeds of pure kindness e'er
bloom with the flowers,
There all gone before us united will stand,
And with great rejoicing we'll join the loved band.
Home, home, spirit home,
We'll join the dear spirits who guided us home.

"Materialization." By Mme. M. d-Esperance and Rev. B. F. Austin. Excellent. Price 10 cents.

The Money God and Millionaires.

Spiritualists need not covet the millionaire nor his millions. Spiritualism will live without obtaining either. How could a Spiritualist become a millionaire, with so much hunger, want and distress around him? An impossibility. Neither will Spiritualism ever die. It was not born, but discovered. Call it what you may it is still Spiritualism. Come in whatever form it may, it still gives testimony of life, not death.

We realize that a child is alive when it cries just as readily as when it laughs. So of the many phases presented, as given in that very instructive weekly, The Progressive Thinker. Whether pleasing or otherwise, all give evidence that we live after the body dies.

Also another important thing. Spiritualism teaches that happiness hereafter depends upon how we have lived in earth life, not in what we have believed or what we have accumulated. Spiritualists do not covet the distinction of being "money getters and money keepers" as has been said of Millionaire Sage since he recently died. There are commodities of more value that can be acquired which will not be left behind as the millionaire's possessions are. Spiritualists have no leader but Truth. Who can personate truth? No one can personate God or the All-Good.

Many years ago a man came teaching this truth, of whom it was said: "The common people heard him gladly." He taught Spiritualism. It is stated that he came that we might have life—and that we might have it more abundantly. Some of the snobs of that day asked, "Do any of the rulers believe on him?" Will truth be any truer if it is believed by the rulers, or any other popular magnate? I think if I was one of the rulers, I should be mortified, if not disgusted to have my distinguished name alluded to as evidence of the glorious truth of Spiritualism—and might go and rest awhile with the Theosophists!

The truth is all there is. Nothing else is real. Our prejudices envelope us but they will pass away. They are not everlasting like truth. They shade the light as the heavy clouds do the sun, but clouds do not damage the sun. Neither does prejudice damage the truth. The knowledge that Spiritualism imparts is so comforting—life abundant so infilling with love and hope, no wonder that those who embrace it desire the whole world have the enjoyment of the same.

I have nothing against millions or millionaires. It is what they do with the millions and what the millions do with them. Well enough for a man to own the money, but woe to the man when the dollars own him. Our spirit friends regard the man more than the millions.

That Spiritualism is consistent, scientific, reasonable and true, is not saying that all who profess to accept it are thus. Yet some people seem to expect it—especially of those who have passed on. One says, "If the spirits had always told the truth I should have been a Spiritualist." Another says planchette or the board "told so many lies, I will have nothing more to do with Spiritualism." What logic! Because people are sometimes prostrated by sunstroke does not hurt or change the character of the sun; staying in doors or outside enjoying its rays does not affect it. The sun still keeps on shining. The only trouble is our ignorance.

Spiritualism was just as true before the Rochester rappings as it is today. It always was and always will be. Calling it new thought or old thought does not affect. It is new to the individual when first coming to a consciousness of the same; always new and always old, just like everything else that is permanent. The truth that is will remain the truth; and there is a prophecy that all will ultimately come to a knowledge of it. All may not know at the same time.

Harper's Weekly says of Lyman J. Gage, the distinguished millionaire who is taking a rest at Point Loma at the present time: "What use is there of living to be past seventy years old, if a man may not do as he pleases with the rest of his life?" What are our Spiritualist workers who are "past seventy years old" doing at the present time? Indulging themselves with a needed rest? No; they are working for humanity and the cause they love, as hard as ever, according to their strength, and doing better work than ever before because of added experience.

Spiritualists have as yet no resort like Point Loma where the aged or tired worker can rest, or lead the "simple life." They usually work till ready to graduate—go up higher. Possibly if they were millionaires they would be no wiser than the others, and be tempted to do the same foolish things. Russell Sage was not a Spiritualist, neither did he leave his millions to them. What did he take with him when he left us?

NOW IS YOUR TIME—

PRICE REDUCED.

In order to place that valuable book, "MYSTERIES OF THE SEANCE," (written by a life-long Spiritualist) in the hands of as many Spiritualists and investigators as possible this winter, I have decided to CUT THE PRICE IN TWO, and will, until the supply on hand is exhausted, mail it to any address for 12 cents per copy—less than half the former price. This book gives all the methods employed by fake mediums in producing bogus manifestations in all the different phases, and instructs the reader how to detect and expose the fraud. A silver dime and red stamp brings you the book, prepaid, by return mail. Get it and avoid being fooled. Address, ED LUNT, 119 Cedar street, Roxbury, Mass.

WHENCE COMES MURDER?

An Earnest Plea for the Lives of Murderers.

When a man kills someone, the law brands him as a murderer. As a punishment for his crime, he is hanged or electrocuted. Why? Because he took a human life!

The hangman, also, takes a human life. Why is he not branded as a murderer? He is a good citizen. Good citizen, indeed! He is paid by the community for killing men. Therefore, his "crimes" are justified. On the other hand, the criminal is perhaps, given a sum of money or its equivalent by some few persons for killing someone. Therefore his crime is not justified and he is hanged.

A criminal of this type—that is, a murderer— may not be as guilty as he seems. Let me explain this by beginning with the condition of the mother before the child is born. Previous to the birth of the child, the mother is in a very sensitive condition. She, perhaps, reads the accounts of murder—of murder committed in cold blood, murder of innocent women and children, homicides, suicides, etc. These murders are announced in glaring headlines, and depicted in vivid word pictures. They make an impression on the mother's mind. She sees in her imagination—the crimes committed, the struggle and sufferings of the victims, etc. This vision is transmitted to the unborn child. The child is born with the picture of crime, especially murder, indelibly stamped upon its brain.

The impression may lie dormant for many years. Then a desire for bloodshed rises in the breast of the babe, now grown up. This longing to take a life grows stronger and stronger. The will becomes weaker and weaker. It succumbs. The deed is done. The so-called murderer is hanged. This "hanging" is the real crime, because it was committed voluntarily against a person whose will was too weak to resist hereditary influences.

Is the hangman's victim dead? His body—not his soul—is destroyed. After his spirit revives from the shock of passing out of this life, the desire of destroying life becomes as powerful as before. That desire grows stronger because it cannot be satisfied (the spirit, unaided, cannot destroy the flesh). The ego of the executed man becomes more determined to fulfill his longing. He finds as a subject whom he can control, a person still in the body. The personality of the spirit dominates this unfortunate. Thirst for blood becomes his overpowering passion. His will weakens. It yields. Another criminal is hanged.

He was not the murderer. True, his hand did the deed, but the will of the spirit caused his downfall.

The horror of the murderer's misdeed is again impressed upon his children through the medium of his wife. Again the crimes are committed; again the hangman is called into service; again the spirits are set free.

Thus the number of wrong-doers is continually increasing instead of decreasing. Now the question rises, "What shall be done with the criminals"

Educate them! Educate them out of their mistaken ideas of forgiveness. They think if they repent at the last hour, all will be well. Right here is where they make a great mistake. They are not forgiven. Everyone must suffer for his own misdeeds. They may escape punishment in this world—but not in the next. There the suffering is much worse than here. The wrong doers are earth-bound, tied to the scenes of their own acts, seeing the struggles and hearing the screams of their victims. Is not this punishment—the torture of the conscience—the most terrible to bear? Indeed it is—because the punishment cannot be shifted to the shoulders of another. Each one must work out his own salvation—no one can suffer for him. Teach the criminals this truth. But do not wait until they are grown up before you reveal the truth to them. Teach the children—all children—right from the cradle,—that they must pay the penalty for their own wrong doing. Impress upon their childish fancy that no one can die for them. Help them to control their passions, especially anger. For bursts of anger are accountable for many acts of violence.

Help and educate these unfortunates. do not condemn them to death—this only increases the crimes. Have mercy on them and pity rather than censure their weakness. Then, and only then, will the number of murders decrease.

TRUE MANLY WORTH.

Man's winged soul can cleave the air
The tempests waves of the deep Strong-limb'd and firm to do and dare,
His intrepid soul to keep Watch over the nation's welfare great
Its nobleness and right
To strengthen it 'gainst the ills of fate
And lead it towards the light.

Man's life is a living sacred joy,
And who this truth can gainsay?
For though there are trials that may annoy,
Down deep in the soul, I say
There are living thoughts that silently mould
The slumbering spirit into life,
Far stronger than the tyrant's hold
With its blind reckless strife.

The hoarded wealth of mammon's greed,
The pride of selfish, sordid souls,
Where the tempests of wild passions breed,
And retribution rolls;
There the spirit of true manhood unawares
Is setting this old world aright,
And Freedom's sun her star-crown bears
The heralds of coming light.

For what is this life except it be
Intent on right and manly worth?
From narrow prejudices set free,
To give the heart-deeds birth,
And when lifted up by love and truth,
The soul grows luminous, to be
Transfigured in immortal youth
And one with Deity!

THE PATHWAY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT.

Or, the Pathway of the Spirit Traced.

By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

Get My Great Book on Healing.

IT'S FREE TO ALL SUFFERERS—THE SICK, THE WEAK, THE DESPONDENT.

DR. A. W. BIRKHOIZ,

Spiritual, Mental and Magnetic Healer.

What I show in this book must prove a startling revelation to you or to anyone not acquainted with what I am doing and what I have done. I claim to cure diseases of every description. I claim to make weak men and weak women strong, to fill them with new life and energy, and to put them on the way to acquire the maximum of success in business, in society and in every undertaking.

You may say I am making pretty broad claims, but I do not ask you to accept these claims just on my say so. What I am telling you I can PROVE to you or to anyone.

Only fools scoff at something with which they are not familiar. The wise ever seek more wisdom.

In my book I tell you not only about myself, my humble origin, how I became possessed of these powers which many consider supernatural, what I have done for thousands of others, what I can do for you, regardless of your condition, etc.

OVERWHELMING EVIDENCE.

The main feature of the booklet is the large number of affidavits I give from those who have been absolutely cured, and cured for good—without drugs, surgical operations—where all else had failed, I give you the names and the addresses of men and women, and children who have been cured of various ailments, many of them of long standing, and where physicians and all kinds of medicines failed to give relief—of the blind that have their sight restored to them, of the deaf who now hear, of the lame who now walk without crutches.

This evidence speaks for itself. Do you suppose for one moment that all of these people, or any of them, would LIE to me?

What I have done I can do. You can call it supernatural power, a divine gift; call it magnetism, spiritual or mental healing—call it what you will. The fact remains, I have done these things, am doing every day—and I PROVE it.

So I want you to send for this book. I want you to read these testimonials. I want you to learn something about my experience, extending over a period of twenty-five years. I want you to understand the superiority of my natural healing methods over the druggist methods.

EPILEPTIC FITS CURED.

State of Illinois, County of Cook.—Mrs. C. E. Wallis, 435 N. California Av., makes the following statement: For the past six years I have been under the care of physicians. During this time my health has been very poor, and the bad feature was that the physicians did not seem to agree regarding my trouble. I have been treated for tapeworm, gall stones, liver trouble, stomach trouble, nervous prostration and many other diseases. Instead of getting better I was constantly getting worse. About the time I first went to a physician I would occasionally have a fainting spell, but towards the end I would regularly have from 2 to 4 fits every day. The fits kept getting worse until they seemed to be my worst trouble. Doctors claimed that I could be relieved, but not cured. This was very discouraging to me after taking medicines for over six years, but I saw no improvement, and decided to make another change, thinking that I could get no worse. I noticed Dr. Birkholz's advertisement in the paper and called on him for an examination. He told me that he would cure me, and, to my great surprise, he has cured me in a very short time. I have not had a fit since my first visit to Dr. Birkholz, am feeling fine, and have gained 15 pounds. I will gladly explain every detail of this wonderful treatment to anyone ailing. I cannot recommend Dr. Birkholz too highly, and believe all who are sick should call on him.

PARALYSIS CURED IN FOUR TRAETMENTS.

I, Mrs. John Wadett, 6741 Lafin St., Chicago, wish to tell the public of the wonderful cure made of my child's helpless case, also my own, in a remarkably short time. I had been ailing for one year. I consulted and treated with four different physicians without receiving any benefit whatever. The doctors said that the only relief or hope would be an operation. While under this doctor's care, my husband ran across Dr. Birkholz's advertisement, and advised me to go to him and see what he thought about my case, consultation being free. When I consulted this Dr. Birkholz he told me that my trouble was gall stones, the same as the first physician I treated with. I suffered untold agony with my back and sides; I could not straighten up. After the first treatment by Dr. Birkholz I improved at once, and after taking a few treatments I am entirely cured and feeling fine. During these treatments I passed four gall stones. Two were the size of a navy bean, the others the size of a pea. I now consider myself entirely cured. After taking treatment and finding myself so improved I decided to take my daughter to the doctor also for treatment. My child, being 4 years old, was stricken with paralysis, which caused her to be almost helpless, also causing her eyes to be crossed. She was unable to feed herself. If she would fall while trying to walk she was unable to get up without assistance. The child was helped wonderfully after the first treatment and after the fourth treatment is entirely cured and the picture of health. Anyone wishing may interview me. I advise anyone having sickly children to go to Dr. Birkholz for help. I think him a wonderful man; treats without knife or medicine, and I consider my child's cure, also my own, a miracle.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this third day of January, 1907.

MRS. COOLEY ON SPIRITUALISM.

A Large Audience Out Friday Night to Hear the Well-Known Medium—Declaring Mrs. Eddy Originally a Spiritualist Medium, She Said That Faith and Christian Science are Much Alike and Gave Some Interesting Tests at the Close of Her Lecture.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, delivered another lecture before the Spiritualist society Friday evening, in the Odd Fellows' temple. Mrs. Cooley is a lecturer and test medium, and the lecture Friday evening was one of a series she is giving under the auspices of the society, the next of which she will give on Sunday evening.

Mrs. Cooley had a large and interested audience audience Friday night, and in connection with her interesting lecture she was very successful in the tests, which followed. In connection with the lecture Mrs. Cooley spoke in answer to a number of questions written by the members of the audience, and in answering one of which she stated that Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, the founder and present head of the Christian Science church, was at one time a Spiritualist medium, and gave sittings as such. She claimed that Spiritualism and Christian Science are alike in many things, especially when it comes to Science healing, the explanation being that the healer is a medium in the Spiritualist sense and operates through the control of a spirit.

Following are some of the questions to which Mrs. Cooley made reply:

"Can one be kept under control of an evil spirit? If so, can he be brought out of that control without his knowledge or consent? and if so, how?" The reply was that while there are evil spirits, they are more often ignorant rather than evil, and must be educated.

"What part of the body is the soul? and is the soul and spirit one?" The soul is no part of the body. There is a spiritual body and there is a physical body, etc., etc.

"What will Spiritualism be 5, 10, 20 years from now?" Just what the Spiritualists make it. Later, returning to this question, Mrs. Cooley said Spiritualism is the greatest flower ever planted in the garden of love. It is the greatest philosophy ever presented to mankind. Many other beliefs hint and treat of a life beyond, but Spiritualism is the only religion that actually proves what it teaches; that after this life there is another world and another life. Spiritualism is a permeating force which will always be sending its shafts of light into every recess of darkness in the human life. It is being investigated by many of all calibres to-day. The time is coming when you will be considered behind if you don't know something about psychic law. Many college professors have come out and joined in psychic investigations, and many have been convinced. The secular press abounds with it. In 20 years it will be fully established, known and accepted, to stand as a beacon light throughout all time.

Mrs. Cooley followed her lecture with communication tests in which she described many spirits claimed to be seen through her mediumistic vision, and in every case the descriptions were recognized, and many of them had the merit of at least appearing very remarkable.—Meadville, Pa., Daily Republican.

JENNIE HAGAN BROWN.

A Loving and Appreciative Tribute From a Co-worker in the Cause.

Allow me to say that the announcement of the sudden transition of Jennie Hagan Brown came as a shock and great sorrow to me, as I believe it must have been to thousands of others who have heard her, known her, and appreciated her services as one of the most phenomenal mediums of modern Spiritualism. For I consider the demonstration of an intelligent power assuming control of the brain and vocal organs as in the case of Cora Richmond, Libbie Lowe Watson, Nellie J. T. Brigham and Jennie Hagan Brown, and causing the uncultured child to speak with the wisdom of the philosopher and sage, places them among most phenomenal of mediums.

Your editorial tribute to her was terse and to the point: "Her lectures and improvisations were morsels of excellence. Indeed some of her poems have never been excelled, so full of that vibration that charms the mind."

And let me add, it is not detracting from the gift or ability of any other to to say that her improvisations had an originality, quaintness, and often an exactness in rhythm and metre, as well as frequently embodying tests of the power and intelligence with her, which made them appear, and presented her as the instrument in a class by herself.

At first this poetry was her specialty. As a little girl I heard a gentleman say a day or so since, he had seen her when so young that all of the time she could get she wanted to play with the children, and her mother would call her in and put her upon the platform when these poems would fall from her lips, musical as the songs of birds, filled with philosophy and wisdom, from this apparently almost inexhaustable supply or source of inspiration and truth.

Her mother took her in these early days traveling from place to place as the demand came, enduring privations and suffering many things that the workers of to-day know little of. For although Jennie left us in the prime of womanhood, and in the midst of her usefulness, she had begun so early that she was accounted among the Pioneers of Spiritualism. She began when it was up-hill work. She learned the roughness of the road, the steeps there were to climb, and the hard and dangerous passes. She went unhesitatingly and worked faithfully, making hosts of friends wherever she went. She was at all times generous in the use of her gifts, responding to any call made in social or home gatherings, as freely as in her public work.

All who knew her intimately, who have had her in their homes, know another personality through her mediumship, as distinct and decidedly different from herself as could well be. And those who have seen her face illuminated, and her eyes glisten under the influence of the spirit "Boy White," as in lisping tongue and childish manner he related in humorous poetry the story of Jonah and the whale, and other bible stories, have seen and heard that which would baffle the scientists, Psychic Researchers, and advocates of multiple personalities, in their efforts to explain in any other way than by the Spiritual hypothesis this remarkable mental phenomenon.

For "Boy White" always claimed to be a spirit, using her as an instrument, and so had this spirit impressed his personality upon me, that when my first heart cry went out that I should not again meet Jennie in the mortal plane of life, my next thought was, "And the door is closed to 'Boy White.'" I shall not see him again, for although the spirit might come again through another, that particular adaptation would be found but once. He would find but one "Dennie," as he called her, and we shall find but one Jennie Hagan Brown.

Spiritualism has met with a great loss. From her early life she has been constantly at work in our great cause. We shall miss her. I haven't the data which I would like to give, but from Vermont, through all the eastern and middle states, on to the west and northwest, she has carried the message of truth, and in all of our great camp-meeting gatherings, among them Lily Dale was one where she felt at home, as I have done for many years. A little more than three years ago she visited me in San Francisco, after she was obliged to give up her trip to Australia, and I shall remember with pleasure the time spent together. I learned something more of the work she was doing in Texas, for there she had become known for her talent among Literary and Press Clubs, of women and workers of the world, who looked upon her as a highly gifted woman.

My last meeting with her was at the N. S. A Convention at St. Louis, in 1904. In an improvisation at that time upon the "Well of Truth" and "The Spirit World," closing the poem she said:

"'This Well of Truth' and the 'World of Spirit'
I long so much to understand,
To quaff the waters so pure and holy,
And to rest my soul in that beautiful land.
O, I sometimes think in the toil and struggle
I never shall quaff that draught divine,
Till I stand in the realm of the worldless spirit,
And drink from the well of that glorious clime.

She rests in that beautiful land; she drinks from the well of Truth in that "glorious clime." She will receive new inspiration, new life, and feel even more perfectly its harmony and its poetry.

Go on, dear sister co-worker. But in your going, a beautiful light of earth goes out. I feel as though I had been walking in a beautiful garden, filled with rare flowers, the atmosphere vibrant with bird melody, and something had come and blighted the flowers and hushed the songs of many birds.

Zangwill on the Suffragettes.

Israel Zangwill calls attention to the fact that the two greatest periods in the history of England as far as literature, drama and exploration were concerned, were those of the times of Elizabeth and Victoria. In each case the royal influence can be traced. Both women had the power of initiative. "If a woman can be Queen, why should she not have a vote," concludes the novelist.

The liberal are secure alone,
For what we frankly give, forever is our own. —Granville.

"Let Misery Hide Itself and Hold Its Tongue; Otherwise It Is Treason."

Written by Henry Morrison Tefft, Norwich, N. Y.

If you want to be popular, go with the crowd. I speak for no party, creed or sect. I believe in absolute freedom in thought, act and expression. The most detestable trait in a person's character is snobbishness, obsequiousness and duplicity. A great deal of spread-eagle talk is indulged in, in regard to our glorious Republic, but it is mainly by the politicians who always speak in the interest of a party, or of personal ambition, and never in the interest of the people.

Electing men to office neither makes them honest, upright or capable. Availability not capability is the present-day requirement for official position. A man may be a good citizen, a member of a church, honest in his dealings with his fellow man, and be dishonest as an official. Napoleon claimed there were two kinds of morality—one for public and another for private life. The highest philosophy holds a different doctrine. No art of words or flights of oratory can change the lessons of history.

Neither individuals nor communities can bear too much prosperity. The desire for riches becomes a craze—a disease; only the few can succeed; the vast majority are left behind in the race, sour, dissatisfied and restless.

Ingersoll said, "If you want to change the conduct of men we must change their conditions." No government can be maintained by force. In Russia we have an object lesson verifying this principle. Ideas in time become stronger than rulers, stronger than armies, stronger than fortifications. "For with the thoughts of men," says Epictetus, "are cities well established, and not with wood and stone. * * * Then follow the example of the Spartan Lycurgus. For even as he did not fence the city with walls, but fortified the inhabitants with virtue, and so preserved the city free forever."

Extreme poverty or extreme wealth hardens the heart. Far more cruelty is manifested from man to man, than from man to beast. Cruelty does not always consist in physical injury and bodily torment—there are far more torturous modes of oppression.

Two antagonistic forces are always at work, one trying to build up, another trying to pull down; one fighting for power, another fighting for freedom. On a large scale there are only two classes in society—master and slave; the latter outnumber the former a thousand to one, and have the right at any time to assert their superiority.

"The rich people * * * possess their holdings only by the common consent of the majority. When the consent is withdrawn they don't own anything. The king is king by the consent of the people—when they withdrew that consent in France the king was not king. All property is held, all profit collected, simply and solely by the consent of the majority. When that majority changes its mind, then a new relationship appears, as was true about King George's rule of this country or with relation to chattel slavery."

Ignorance is the basis of servitude. Educate a man and he refuses to be a serf. This accounts for the world-wide revolution that is going on in the ranks of the laboring classes. It shows itself in anarchism, in socialism and populism. Enlightenment is the foe of tyranny.

"Hark to the voice of the time!
The multitude think for themselves,
And weigh their condition each one;
The drudge has a spirit sublime,
And whether he hammers or delves,
He reads when his labors are done;
And learns, though he groans under poverty's ban,
That freedom to think is the birthright of man!"

The advancement of public opinion is slow but determined. When once aroused you can no more arrest its progress than you can stop the course of a glacier. It is one thing to command, another to convince. A blind man can distinguish light from darkness. The most ignorant person knows right from wrong. There was a moral law before ever a human enactment was made.

In every community there are a hundred followers to one leader. The world has been compared to a chessboard, the men as pawns, moved about by some controlling mind. Most people are born to play a subordinate part in life. By instinct, habit and environment, they willingly yield to superiority. In all great movements, whether along moral, political, scientific or religious lines, there must be master minds capable of viewing questions on a large scale; the details are carried out by lesser men.

When Charles Sumner was approached by Julia Ward Howe for assistance in the case of a poor negro, he said to her, "Madam, I am trying to lift up a race; do not ask me to take up my time for individuals."

The architect carries in his mind the form of the structure he is building—while the stone-cutters and the hod-carriers see only the small section on which they are at work. The eagle in his flight takes in at one view a whole province, while the sparrow twittering from a bush or a tree sees only an insignificant plot of ground.

Each individual has his own special talent. Carlyle says, one man thinks a thing, another speaks it, and another man does it. Because people can talk, laugh and have "infrequent flashes of intelligence," they may not be real men and women; animals in a greater or lesser degree are endowed with these qualifications.

A person is never offensive unless he is misplaced; he is never conspicuous while he keeps in his own rank. The loafer becomes objectionable when he obtrudes himself into decent company—a crude unlettered man when he forces his presence among the cultured and the refined.

Life is full of strange inconsistencies. The barber, the bar-tender, the cobbler, take more thoughts about the fashion of their coats and the style of their hat than the lawyer or the doctor.

People that have no past, no present and no future are the first to consult the fortune-teller, the astrologer and the palmister. Profound minds dare not forecast the future; the present is what most concerns them.

Two classes of persons are best adapted to the enjoyment of this world—the coarse and the frivolous. They take nothing serious. The truest index to a man's character and power is his ability to feel, to enjoy, to suffer, to endure. Some people get more real value out of an hour than others can out of weeks, months and years.

Existence is not life. Dull, sordid natures take pleasure in the hoarding up of earthly treasures, while the aesthetic and the spiritual nature stores away the richer gifts—the nobler aspirations of the mind and heart. One man gathers up the experiences and teachings of a dozen who have gone before him, blends their knowledge with his own and calls himself an inventor, or a founder of a new school of philosophy or a new school of thought.

Truth is constantly taking on new modes of expression. The running stream keeps itself pure and healthful, but the stagnant pool becomes dead and breeds all manner of putrid forms and diseases. It is wind and tide that keeps the ocean pure. A large portion of mankind go through life practically undeveloped either in their minds or in their bodies. One faculty specially cultivated is always at the expense of others. We never know what power we possess until circumstances compel us to act. Carlyle says, "The uttered part of a man's life, * * * bears to the unuttered, unconscious part a small unknown proportion. He himself never knows it, much less do others."

The most thoughtful mind only sees the shadow, not the real substance of life. There is a crisis in every important matter when success or failure seems to center at a single point. There are times when devotion, determination of purpose become inspiration. The "psychological moment" whether in battle, diplomacy, argument or business, is the moment when the veil is lifted and the whole field of controversy is revealed, and one sees the issues involved converge at one center.

Our deepest experiences come to us veiled. Trifles light as air may be freighted with infinite purpose. The picking of a rose in the garden one day by a little girl and placing it in the button hole of the coat of the poet Tom Moore, with the remark, "Now I have given you the lost rose of summer," inspired the immortal poem bearing that name.

Great national events are made to turn on individual action. A day's transaction changes the current of history for a thousand years. Reputations are made, hopes blasted, souls saved or damned by the result of a single venture.

Some one has said that "Yorktown made George Washington president. New Orleans made Andrew Jackson president. Tippecanoe made William Henry Harrison president. Buena Vista made Zachary Taylor president. Appomattox made Ulysses S. Grant president." We never realize when passing through an experience what infinite value it may have on our life. The greatest poems, the greatest works of fiction, the greatest books, were written with no intimation of the place they were to occupy in history. Macaulay, speaking of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," says, "He had no suspicion, indeed, that he was producing a masterpiece. He could not guess what place his allegory would occupy in English literature; for of English literature he knew nothing."

The authors of the various books of the Bible little realized that they were furnishing the world with material which would be used as a moral and religious guide for a large body of people for all time to come. A very small act drives a rivet or draws a nail. Men forge their own chains, financially, spiritually and socially.

Is there any necessity for a mediator between God and man? Every man should be his own confessor, priest and king. Going to church, and being regular in attendance at prayer meeting are the easiest and most ineffectual ways of serving God that the human mind ever devised.

Christ's greatest sermon was not delivered in a synagogue, but upon "a hillside in Galilee." He was moving among men, healing the sick, raising the dead, casting out devils and feeding the multitude.

"The hands that help are better far Than lips that pray."

The world is inclined to rate men, not according to their spiritual goodness but according to their intellectual greatness. The most perfect man may not always be the most valuable man for a community; he may not do as much good in the world as the man that has grave faults and serious drawbacks to his character. Life is an illusion. The more ignorant a people are, the more ardently they worship their gods and their rulers. There is nothing in which mankind more clearly show the lowliness of their origin than in the servility which seems inherent in their nature. In Volney's "Ruins," occurs the following passage: "People! * * * Yes, you yourselves cause the evils of which you complain; yourselves encourage the tyrants, by a base adulation of their power, by an imprudent admiration of their false beneficence, by servility in obedience, by licentiousness in liberty, and a credulous reception of every imposition."

All titles are artificial and tend to separate the individual from the mass. A peasant is a better representative of real life than a king. Plain calf makes a more genteel shoe than patent leather. But the ideal world can never be obtained. Civilization breeds class distinction, inequality and all manner of diseases and vices.

"I am ashamed," says Emerson, "to think how easily we capitulate to badges and names, to large societies and dead institutions."

A new uniform adorned with gold braid and brass buttons together with martial music has brought more soldiers into the army than ever did patriotism, love of country and loyalty to the flag. Men are moved by their passions and emotions rather than by reason and logic. People addressed in mass can be swayed more easily than if interviewed individually. Without excitement society would stagnate. Crude minds must have food as well as the cultured and refined. Mild and subdued tints suit the refined and cultivated taste, while it requires the more gaudy colors to satisfy the barbaric appetite.

Society never stands still. A thousand agencies enter into every great movement of mankind. Old beliefs, conditions and customs are constantly giving way for the new. The cable, the telegraph, and the merchant are more potent factors in civilizing and Christianizing a country than missionaries and teachers. Acquaintanceship with nations, the same as with individuals, brings them closer together in purpose and interest. The nearer study we give a people's religion, laws, customs and habits the more tolerant we grow;—we see how gradually they have formed, how naturally they have grown up out of the past, until it would appear that there is always a similarity between a country, its people and its beliefs and habits and that no other course would have served them as well.

The devotees of all faiths think their own particular creed and form of worship is the one best adapted to all nations, climes and conditions in life. "The clergy were shocked when celebrated travelers declared that Mohammedanism provided African savages with a more suitable medium for advance than Christianity."

No condition of society is final. Every form of government is on trial. Experience is the final court in which all questions are tested. Moot courts will never make a lawyer. It is real battle, not target practice, that develops marksmanship in a soldier. Surgery can never be learned from the books.

The world is in closer touch to-day—nation with nation—than ever before. Opinions are sympathetic; they reach from continent to continent. The same questions that America is discussing, are being discussed in Russia, England, Germany and France. Circumstances often make individual differences on a great question yield and cause divergent views to blend together, until they become one all-consuming purpose. Before the war of the Rebellion, various theories were put forth for the suppression of African slavery in this country. Some believed that prohibiting its extension would in time destroy it; others advocated payment to the owners for the freedom of the slaves; while there was still another class held that the slaves should be arbitrarily liberated, without money and without price. Men could not agree on this question, but after the war broke out and as it proceeded, the sentiment of the people crystallized, till the minds of all were voiced in Lincoln's "Emancipation Proclamation."

When a fire breaks out in a great city no one knows to what extent the conflagration will extend, so it is with social and political upheavals. Russia's war with Japan has hastened by years the conflict between the common people and the ruling classes. The world is in a state of great unrest. The slave is demanding his freedom; —the man who produces the wealth of the country some of its emoluments. What the future of this country shall be no one can to-day predict —but the prayer of every patriot is that the poet's dream shall be fully and forever realized.

"This young land is like an eagle whose young gaze
Feeds on the noontide beam, whose golden plume
Floats moveless on the storm, and in the blaze
Of sunrise gleams when earth is wrapt in gloom:
Great people! As the sands shalt thou become.
Thy growth is swift as morn, when night must fade,
The multitudinous earth shall sleep beneath thy shade.
Nay! start not at the name America."

GIORDANO BRUNO.

Three hundred years and more have rolled away
Since by the lighted pyre there stood that day,
As brave a soul as e'er resolved to die
To vindicate his own thought's liberty.

Apply the torch, ye zeal-blind, priestly horde,
The dauntless messenger of Truth can well afford
To hurl defiance at your senseless creed;
What boots it, so the human mind be freed?

No easy task, in truth, 'tis his to hear
The scornful jeers in ignorance gathered there,
To hear the piercing cry of bigotry resound,
And watch the maddening mob a-gathering round.

Lust for his life, like hounds unleashed to prey,
Impels that mob to register its infamy,
But thou, brave, noble hero, waited there sublime,
Unbought, unshaken, through that fearful time!

Unbought by canting words, nor shaken by the cry
Of hell, let fall from lips of mitred bigotry!
Where, though the annal of the race abound
With deathless deeds of heroes, can be found,

'Mongst all the throng we're taught to emulate,
One soul more worthy of the title, great?
One soul less flinching in the fatal hour?
One soul less awed by threats from brutal power?

Not only he whose lonely, fainting cry
Was uttered for his enemies, on Calvary,
Encountered death with more sublime control,
Less faltering, entered the inevitable goal,

And, brilliant martyr, though they've quenched the flame
By which they sought obliteration of your name,
That name still lives; nor less in men persists desire
To light again thy extinct funeral pyre!

We watch and guard the treasure that you bought
At such a cost—the sacred right of thought,
And well we may: as he whose feeble hand
Would wield the sceptre of supreme command
Within that city where your blood was shed,
Yet vainly tries to raise his tyrant head,
He fain would wield that sceptre as of yore
Untaught by fate of tyrants gone before.

As men, when drowning, e'en to straws will cling,
So strives that gasping tyranny to bring Back from the past its mildewed creed of hate,
And by its forms of "faith" would rule the state.

But you, brave martyr to the truth, well knew,
Your matchless courage could that "beast" subdue;
And hence to-day, where'er men's souls are free
They join in prayerful song of thanks to thee!

TRUTH OR FAITH.

Which Is the Most Helpful to Mankind?

If by faith you tread the many and intricate paths of life, you have nothing to sustain you, nothing to cheer your drooping spirits, in time of sadness and deep sorrow only a blind hope. If you follow the teachings of the so-called teachers of the gospel of life, your minds will ever be full of doubt and fear, and grave uncertainty concerning the great problems of life, on the material plane of existing thought, as well as on the question concerning the soul of man, its state and condition after the change called death.

Walking by faith alone, unaccompanied by knowledge, cannot solve for you the true meaning of life, and open before your mental vision a tithe of the possibilities that exist in the nature of man, whereby he can make for himself a position of greatness and power in the unfoldment of his spirituality.

By faith he depends on another to carry him gently along life's pathway, and shoulder his burdens of sin and sorrow. But when truth dawns upon his minds, he sees the impossibility of this, and realizes that he must bear his own sins, or rather the effects of his life of wrong-doing. Truth opens before his vision a line of thought totally different from that indulged in by the man whose only counselor is a faith in something he cannot understand. Truth ever leads her followers far beyond the confines of earth, out into illimitable fields of progressive thought and action. And as he studies nature in all her grandeur and beauty, and learns of the great law that governs all things, he is lost as it were in the vast unexplored field of progressive thought that spreads before him in unending beauty, whose end he cannot see, for like a stream of brilliant light it extends far into the unseen; as a part of the great eternity of years; a part of time that has no end.

Truth opens the gateway between the two worlds, the material and the spiritual; so that man even while he abides for a season in his garments of flesh, can catch glimpses of that other land, where dwell the ones he loved, who have gone on just before, a little while in advance. Truth teaches him the duty he owes to his own soul, as a mortal who retains his own individuality through all time, and is responsible to his inner consciousness, to that spark of the Infinite that dwells within him, and which will be his judge when he enters the realm of the spiritual.

Truth alone can guide the mind of man in the true way of right living, so that no regrets or remorse shall follow him into the immortal land.

Faith confines man to the realm of materiality, in as much as his mind cannot grasp the great truth of spirituality to be of any real benefit to him. He cannot see clearly the duty he owes to himself or his fellow-men, or realize the responsibilities that rest on him as an immortal soul, to unfold his spiritual nature in deeds of kindness and love.

Faith in the unknown whom he blindly worships, leads him to dwell in a condition of unrest and fear. Afraid to study into the laws of his being; afraid to ask concerning the wisdom of the Infinite, lest it bring to him retribution in the world beyond. His faith cannot bridge the two worlds, and bring his soul in sweet communion with the spirit of all things, the Infinite love, for his God is a being of fear, not love.

Love that is not spontaneous, full and free, direct from the heart, but is the outcome of fear, is not elevating to the soul of man. Faith cannot bring to the heart of man this most desirable love, that flows out to all mankind in waves of sympathy and kindness, because it is tinctured with fear. Infinite love draws not close in a tender embrace the children of earth who walk alone by faith, for they are as the blind who walk in darkness. Truth brings the light, and by its brightness they can see and clearly discern the Infinite love that permeates all things, and knowing this, their souls respond in a spontaneous burst of joy, and they can feel the heart throbs of Infinite as they come in touch with this love divine. Their hearts go out in waves of thankfulness that at last they know the way; that life eternal, unending is spread before them, for the benefit of their souls, and progression will ever be their watchword.

Truth beautifies all things, and sheds a radiance over the tomb, that takes away the gloom and sorrow, as we see our friends one by one advancing to higher states of living. Truth teaches us they are living, not dead. Faith hopes it may be true. Wave high the banner of spiritual truth that shall at last bring redemption to man and forever free his mind from blind faith, as his soul learns more and more of the true way of life; Truth shall fill the world with brightness, and in this brightness the soul of man shall be uplifted and purified.

Blind faith hampers the soul of man, and keeps him ever in one line of thought, beyond that he cannot see, while spiritually his tendency is to grow narrow and selfish, like his creed, never increasing in broad, progressive thought like him to whom has come the knowledge of grander things, living as he does in the realm of eternal truth.

Again, truth is the greatest helper to mankind, as it frees the mind of man from all forms and creeds of ancient superstition, that makes a slave of his intellect by keeping his mind dwelling forever on errors and superstitious ideas of past ages. Faith cannot lift the curtain and show the hidden treasures, waiting to be garnered by the mind and soul of man; faith says we hope for all things beautiful in the land eternal, we know not for a certainty our friends are there in that land of eternal brightness but if they are, you cannot know or enjoy their spiritual presence, or obtain knowledge of this land, until like them you cross the river of death.

By such utterances as these, they bind still stronger about themselves, the bonds of ignorance, and seek to bind their fellowmen in bondage likewise. Their faith will not allow them to seek for greater light, and so they fail to gain the sweetness, truth and wisdom brings to her earnest followers. But in the grander beauty of truth, we see the gates open, and the golden light of knowledge drive away the mists of doubt and fear from the mind of man. Not afraid to delve deep into the realms of progressive thought, for he knows the greater the knowledge attained here of spiritual truth, the closer he draws to the Infinite knowledge, in the life on earth, and still closer in the land immortal when he, too, shall become an immortal spirit.

Truth teaches man, that by developing his soul powers he can live daily in close proximity to the spirit world, and hold sweet communion with its celestial inhabitants. The God of truth, is a God of progression, as is manifested in all nature. And only by progression can they hope to draw near unto him and feel his smile of love rest upon them. By the power of soul alone can mortals sense the all-pervading presence of Infinite love. And the greater the soul devepolment, the closer this divine essence unto yourself, closer draws the spirit world to you.

Mortals, seek ever for truth and be not led by blind faith, that your souls may grow, bear rich treasures to your spirit, as you in time shall join the great army of immortals on the spirit side of life. Let truth be your star and guide; go to her and learn lessons of wisdom, that shall ever be to your progressive souls harbingers of peace and joy. Truth alone can make you free; seek earnestly for it, and in seeking may you find rich blessings.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.

Annual Mass-Meeting of the First Spiritualist Society.

The annual mass-meeting of the First Spiritualist Society of San Diego, to raise funds for the carrying on of the organized work in California, was held in the Temple on Feb. 8, 9 and 10. Three sessions were held each day. The San Diego "weather clerk" favored us with his best weather, and the people attended in large numbers.

Lectures were delivered by State President A. S. Howe, State Secretary, Col. Dryden, Dr. Adah H. Patterson, Will C. Hodge, Mrs. Mary P. Morrill and David A. Leisk. The general opinion of the character of the speaking was one of satisfaction. Dr. Adah H. Patterson excelled herself in her Saturday evening lecture, reaching the hearts of the people with a grand inspirational force. The message bearers, Mrs. M. E. Howe, Mrs. Morrill, Mrs. C. Johnson, Mrs. E. L. Nicholson, Mrs. Edwards and Mrs. Malette, did some excellent work, affording comfort and enlightenment to inquiring souls. The musical programme under the direction of our pianist, Miss M. Belle Clarke, was a complete success, materially helping the inspirational forces of the workers.

On Sunday evening the last meeting of the convention was held, and two special features on this occasion were the children's lyceum under the direction of the president of the society, C. A. Buss, in the unavoidable absence of Conductor Gaines, and the ordination of David A. Leisk.

The children of the lyceum did their parts well, as a highly appreciative audience testified.

The ordination service by President A. S. Howe, assisted by Dr. Adah Horman Patterson, was very impressive.

The mass-meetings were a grand success, everything working smoothly and harmoniously. Special mention ought to be made of the Busy Bees, auxiliary ladies aid to the society, who served meals during the three days' meetings. The large patronage that the dining-room received was of itself a splendid testimony to the excellence of the service. The First Spiritualist Society of San Diego is moving ahead; its people are kind-hearted, humanitarian and progressive, and it is true that there is no more solidly established spiritual center in the union than that of the First Society of San Diego, Cal. May it ever continue so.

CHILD LABOR.

The Status of the Same Vividly Portrayed by Senator Beveridge.

A few days ago, in the course of a speech on child labor, Senator Beveridge said:

"While the white working people of the South, composing the enormous majority of the entire white stock of that section, are increasingly sending their children to the mills and thus wrecking the future of the white race, the negroes of the South are increasingly sending their children to school, and thus improving the future of the black race. We are deliberately weakening the white race of the South, while gradually strengthening the black race of the South. And to what end? To the end that the already unhealthy fortunes of the Northern capitalists who own these Southern cotton mills shall be made still greater. Te nation is alarmed over the unrighteous power of unrighteous fortunes; and yet we go on swelling those fortunes with the blood and lives of American children."

Southern women have repeatedly petitioned their legislatures for laws prohibiting child labor, but vainly, for Southern women cannot vote. In Colorado, where women can vote, the rights of children are fully protected, and a bill prohibiting child labor was one of the first fruits of woman suffrage.

Scientific Tests.

Touching the exposures I would suggest the tape test as absolute proof that the medium doesn't leave the cabinet. Tie a white tape around the medium's waist, with ends six feet long. Seal the knot with wax, and let people in the audience affix the seal. Pass the ends of the tape through a hole in the cabinet and let them lie out in full view of the audience, so that if the medium lift the cabinet the tape must be moved. The ends could be tacked to the floor outside.

I have had proof of materialized forms coming out of the cabinet, and consider this a scientific test, provided of course the surroundings are searched for trap doors and other means of introducing dressed-up confederates. If investigators and Spiritualists would refuse to sit with any materialization medium except under these conditions they would effectually weed out the frauds.

A TRIBUTE TO ANIMALS.

One Who Has Made a Careful Study of Them, Considers Their Natures From Various Points of View, and Attributes to Them Intelligence, Perhaps Superior to Some Human Beings.

In my young days I lived in one of the greatest forests in the world, where I had all opportunity of observing and studying birds of all kinds by the millions, and other animals, especially the deer. For the last thirty-six years I have been living on a farm on the broad prairies of Kansas. Aside from studying many so-called wild animals, I have had under my care many farm animals. I always gain much pleasure and profit by studying these animals other than merely how many dollars each one will bring me.

No dictionary, nor any person living has ever yet been able to tell me what is meant by those words "instinct" and "sagacity," as applied to animals. I have observed animals until I am satisfied that all do think and reason. All animals, especially birds, are governed in all their movements, actions and lives with and among one another by telepathy. They know one another's minds.

Some years ago while a student at the Weltmer Institute of Magnetic Healing, Professor Weltmer in an address before his students, had this to say: "There is a universal telepathic language which is understood by all animal being, man included." I believe it. So-called animals are very ready mind readers.

Why are there so very few people who have this gift. Because this part of ourselves, this sense has become atrophied, become deadened and lost by non-use.

For tens of thousands of years our progenitors before us have been conveying their thoughts to one another by articulate sounds from the mouth. This gift is retained in a rudimentary condition by all.

Not long since I read an article in the Ram's Horn, in which the writer said that John Wesley believed that all animals have souls and live in the hereafter. The Ram's Horn is a paper of the M. E. Church. The writer has been quite a student of Ornithology. Prof. Kyser, who is a minister of the gospel, in his book, "In Bird Land," makes use of the word "occult" several times, and always while speaking of the wonderful intelligence displayed by the birds. On page 34 he has this to say: "Do birds employ some occult method of telegraphy?" Better say telepathy.

I do not believe in taking the gun and going out to shoot every bird in sight, but I will shoot English sparrows, crows and jack rabbits every chance I get. Here is an experiment I have tried. When I take my gun with no shell in it and no shells in my pocket, and go out over the prairies with no thoughts of shooting anything, then all the rabbits and crows are very tame. I can get close to them; but when I go out with loaded gun with the thought on my mind to kill every rabbit and crow I can find, then these animals are "wild," and I cannot get within gunshot of them.

Do they know my mind? This is the only explanation.

I keep my hogs west of the house. Sometime since I had an old sow turned outside. In the evening I placed a half bushel of corn on the ground east of the house, which I meant to leave there over night. I started for the house and I saw the old sow down west of the house. Then I thought to myself, surely that hog will find that corn. Just then the sow started in my direction, walked past me and made a bee-line for the corn, and soon had her nose in the half-bushel. I will here say that this animal was never on this part of the farm before.

Readers, watch the birds where they fly in large flocks. Notice their strange yet beautiful evolutions as they pass through the air, especially blackbirds. What guides them? Evidently a leader. The rest of the birds know this leader's mind. The wonderful intelligence, sense of smell, sense of hearing, wonderful sagacity said to be possessed by the beaver is no more nor less than a well developed sense of telepathy.

"They are very knowing," as my neighbor expressed it. Some years ago there was a large colony of beavers down in my creek, quite a good sized stream. As they were playing havoc with my timber I was anxious to drive them out. I became satisfied that when there was nobody around they worked every night all night long. Often I took my gun late in the evening, and at all hours of the night. I would very softly and quietly go to their works while the wind was blowing from the stream towards myself. I never saw a beaver, although I would stand behind brush for hours. I got a large double spring steel-trap. I cut a hole in the ice in their pond. I set this trap in the bottom of the stream. I covered the trap with leaves and dirt. Then I drove a green box-elder stick (something beavers are fond of) down by the side of the trap. Well, the next morning I found the beavers had gnawed the bark off of this stick as high as they could reach except on the side where the trap was. The water was running rapidly over the trap and there was no scent in the trap. I repeated this experiment a number of times. How did these animals know that the trap was there, or that the trap might hurt them?

I will now give an example showing that animals are capable of reasoning and thinking. Some time in the fall I was out on my farm. A few rods west of me there was a three-wire fence; immediately west of the fence was a large field of corn. East of me the country was all open, in wheat, several hundred acres. My greyhound dog was with me. Pretty soon a jack rabbit started up and ran toward the corn. The dog just at this time did not try to catch the rabbit, but instead he ran ahead of the rabbit and got on the other side of the fence to keep the rabbit from getting into the corn. Then they raced up and down the fence for some time; finally the rabbit turned and ran out in the other direction. The dog took after it and soon caught it.

Now what human being could reason any further than this. The rabbit reasoned that if it could get into the corn-field it could get away from the dog. The dog reasoned that he must not allow the rabbit to get into the corn because a greyhound can not catch a rabbit among the corn stalks. But what is the use in saying more on this subject. Just watch and study all animals, as I have done, and get that word "instinct" off of your mind.

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS.

Strong Reasons Why His Works Should Be Republished.

To the Editor:—I am glad that you are doing all that you can to make it possible for people to procure the writings of Dr. A. J. Davis. If men and women only knew what truths are contained in these books, every thinking family would have a set, and thousands would become students of the Harmonial Philosophy. What enlightenment would result! The causes of sickness and suffering, of misery and pain, of deformity and ignorance, of cruelty and injustice, would gradually disappear, for the key to better individual development and social harmony is clearly given in these books.

Reformation in public institutions would follow, and prison houses, asylums, court-rooms, and even the churches would be converted into places of education. Each person would learn how to be a law unto himself, and also how to labor for universal good. Then would Discord give place to Harmony!

The sects are divided among themselves. The religious organizations are as full of disunion as are the political parties. The times are chaotic, —"new truths" are but half truths; the people are like the sheep seen in the vision, those first years in Poughkeepsie—astray, without a leader—and yet, there are those precious volumes which contain light and truth, and reason, and wisdom sufficient to guide any one, in any condition of life. A repository of the laws and principles of nature, through spirit! A treasure house of infinite riches, open to all!

I wish to suggest to all progressive, spiritual thinkers, that in each town or city some one person thus interested in the development and education of others, present the public library with a full set of Dr. Davis's works. I am to do this for Skowhegan, so, will you, Mr. Editor, please send me the set of volumes as soon as they are published. It is impossible to estimate in dollars, the value of these books! "Divine Revelations" is a library of science, of principles, of truths, never before given to mankind.

Dr. Davis passed through very great trials to "deliver man" and makes freedom more than a theory. He took the mask of mystery from the face of truth. He showed to Spiritualists the way and the truth and the life! He gave freely—and still gives freely! Let us avail ourselves of this great opportunity to understand better the questions which never before, and by no other since, have been given so clear and comprehensive an answer.

A Prominent Spiritualist Ascended Higher.

Passed to spirit life from his home, 1108 B street, Washington, D. C., Mr. Edward Danforth Morrill, aged 70. He was born in Rockford, Ill., in 1837, but from his ninth year until the war broke out lived in Massachusetts, when he enlisted in the 15th Massachusetts Battery and served as Lieutenant in several of the Southern states. When the war closed he settled in Camden, Alabama, where he remained for many years, holding offices of assessor and superintendent of schools for the county and was appointed from there to the Pension Bureau at Washington, in 1880. At the time of his departure from this life he was a clerk in the Eastern Division of the Pension Bureau, although most of his service in that department was in the Southern Division. He was a member of the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., and of the Kit Carson Post G. A. R. Commander Charles S. Wilder and Adjutant Chas F. Keefer issued an order calling upon all the members of the organization to attend the obsequies and assist in giving their late comrade a soldier's burial. The writer had known Mr. Morrill for many years and highly esteemed him as a friend and fully recognized his great services at many different times for the cause of Spiritualism. He leaves a brother, Mr. Frank H. Morrill, secretary for many years of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, also a wife and son to mourn the loss of the outward presence, but to them is the knowledge that he will be near in spirit to comfort and uplift.

The funeral services were conducted at his late home by Mrs. Mary T. Longley, who pronounced a most touching and eloquent address, and was followed with a few remarks by the writer relative to his personal knowledge of the life work of the deceased. The interment was at Arlington, where services appropriate to the burial of a faithful soldier were held by the post to which he belonged. May his spirit be near to comfort those that remain, and may his life-long devotion to the principles of patriotism and true Spiritualism serve as an example to old as well as young.

THE GHOST OF THE RED MAN.

Awaking from his sleep, the warrior raised
His head upon one arm, and round him gazed,
For though his spirit stared and gently wept,
This noted chief had died there, as he slept.

No wigwam, aye, no braves, nor squaws were there,
The trees had changed, the very rocks were bare.
His bows, his arrows too had disappeared,
E'en nature in her best lay brown and seared.

Thus as he lay and as the day rolled by,
He turned and watched the stars up in the sky.
No need to tell him now that time had changed,
For by these bodies were his flights arranged.

Behold him now! A giant once was he,
A monarch such as you and I ne'er see,
He strains his eyes—he once could see a mile,
It is some spell that holds him thus meanwhile.

And, he, who ne'er had known or seen defeat,
Must bow at last; the spirit said 'twas meet.
So down again into his tomb he sped,
And since then he has reigned among his dead.

THE TRUTH OF HISTORY.

In Which the Distinguished Backslider From Spiritualism, W. F. Jamieson Figured Conspicuously.

A correspondent who paid such a noble tribute to the memory of Moses Hull, said:

"Mr. Jamieson did not advance one step after he helped his friend [Hull] into Spiritualism. He had finished his work."

As the Scotch say, "Tut, tut, mon!" Did I cease to be a humanitarian when I became a doubter?

The fact is, that I had been in the public lecture-field three years at the time of my debate with Mr. Hull, and was a Spiritualist for sixteen years afterwards, busy years, crowded full of lecture engagements, often giving eight lectures a week.

From 1878 to 1887 I traveled still more extensively, converting five more ministers from theology to common sense in my oral debates, and thousands of the laity. From 1862 to 1895 I held nearly 150 debates of from four nights to twenty-four sessions, two hours each. In this way I had the pleasure of opening the eyes of the blind to the beauties of Nature and the glories of Science.

For thirty years I have studied hard, not merely books, but nature, including that interesting volume, "Human Nature."

As I state in a magazine this month, "I am getting more and more out of sympathy with cults, creeds and clubs, and propose to 'paddle my own canoe.' I see 'good in all; none all good.' Even the churches are growing broader—they must grow, or die."

Spiritualism as a philosophy has done a great deal of this liberalizing work; so has New Thought; so has Christian Science.

Sister Childs, of Grand Rapids, says (Feb. 16): "I had the great pleasure of attending their debate, but it was held at Ionia, Mich., instead of Paw Paw. It was the finest treat I ever had. It was 'diamond cut diamond' from start to finish, with not a word of anger on either side to mar the richness."

I should have been glad of the honor; but it is not mine to claim, so I disclaim. The debate I held with Moses was at Paw Paw, as I said. I was there. The debate at Ionia was months before, between Hull and S. P. Leland. He, too, "fell from grace," but he fell further than I did—he landed in the Campbellite church!

Shall I tell you what wrecked my "spirituality"? MATERIALIZATIONS! I was after a positive proof, a demonstration. Who knows? I may yet obtain it; but it must completely satisfy my own mind. The philosophy is sublime.

WHAT IS COMING."

"Prophecies Concerning the Future of Earth and Man."

To the Editor:—I have read on page 5 of No. 898 of The Progressive Thinker, Mr. J. C. Jensen's article, "What Is Coming"—"Prophecies Concerning the Future of Earth and Man," which whil containing commonly accepted ideas, yet to my mind are found in it many ridiculous fancies. I wish to make some remarks upon a few of the many subjects big and little Brother Jensen has crowded into his production. His manner of outline precludes a connected discussion, so I will briefly present a few parallel assertions.

The physical earth will cease to be when the individual spirits of every kingdom and class, together with the residue spirit life within the realms of the earth spheres, cease to need a physical expression or cease to require the experience of this physical life. This state of affairs will take place somewhat later than 1925.

The above prophecy will become a fact when all of the earth planes become etherealized into the planetary zone of our solar system.

"As a man thinketh, so is he." But until he reach that plane of life where the consciousness is largely focused in a mental world, will he really know any truth; and until his mentality dominates his connection with all spheres below the mental, will truth be realized within.

If, (which is true of this physical life) "anything is to a person what it appears to him to be," then the world will come to an end for us when it ceases to appear to us, or when we get through with it.

All that is needed to make earth a heaven is for each person to love every other person precisely as well as himself, or to strictly practice the Golden Rule; and Brother Jensen thinks this "change of heart" will obtain by the end of 1925! Perhaps he bases his calculations upon the mental and moral aspect of our own nation where we are so unselfish! I hope he may be persuaded to extend the time five or ten years, so to give a chance for the Hottentots and South Sea islanders to fall in line.

Any individual life does not consist of an organization of matter. The material organism of any life is its visible manifestation on a certain plane. Or to believers in the duality of matter and force, life is a result of the Divine Energy acting with force through matter. Yet if I followed that line of thought, I would say that matter and force are mere qualifications or projections of the universal energy.

Attraction is an attribute of magnetism. Repulsion follows as a matter of course, because action and reaction are equal. If they were not, subtract one from the other and you would have God. (This last sentence is not intended to convey anything definite, but to suggest a thought.)

Attraction and repulsion are motion. Motion no more causes chemical changes than chemical change causes motion. All of these terms name results or changes, or series of such. We know nothing of cause in the real sense. There is no first or last to infinitude. The universe works automatically.

Climatic conditions only represent a varied amount of good for a given use. They cause nothing. They are a factor in the scheme of form evolution, but in no sense can they be said to be a cause relative to the evolution of personal mind or excellence.

Passing by many of the strangely stated propositions of Brother Jensen, in conclusion I ask the reader to compare the first with the last paragraph, and see how they harmonize; except so far as the claims for prophetship and apostleship are concerned.

PROVIDENTIAL UNBELIEF.

The Writer Points Out the Way to Find God Through the Instrumentality of Socialism.

The old established systems of the Christian religion are rapidly disintegrating these days, and they will fall with the approval of the people. One reason given for this is that they encourage unprofitable beliefs and injustice, and therefore out of harmony with the present age.

One fact is very evident: they make no effort to advance the cause of liberty, and do but next to nothing to better the condition of the laboring classes. This is pitifully evident as regards the Papacy and the Church of England, and the reason is that the leaders of these institutions are connected and in close touch with the nobility and plutocracy everywhere. Two wings of the same bird of prey are Churchism and Mammonism.

The purpose of religion is to make better the human family, and to glorify God by so doing. To pile up wealth when surrounded by poverty and distress is to cast discredit upon man and God. The wise teacher said many ages ago that tyranny shamed God and disgraced Him by making people disbelieve in Him and his providence. One of the most devilish notions prevalent with present day religions, is that which would have people believe that the wealth creating systems of our time is approved by God. Is it the will of God to tyrannize over poor little children in the mills and factories and other institutions, the object of which is to pile wealth for the owners?

If so, then the consequence will be the estrangement of the people from religion and the church, and the responsibility will rest on the church; but that is not the teaching of Christ. There is not in the New Testament one word of approval for worldly ambition or riches.

A large number of the working classes have left the churches here and in Europe, doubting there is a God because his glory and justice is not felt or seen in our industrial and religious systems more plainly. They see oppression, poverty and distress all around them; they see the laborer bending and perspiring under his heavy load, and the rich man robbing him; they see every effort made to better his condition antagonized and thwarted by the rich church leaders and the army of spies and Pinkertons in the employ of plutocracy, and in the hopelessness of his oppressed condition he cries, "There is no God!" Surely He is not apparent to us. He must be found and his favors sought in some other way or place.

This other way is Socialism. Lovers of the human family are beginning to see that this is the great highway of God on which we must travel if we would obtain His favors. But why have we not seen this before? During his stay on earth, did Jesus ever meet the rich people or the Pharisees but to condemn them? Was it not among the poor and oppressed that he loved to be and do his good works? He stayed with the people during his earth life, and in spirit he is with them to-day and in their paths will be ever stay.

The new name on his gospel will be Socialism. The meaning of gospel is "Good News," and Socialism is the only good news to the coming ages. No other system promises or is able to fulfill its requirements.

And, too, this is a great thing, Socialism is the way that will lead unbelieving people back to God to glorify and adore Him. This is the sun of all the systems, and when it becomes operative among men it will be difficult to abstain from praising God because the world will be full of His goodness and justice.—Translated from the Welsh paper, Y Drejch, for The Progressive Thinker, by A. O. Clark, Florence, Colo.

MICHIGAN STATE ASSOCIATION.

A Pleasant and Successful Mid-Winter Meeting.

The mid-winter meeting of the Michigan S. S. A. was a success. While not so large attended as some, yet the high order of talent, the interest manifest, and the harmony that prevailed, made it very enjoyable for all. The Jackson Spiritualists opened their homes and took care of all visitors and gave them the glad hand of welcome. Mrs. Abbie Sheets, our honored president, although not strong, was able with one exception to preside at all services.

Dr. A. B. Spinney, the old warhorse in Spiritualism, gave two excellent lectures that stirred the hearts of all who listened.

Mr. Will J. Erwood of Peru, Ind., gave three addresses and got very close to the people, left a good impression, and we prophecy that he will be heard in Michigan again.

Dr. Julia M. Walton of Jackson, Mich., gave one lecture, on "The Path of a Soul and a Planet," which was very profound, scientific, and listened to with deep interest by all present.

The writer gave two addresses on Sunday morning divided the time with the pioneer lecturer and medium, Dr. Johnson, of Battle Creek, Mich., and while entranced his guides gave us words of wisdom couched in beautiful language, and the lessons given left a deep impression on the minds of the people.

Our able president, Mrs. Abbie Sheets, gave a soul-stirring address that reached our hearts with love and brought us all closer together.

Mrs. Belle Fuller and the writer were the message bearers, all messages received and acknowledged correct.

It was a pleasure to meet with the workers throughout the state. Our good Brother Dent of Vicksburg, Mich., one of our good workers, was present.

Mrs. Stein and Mrs. Crawford, both excellent mediums of Detroit, Mich., helped in many ways, and these good souls are making a warm place in the hearts of the people for themselves.

We were pained to hear of the serious illness of our secretary, Miss Genevra Spaulding, that kept her from the meeting. She had the good thoughts and sympathy of all present. Mrs. May Ayres, of Lansing, took charge of the secretary's desk and kept close tab on all of the work. It seemed good to have her with us again. She was at one time secretary for six consecutive years, and enjoys the confidence and respect of the Spiritualists of our state.

All went well, and all were happy, and I am sure it was good to be there.

Best wishes for The Progressive Thinker, and fraternal greetings to its many readers.

EXPRESSES SATISFACTION

At the Great and Lasting Benefits Derived from the Phenomena and Philosophy of Spiritualism, and The Progressive Thinker.

To the Editor:—First, I wish to thank you for your valuable contribution to the spiritual literature in the volume, "Gems of Thought"—surely an appropriate title, for the book is composed of gems of thought, educating, inspiring, uplifting; a worthy appendage to The Progressive Thinker, with respect to which I wish to offer my increased appreciation.

In your issue of January 19, is an article headed, "An Honest Question." I wish to particularly thank you for it, it so completely voices my sentiments.

Now we often hear the question, "What has Spiritualism done, or what is it doing practically for the advancement of humanity?"

Personally I would like to give a practical reply. I, the ego, necessarily is my first consideration. It has entirely freed me from the thralldom of the old dogmatic religions, given to me a grand philosophy which explains the seeming mysteries of life and satisfies me with regard to their issues. It has been a moral uplift to me, curbing the passional nature, subduing it, and bringing it partially into subjection to the intellectual and wisdom power. It has introduced me to the knowledge that death, so-called, is merely the gateway of the dawn to another practical sphere of action occupied by our dear relatives and friends who have preceded us by a short interval of time.

It has made this first sphere of life more acceptable to me; made me more patient and content under its trials and temptations, given a complacent satisfaction that cause and effect are the ruling factors in our lives, and unerringly just. It has given me the companionship of an admirable medium in the presence of a loved wife.

These are a few of the good things coming to me through the grand philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism. I am always proud to be called a Spiritualist, knowing I have the best of company, scientists, poets, philosophers. Now I may say The Progressive Thinker has in a large measure been the instrument to introduce to me these benefits. Surely I would be recreant did I not occasionally add my mite to express to its editor my love and esteem for his paper. May its welcome front page with its appropriate and smiling title, and its beautiful motto underneath, be my literary portion through the rest of my sojourn on this first sphere of action.

The Work at Fall River, Mass., Moving Along Finely.

To the Editor:—Thinking that the readers of The Progressive Thinker would like to know how the work in Fall River is progressing, I take the pleasure of submitting this report. The First Spiritualist Society of Fall River is an incorporated body under the state laws of Massachusetts, and at its semi-annual election, January 7, 1907, the following officers were elected for the ensuing six months: Mrs. Hattie W. Wood, president; Mrs. Mary Grieves, vice-president; Mrs. Mary K. Barsley, treasurer; Richmond L. Grinnell, secretary; Mrs. Wood, president of the board of directors. All officers were unanimously elected to their several offices.

A little sketch of the history of the society might be fitting at this writing. Fifteen years ago, under the leadership of Mrs. Hattie W. Wood, this society was organized with seven charter members. The society had a hard struggle for existence through its earlier years, but by the persistent energy of a few faithful workers, it has maintained a slow but healthy growth. Soon after the organization, the worthy and beloved brother, who has since passed to higher life, Father Lyons, bequeathed to the society, to be paid at his death, the sum of three hundred dollars, for the purpose of building a church, and the first movement towards accomplishing this end was in May, 1906, at which time the president and the board of directors, together with the executive committee of the trust fund, purchased from the Primitive Methodist Church Association, a small church, together with a lot of land, located on Brightman street, in the north end of the city. This church, which has been used for years by the Methodists, was somewhat out of repair, and the work of renovation was begun early in the summer, and the building was formally dedicated the first Sunday in December, 1906, at which a large number of our public workers assisted in the exercises. Of more recent date, a beautiful Brussels carpet has been lain upon the floor, and a new lighting system has been installed. The church has a good membership, and under the efficient leadership of Mrs. Wood as president, is sure to make rapid strides or progress.

During the past six weeks the following speakers have served: Mrs. Lizzie D. Butler of Lynn, Mrs. Emma B. Smith of Providence; Mrs. Lizzie Pierce of Lynn, Mrs. Mabel Page of Swampscott, Mrs. Roberts of New Bedford, and Prof. R. A. Macurda of Lynn. All of these workers please their audiences and always receive a cordial greeting by the society. Feb. 24, Prof. Macurda will again fill the speaker's chair. His lectures are always helpful and his communications convincing of the continuity of life and the return of spirits. A social reception was tendered the president, Mrs. Wood, on Feb. 14, at which a very fine literary program was rendered; there were also fancy articles on sale and a sandwich supper served, from which a nice sum was realized for the building fund. We predict that the society will prosper and soon be free from encumbrances. Yours for progress, PROF. R. A. MACURDA.

MENTAL OPERATIONS.

Why Do Men Come to Opposite Conclusions.

To the Editor:—I see in No. 897 of the Progressive Thinker, a criticism by A. H. Nicholas in regard to the question, "Why do men of equal intelligence, being equally honest and sincere, having equal opportunities to investigate, come to opposite conclusions on the same subject?" He assumes that I theorize on the subject. That is not true. To the earnest thinker, there are everywhere two things in existence—forces and phenomena, the noumenon and the phenomenon, cause and effect.

In all mental operations there is a force whose phenomena we call human conduct. Ethical writers ascribe this force to knowledge, to will, and recently a number of writers calling themselves "New Thoughtists," indulging in the most extravagant conceptions in regard to mental phenomena.

But this force persists, and in consequence of its non-recognition as the relative of cause and effect, various theories are invented, even misquoting the proverb, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," leaving out "the enacting clause," "in his heart." Herbert Spencer calls this noumenon "The Unknowable," and the phenomenon "The Knowable," but really the unknowable of Spencer is the unknown to the earnest investigators, and when it is known, it is recognized as the cause, and in ethics, it is what? This is the desideratum. Wherever there are effects, there must be cause.

My critic says there are several causes. He says "persons of different character will not give the same answer * * because they have been differently educated and are biased by their faith and training." These are mental conditions, and not causes. They are the effects of causes.

The question is, Why do men think what they do think? The "why" demands a cause. When my critic can answer this question he can tell why different men arrive at different conclusions on the same subject. He assigns as a reason an effect—a mental condition the result of a force. This mental condition did not produce itself, but this he assumes, therefore his criticism is no answer to the question.

The human mind consists essentially in two fundamental elements—sensation and consciousness. Every mental operation is a sensation in consciousness; that is, a conscious sensation. These give rise to and include every possible and conceivable interest in human life. The sensation is the ever persistent and irresistible desire to live, to enjoy, to be happy. This desire is a sensation—a feeling giving rise to a concern for our well-being and that of those we love. Well-being is well-feeling, and well-feeling is enjoyment, happiness.

That feeling is the impelling force, the cause of all our activities; it is more, it is the fountain from whence flow all the joys and sorrows; and still more, it determines our destiny. It is the self existing, self-acting, self-determining force—the cause in which we move and have our being. It is essentially life itself.

Consciousness is the state of awareness, the seat of the intellect. Were there no feeling, there would be nothing to be conscious of. Were there no consciousness, we would not know that we had feeling. It is the light that illumines the pathway of life.

The law that reveals, or rather is the means of revealing to us all mental activities, may be stated thus: Feeling gives rise to the seeming of reality in what is felt. Feeling arouses consciousness; that consciousness is the seeming, the conception of the feeling. The reality is in the feeling, the seeming is the conception, the thinking of the reality. The conception of a thing is not the thing itself. The idea of a horse is not a horse. The great mistake is in taking the conception of a thing for the thing itself. We think what we feel, and not feel what we think which is "putting the cart before the horse."

Men reach different conclusions on the same subject because their feelings are different. Their conclusions are the seemings to which their feelings have given rise, and their seeming is taken for reality. What their feelings are, and how they came to have them, is another question. This subject requires many pages to illustrate it; but enough is given here to meet the criticism to which this is a brief reply.

Legality of the Temple Fund Society.

A query has been made with regard to the legality of the Temple Fund Society, asking if it is legally empowered to hold property, should such be bequeathed to it? This is an important question that no doubt a number of persons may have some interest in.

As yet the society is not incorporated under any state protection, but the intent is to do so as soon as necessary. The organization empowers the right and states its intent to so incorporate.

The T. F. S. is now chartered under the N. S. A. rules for auxiliary bodies thereto. It is claimed by some legal minds I have consulted, that the said charter fully legalizes the T. F. S. It is a society more closely allied to the N. S. A. than other of its auxiliaries, for it was organized by the N. S. A., and is supervised by it—being compelled to make reports at its annual meetings and is not permitted to make any bequests without sanction of the main body.

With a prospective large and ever-growing membership of Spiritualists, who also supervise its acts, and annually elect the officers, there is a strong guarantee of faithfulness and careful management. Soon as some property shall be acquired, the additional safeguard of a state incorporation will be secured.

It seems to many competent to judge, that the T. F. S. is a strong legal body, and has the elements of a grand, useful organization.

All donors may fully trust to the T. F. S. to carry out all promises faithfully, and attend to its duties solely for the advance of the cause of Spiritualism.

ABOUT CURING

DEAFNESS AND EYE DISEASES AT HOME

I HAVE published a new book which tells of a new method by which people who are willing to devote fifteen minutes of their time each day for a month or two, following my instructions, can cure themselves of mild forms of Deafness, Head Noises, chronic Catarrh, failing eyesight of Granulated Lids, Sore Eyes, Films, Wild Hairs, Glaucoma, Weak eyes, and ordinary eye, ear, nose and throat diseases. This book gives the causes and symptoms of each disease and tells you how you can cure it at home, explains my painless method of straightening cross eyes, etc.

I want to place one of these books absolutely free of charge in every home in the United States. One hundred thousand people have used this method. This book tells of their experience.

You can have this book and my advice free, by simply writing me a letter about your case. No money wanted. I simply want you to read of this remarkable system. Write me today.

Germs of Mind in Plants.

By R. H. France, Translated by A. M. Simons.—Cloth, Illustrated, 50 Cents.

A cardinal point in the philosophical systems favored by the ruling classes is that the mind of man is something unique in the universe, governed by laws of its own that have no particular connection with physical laws. Modern science has proved that not only animals, but also plants receive impressions from the outside world and use data thus obtained to modify their movements for their own advantage, exactly as human beings do. These facts are told in this book in so charming and entertaining a style that the reader is carried along and does not realize until later the revolutionary significance of the facts.

"The Great Work."

The Views of Master Minds with Reference to the Same.

It is a curious fact that while there are millions upon millions who believe in SPIRIT RETURN, there emanates from that belief any number of diverse views or conflicting statements, and the only way to approximately arrive at THE TRUTH is by discussion, each one accepting what seems to him the most consistent and the nearest approach to the truth.

Charles Dawbarn has had conferred upon him the honor of being "The California Philosopher," a title that fits him gracefully. Truly he is a philosopher. He is a firm believer in Spirit Return. And then there is Dr. J. D. Buck, a professor in a medical college, a profound thinker, an author of note, and a careful, critical student of everything pertaining to Spiritism or Occultism. He has probably one of the largest libraries in the world treating on those subjects. He, too, firmly believes in Spirit Return. Thus we find these TWO MASTER MINDS with exactly the same starting point, arriving at diametrically different conclusions in reference to THE GREAT WORK, the author of which fully acknowledges a belief in the phenomena of Spiritualism, but he, too, in touch with the wise sages of the higher spheres, diverges from the ordinary teaching in reference to mediumship, and in various other matters, Spiritualistic and Occult, and embodies his views in what he sees fit to designate THE GREAT WORK, another exceptionally prominent example of having SPIRIT RETURN as the starting point and diverging from the generally accepted teachings of Spiritualism.

The fundamental truth is SPIRIT RETURN, and therefrom the differentiation commences; therefrom disagreements and disputations arise as in reference to THE GREAT WORK, for if it had not been for Spirit Return that remarkable book would not be before the world to-day. Our remarks will be conceded TO BE TRUE in regard to the basic structure of Spiritualism, and the differentiations therefrom, and that is why discussions in regard to these various subjects are in order, otherwise there would be danger of another fossilized sect assuming control. Read carefully what Mr. Dawbarn and Dr. Buck have to say.

Modesty is not one of the many virtues of the author of "The Great Work," so far, at least, as the title he gives to his much advertised volume. He is proclaiming the glory of what he calls "The Great School," whose sole and unselfish purpose is to turn men into MASTERS, who, at their own will, can leave their bodies and discover secrets of immense value to mortals.

This is commendable and praiseworthy, though, as we shall see later, it is not merely dubious, but actually impossible to more than, perhaps, one in a million of the students of this wonderful school. The successful candidate must be born with an almost uncanny power of analysis and original thought. For instance the student, after a rocky climb, comes to a barrier which he can only pass after he has accurately defined the meaning of Sin, Duty, Life, Mind and fifty-three similar words, all in this formidable list. He must not even consult a dictionary, or ask aid in his task. It must be done alone. This would surely prove a quicksand to the present writer, and to any friend he has won in earth life. Nevertheless, an author with such an aim, and the representative of such a school, would not be criticised by the present writer were it not that, as in a former work, he makes it his special aim to belittle Modern Spiritualism by declaring that all its mediums, and of course their spirit helpers, are in process of destruction, whilst he and his school associates are wearing crowns of eternal glory.

The author devotes page after page to his fierce attack, but carefully hides his name. He prefers to strike in the dark, and thus avoid, if possible, any retaliation. However I must have some name to reply to, so, for want of his legal title, I will give him the initials of his book, and call him T. G. W.

Almost in his first page T. G. W. tells us that he writes only for those with personal experience, as his assertions are not provable by common mortals. The present writer claims some measure of this personal experience, and therefore the right to resist an attack upon certain grand spirits who have used mortal instruments as allies in their attempt to bless and ennoble manhood.

Sometime in the inconceivably remote past, we are told by T. G. W. that a great school was founded with the object of blessing mankind by developing, or aiding the mortal to develop his own spiritual powers. This great school he calls "The School of Natural Science." "Our modern scientists have taught us that in that remote past man was merely creeping up to manhood, and that a "stone" age, when man knew nothing of minerals, and had not even the use of fire, was the first step in the ascent of man. Now in the name of Science—Science being the orderly arrangement and study of fact—where did the learned teachers of this wonderful school get the education that qualified them for their task?

But this is only half the difficulty, for T. G. W. gravely tells us, and expects us to believe, that about the same time another school, with its learned teachers, was also founded, but with a very different object. It was selfish all the way through. It made its head-quarters in Egypt, just as the school of T. G. W. centered in what we know as India. And T. G. W. with equal gravity, traces the work of this second school up through the civilization which he calls "pagan" until its manifestation of to-day in and through the Catholic church.

The present writer has not the time or space to dwell on these marvelous assumptions by T. G. W., but such teachers must have come from some other world, or have been created for the purpose. But when we remember that bad as well as what he calls the "good" had precisely the same mysterious origin, we must judge the tree, in each case, by its fruit. So we ask what this School of Natural Science, with its masters and adepts hailing from India, has really done either for the country of its birth, or for the world it is seeking to bless.

We remember that its object is to evolve MASTERS who can largely control Nature's laws, and thus compel them to the service of man. So we ask: What has it done for India? We have there one of the most hopelessly degraded populations in the world. Where are their educators? We are told that some 20,000 die from snake bites every year. Our scientists have just discovered a remedy. Almost a hundred thousand die from tigers and leopards which the miserable native does not dare to kill. We know there are millions in that unhappy country who die from filth diseases, all preventable. And millions more become victims of plagues whose germs and bacteria are being conquered and destroyed by modern scientists, but without help from this wonderful School of Science, of whose scholars not one in a million could reach the degree of MASTER, and leave their body at will.

T. G. W. tells us that one of the greatest of these MASTERS made a lengthy stay in America, and twenty-five years ago became his teacher. So this country was a chosen field for this School of Natural Science. Now, what did he do, or what has he or his School of Natural Science done for us? At the present time our government officials tell us the apple crop of America has 200 insect foes, costing us twelve millions every year. The Hessian fly destroys wheat every year to the value of 100 millions of dollars. The chinch bug leaves our other grain crops another hundred millions short in hard cash. And so on, and so on, till with bot-flies, gad-flies, ticks, lice, tapeworms, etc., which devour our innocent animals, this country is 785 millions of dollars to the bad every year through its myriad foes. Our scientists are fighting these foes one by one, bravely and sometimes successfully, but what has this School of Natural Science done for the toiling agriculturist?

And when we come to man himself, he has foes everywhere around him. They are in the air he breathes, the water he drinks, as well as in his daily food. Our scientists have chased these hidden foes till yellow fever and malaria are tracked down to mosquitoes and flies, and are being eradicated, but not by the mythical MASTERS extolled by T. G. W. The whole following of filth diseases are being routed by Modern Science without any aid from the MASTERS of that Ancient School.

Surgery, with its modern triumphs, is as impossible to the MASTERS of T. G. W. as to the followers of Mrs. Eddy, for both are limited to the use of "mind powers," and equally unlearned in the use of tools. In a word, the social problems of to-day are met by this School of Natural Science and T. G. W. with learned teachings as to human brotherhood. But all the same, after these untold thousands of years, its own country of India is one mass of fetid sores, whose stench cries to the heaven of Modern Science for relief.

Such is the School which would teach clairvoyance, clairaudience, and freedom to leave the body, by a system of rigid rules that none but a born expert could master and obey. Unless a child has a born faculty for music, mathematics, or spiritual gifts, no School of Natural Science could make him a MASTER in such expressions of his manhood. We are all limited in our mortal life by the shape of our brains, and other organs, and few can rise to any higher level, no matter what the School of T. G. W. may teach.

And now when we turn to the other school, with its old headquarters in Egypt, and denounced by T. G. W., we find its results quite as good, and often brilliantly superior along the pages of history. In fact we might easily trace most of our present advances to the influence of that Great School. Its mighty civilization collapsed through mortal incapacity and greed. But our modern social systems of to-day are, from precisely the same causes, tottering to their fall. Human nature may have to begin all over again, and again, but its salvation, when it comes, will be by obedience to its own scientific discoveries, and the laws of its own nature, not taught by this wonderful School of Natural Science.

T. G. W. tells us much of the wonderful spirit powers to be evolved by the processes which lead to MASTERSHIP in his School. But the world does not need spiritual men and women. It needs, and is evolving earthly men and women who will subdue nature to their needs in this life, resting assured they are thereby best fitting themselves for the life to come.

And now a word by the present writer as to his motive in writing this. He would not put even a straw in the way of T. G. W. when he is urging his pupils to become unworldly for this life in order to develop certain spiritual powers. But when T. G. W. assumes to declare that his School is the only path to "constructive manhood," and that mediumship, IN ITSELF, leads to destruction, and at the same time hides himself by keeping his name locked up in safe deposit, it becomes necessary that some one with the personal experience he demands, should have a word to say on the other side of the question.

The selfhood T. G. W. so earnestly inculcates has been taught and urged by all the guides of the prominent platform workers with whom I have conversed. Certain mediums were reduced to temporary unconsciousness because otherwise no reliable spirit thought could be passed through their brain, and vocal organs. But in every case, so far as I have known, such instruments have been both protected and instructed, SO FAR AS THE ORGANISM OF THE MEDIUM WOULD PERMIT. There is always an element of martyrdom in mediumship which surely wins its spiritual reward.

T. G. W. speaks of listening to an admirable trance lecture through a young lady. He went away sorrowful because the lecture was the thought of a higher mind than her own, and she was thereby being destroyed. He does not permit himself to realize that possibly thousands were or would be blessed by such lectures through that lady's organism. If that was to result in destruction to the medium, every attempt to elevate manhood is a damnable fraud. And those invisible friends back of her were not progressed spirits seeking to help manhood to a higher level, but just devils, luring their hearers to destruction. Or if they were really spirits trying to do good they were themselves hastening to destruction, and carrying their medium with them. Those with personal experience, like my own for over thirty-five years, of private or family intercourse with spirits, remember gladly even the reproofs they often received when in some incident they had fallen below their own knowledge of right and duty, for the spirit of love pervaded even that reproof. The gross slander of loving spirits who for a brief time control mediums, indulged in by T. G. W., is painful to every experienced Spiritualist, for he realizes, perhaps, their daily presence, and that they always bring with them just such a blessing as the mortal limitation will permit.

I know full well the dark side of mediumship, and perhaps quite as well as T. G. W., but in this life there is a dark side to everything. The darkest night never means "destruction" to the coming day. It will be well when both worlds realize that spirit intercourse has done its grandest work when it has proved immortality, and destroyed the fear of death. Spirit return may sometimes be perverted and become a curse, but so may too much sunshine in earth life. Spirit Return brings no more of Nature's secrets to earth than does the School of Natural Science, in which T. G. W. is a teacher. It proves immortality, and nothing more than mortal man cannot better discover for himself. No spirit proclaims the X-ray, or discovers radium. The microbes of disease were spirit discoveries, and the process by which society can really evolve happiness instead of misery will remain a secret till the mortal discovers it for himself.

I am claiming no superiority for Modern Spiritualism over the MASTER doctrine taught by T. G. W. but I am, with my whole soul, denouncing his assertion that the control of a mortal by a spirit necessarily involves the destruction of either that mortal or spirit. The grand teachings of Spirit Tien, of Spirit John Pierpont, and many another with whom I have been less familiar, would be ill requited by destruction because they had used the organism of a mortal. For the rest, I may say I have probably analyzed Modern Spiritualism as thoroughly as any other believer, and constantly exposed its weaknesses, but all the same, to me spirit return is a great blessing, and almost daily grander than ever in this the evening of my mortal life.

CHARLES DAWBARN.

San Leandro, Cal.

A Reply by Dr. J. D. Buck.

We can scarcely call Mr. Dawbarn's paper a "Review" of this remarkable book. That would be something more than "poetic license"; it would be a perversion of fact. Book reviewing nowadays is rather a profession than an art, and the professional reviewer, unless it is the policy of his editor to condemn or to detract or caricature, gives, after glancing through a volume, the author's thesis, or aim, or point of views, and then his own opinion as to whether and how far the author has succeeded in his undertaking.

Fortunately for the reader of Mr. Dawbarn's paper he is left in no doubt as to the "policy of the writer. He defines his own motive very clearly. The author of THE GREAT WORK, says Mr. Dawbarn, "would not be criticised by the present writer were it not that, as in a former work, he makes it his special aim to belittle Modern Spiritualism by declaring that all its mediums, and of course their spirit helpers, are in process of destruction, whilst he and his school associates, are wearing crowns of eternal glory." Here is the animus in the writer's own words.

Whether the charge here made by Mr. Dawbarn against the author of "The Great Psychological Crime" and "THE GREAT WORK" be true or false, Mr. Dawbarn is bound to belittle, misinterpret, get even, or strike back, and this he does wholly regardless of the motive or thesis, or contents of the book.

As a cold matter of fact the author of these books nowhere says that "all mediums* * * and their spirit helpers are in process of destruction," or that he or his school "are wearing crowns of eternal glory." That this is Mr. Dawbarn's opinion, or interpretation of the author's position, is undoubtedly true, and its value to anyone who has intelligently and dispassionately read the books in question may be easily determined. What the author says and reiterates again and again is, that intelligent choice and rational volition are constructive processes in individual life, and that surrender of the will to, and the domination of the intelligence by, any hypnotist, spirit, spook or priest is a destructive process in individual life.

The author might have quoted from the annals of hypnotism cases reduced to imbecility by hypnosis, as he quoted cases of moral wreck from mediumship. This is like saying that alcoholism tends to destruction of manhood and the wreck of individual life without saying that every drunkard is doomed to hell or destruction.

If Mr. Dawbarn has had as much experience as he claims, he must have seen some of these moral wrecks among mediums, where self control and rational volition so far as any intelligent person could judge, would have prevented the disaster.

These are questions of fact, of common experience and observation, and they are illustrated and fully justified in the annals of both Spiritualism and hypnotism. Indeed, Mr. Dawbarn himself admits this "dark side of mediumship," and makes the consoling comment that, "in this life there is a dark side to everything," as though that could justify the conscious participation in the wrecking of human lives by a process known, in some cases at least, to be destructive.

The author of these books denies none of the facts of Spiritualism, in which, as a student and observer, he has had wide experience. He says, in spirit and in substance: "Take the facts, and come, my brothers and sisters, and let us reason together, and see if there is not a better way of getting the facts along constructive rather than destructive lines, so as to require the 'sacrifice' (as Mr. D. puts it) of no human being, but, on the contrary, to aid in every case their higher evolution and happiness."

This is not only the thesis—the whole theorem—of these books, but the animus, observation and experience of their author. And what answer does Mr. Dawbarn and many of his associates make to this appeal? First, they seem much provoked, to say the least, that they "cannot find a head to hit." The author conceals his very "Christian name," and hides in a nom de plume, or as Mr. D. puts it, in a safe deposit. True, the author gives in "THE GREAT WORK" the specific reasons for this concealment, and the results to the work and the workers of personal revelation all through the ages. If, however, these have been read at all by Mr. D. they are never referred to.

Passing beyond the nom de plume, misapplication, careless or ignorant misrepresentation, denial without evidence, and sarcasm or ridicule, seems to be the "argument"; in other words the books are pre-judged, and condemned outright. I hold that this course is not only adverse to the simple cause of Truth, but equally adverse to the best interests of Spiritualism, which certainly in the long run can ill afford to sacrifice truth to prejudice.

If the principles elucidated in these books are untrue; if they are not supported by facts, by experience and observation, it would seem the better way to dispassionately and intelligently make this clear, when they would fall by their own weight of falsehood, where denunciation, abuse or ridicule would leave them unscathed. In other words, the attitude of many Spiritualists toward these principles tends, with the candid observer to confirm them. Even were they false, they would never die in that way.

Coming now more specifically to Mr. Dawbarn's references to "THE GREAT WORK" (a review it certainly is not. Mr. D. seems unfamiliar with the fact that under this same title, "THE GREAT WORK," the quest for certain knowledge of the nature, powers and destiny of the human soul, and the records or experience of seekers for such knowledge, has been known for ages. If Mr. D. were familiar with these records—some of which are here at my elbow dating back over three hundred years, he would have found less reason to question the "modesty" of the author of "THE GREAT WORK."

Mr. D. says, "the author devotes page after page to his fierce attack, but carefully conceals his name. He prefers to strike in the dark." The "fierce attack" and the "strike in the dark" are figments of Mr. D's. own intelligence. I defy him to find in all literature language more dispassionate, motives more pure, sympathies more kindly, than run through every page of these books. I may here confess that it was the gentle and serene spirit that pervades these books, condemning crime by resistless facts, logic, and exposure, with never a word of condemnation for the "criminal," that sent the present writer nearly four years ago on a pilgrimage to see, and sit at the feet of their author. A more gentle, wise, helpful, and inspiring soul it has never been my good fortune to meet in nearly seventy years of delving into the mysteries of life. I read the soul of the author in his work, and the acquaintance has ripened into confidence and love. He is Master indeed of more actual knowledge than any one I ever knew, and this knowledge is given as freely as the blessed mother gives sustenance to the babe at her loving breast; and not only "without the hope of fee or reward," but gladly, joyously as to a brother. Immodesty and self-conceit scarcely apply to such a character; nor will he require defense or justification to any one who, with open mind and a desire for the simple truth, prejudging nothing, carefully reads what he has written. This verdict I have had from very many who had read his words without being fully prepared to accept his conclusions.

Further along Mr. Dawbarn says, referring to the Adepts or Masters: "Such teachers must have come from some other world or been created for the purpose."

In the most careful and painstaking way the author shows them to be the result of normal evolution under the constructive principle in individual life, the real "Harmonics of Evolution" under Natural Law. He furthermore shows how anyone, exercising a wakeful consciousness, rational volition, self-control and independent choice, inspired by high ideals, and recognizing personal responsibility at every step, may have the unqualified assurance that he is progressing in the same direction, and will eventually arrive at the same goal of Mastership.

Evolution is a slow and painful process, with man enmeshed in ignorance, superstition and fear. The "School of Natural Science" is a school of individual effort, by which only any soul can rise to higher planes. Vicarious atonement has no place in this normal evolution. Mr. Dawbarn inquires, sometimes facetiously, sometimes quite arrogantly, why don't the Masters do this and that in America or India? Since he denies virtually the probability or possibility of their existence, is it quite "modest" for him to lay out their work and dictate their duties? In their greater wisdom and beneficence—supposing them to exist at all—are they not quite as likely to be able to determine the line of least resistance and greatest good to man, as one who has no conception as to how they can exist at all?

He speaks of India and its people as among the most degraded of earth's peoples. "Why do not the Masters redeem India?" If Mr. Dawbarn will take the pains to read "The Webb of Indian Life," by Margaret E. Noble, who lived for years among the people of India, and quite disagreed with the accounts given us by missionaries, as to the "Heathen in his darkness," he will probably change his mind as to the "degradation" of this "mild Hindoo." Over populated and poverty-stricken India is, but she is the Mother of Religions, of Philosophies and Psychic Science, and has been for untold ages. If he will add to this the principle of the evolution and decline of races which are born, reach their prime and decay and die, just like individuals, he will find "degradation" an unfit term to apply to the people. If he had gleaned from THE GREAT WORK even the crudest conceptions of what a Master is, how he comes to be, or what he can do, he would hardly set him the task of killing tigers or serpents in India, or of preventing the loss of several millions of money in this country by bugs and "vermin" that eat their portion of grain provided by Nature for the sustenance of all life.

He might, however, find a text for a sermon in the stock exchange, the adulteration of foods, and the gambling in grain that presses upon human beings more than all the "bugs" in creation, and it I have apprehended the spirit of the Masters, in this crusade, he would be sure to win their approval and possibly their help.

Mr. Dawbarn compares the wisdom of these Masters to Mrs. Eddy, and says, "both are limited to the use of Mind Powers." How does he happen to know this when he does not even believe they exist at all. On page 38 of THE GREAT WORK, Natural Science is clearly defined, quoting from "The Harmonics of Evolution." It is shown to include Physical Science, Mental Science and Psychic Science. This would imply, by any fair construction, that the student or Master in Natural Science found interest and occupation in every field of Nature and in every department in the life of man.

Mr. Dawbarn says: "The selfhood T. G. W. so earnestly inculcates has been taught and urged by all the guides of the prominent platform workers with whom I have conversed." Strange paradox, to teach "self-hood" by using a method that annuls it! This is like preaching liberty to a man while you have him securely handcuffed and loaded with chains, with the knowledge of the fact gained by experience and observation, that the oftener you chain him (hypnosis or "control") the less resistance he makes, till in time he abandons the very idea of freedom, and is the victim of any passing spook or traveling hypnotist. If human language or mental concepts have any meaning whatever, the Spiritualistic platform does not teach the same self-hood taught in THE GREAT WORK. It is hardly worth while to confuse issues in this way.

Again Mr. D. says: "When T. G. W. declares that his school is the only path to constructive manhood," etc., etc. It would be interesting to those who have carefully read every line of the Harmonic Series, which I am charitable enough to believe Mr. D. has not, if he would point to any page or paragraph where such a claim or assertion is made. Not only can he find no such statement, but many times and in many places it is declared that whosoever exercises independent choice, rational volition, self-control and strives to raise himself and help all others to rise to higher evolution, is working strictly on the lines of the constructive principle in individual life, even though he never heard of the School of Natural Science.

There are many such paradoxes running all through Mr. Dawbarn's paper, but it would require too much space to attempt to refer to them all.

If my good brother could bring himself to the point of reading the book carefully and dispassionately, prejudging nothing; if he would say, to begin with, "Suppose this is all true," "let us see," and then take the simple facts from his own observation and experiences, as to the safety or wholesomeness of surrendering one's own conscious intelligence to anyone or anything; not as to the result in every case, but as to the tendency and the principle involved, and as to the result in some cases; if he is honest and intelligent, as I believe he is, I think he would take an entirely different view of THE GREAT WORK, and possibly be even more discriminating than he now admits himself to be, regarding the "dark side" and the bright side of mediumship.

Cincinnati, Ohio. J. D. BUCK.

THE GREAT WORK.

The Title of the Book Explained in Connection With Mr. Dawbarn's Article.

To the Editor:—The first sentence of Mr. Dawbarn's article on the subject of THE GREAT WORK is clearly intended to convey to his readers the suggestion that in selecting the title of it, the author was endeavoring to compliment himself upon the results of his own effort, instead of naming the THEME upon which his book is based.

All through the book the author refers, time and again, to "The Great Work" in such manner as to make clear to any honest reader that he is in no wise referring to THE BOOK he is writing, but to THE GREAT WORK OF SPIRITUAL UNFOLDMENT which constitutes the central theme of the book.

At page 49, third line from the bottom, he refers to the evident purpose of Jesus "to educate a select group of men for the express purpose of enabling them to carry forward THE GREAT WORK," etc. Evidently this has no reference to the book.

Page 50, line 10, he speaks of "their part in THE GREAT WORK," etc. An infant would have sufficient intelligence to know that he does not refer to his book.

At pages 187, line 3; 316, line 10; 319, line 23; 389, line 3, the author refers specifically to "THE GREAT WORK OF SPIRITUAL UNFOLDMENT," in such manner as to leave not the shadow of doubt in the mind of any honest reader that this is "The Great Work" to which the title of his book refers.

See also pages 152, lines 11, 22 and 30; 260, line 12; 271, line 11; 363, line 20; 390, last line, and 455, line 14.

Each and every one of these references refutes Mr. Dawbarn's unfair insinuation. It is due to the readers of The Progressive Thinker who claim to be honest and love fair play, that they read the book for themselves, and note how easy it is for an unfair critic to misrepresent the entire spirit and purpose of the work.

It is deeply to be regretted that men who profess to be honest will thus take advantage of an innocent public by what amounts in essence to a deliberate misrepresentation. Thanks, however, to the natural love of honesty and fair play, it is only the ignorant who will be misled by such tactics. Close readers of human nature will have little difficulty in sensing the prejudice and unreasoning hostility which prompt Mr. Dawbarn to preface his article with an insinuation which is intended to prejudice his readers before they have had an opportunity to reach the merit of the work itself and form their own unbiased conclusions.

OUR GREAT LOSS.

Our Big Brother Moses Hull, and Our Incomparable Jennie Hagan Brown.

The Progressive Thinker of February 2 brings me a wonderful amount of information of all grades from grave to gay. And the most startling and shocking is the account of the sudden transition of our Big Brother Moses Hull and our incomparable Jennie Hagan Brown—two of the best advocates of Spiritualism that have ever proclaimed its truths by voice and pen.

I was reading in a previous number a breezy letter from Brother Hull, giving an account of his trip to this coast, and the happy family reunion, etc., and I said, "Moses Hull beats them all for grit and adhesiveness; it is remarkable that he can keep up courage so long."

I have been reading of late, his book, "Our Bible, Who Wrote It?" It is a remarkably well written volume, and every speaker on our platform should possess it, to defend his position if called upon to do so.

We have lost a powerful man inasmuch as he was the champion expounder of "Biblical Spiritualism," and was, without doubt, the best debater in our ranks;

Mrs. Hull needs all the strength we can send her. May she live many years to continue her important labors as Mrs. Hull, the true helpmate of Moses Hull, the peer of defenders of spiritual and rational religion.

Our Jennie! Bless her sunny, cheerful spirit! She spoke such beautiful sympathetic and spiritual thoughts to me when she visited this coast the last time. I was worn out with the awful weight of duty and sickness.

She and Mrs. (Robinson) Gillespie were the life of the camp at Mantua, Ohio, in 1894, when Mrs. Perkins and myself were ordained by the Ohio State Association, Mr. King president. I have met her many times, and always found her ever kind, happy, and full of inspiration from the spheres of light and wisdom, as well as from the realms of wit and humor. She has dropped in the harness, and left behind thousands of sorrowing friends, for it doesn't seem possible that she could have had an enemy.

We may each and all feel proud of our "Little Jennie" and her record.

What are we going to do in the future for workers? Who will sacrifice as have many of the old-time heroes and heroines on the spiritual and mental battle field?

Brother Barrett, the valiant and faithful banner bearer, is still ringing out in no uncertain tones his principles; and who can question many of his points so well taken?

It is astonishing that his frail body holds that vigorous spirit so long and firmly. His articles upon the fraud question are, to my mind, almost without a flaw? Who can excel him? I don't know. Do you?

Let us assist him all we can, lest he slip away from us.

May The Progressive Thinker publish his articles a hundred years, and the N. S. A. live at least that long, is my earnest wish and desire.

WHILE THE WORLD PASSES ON.

There are eyes grown dim with Unshed tears; there are lips
Long mute with a song
Unsung; and many the hearts
That in solitude break till
Death kindly enters
And flings wide the gate,
While the world passes on,
While the world passes on.

There are sobs like the wind,
And tears like the rain
As it beats 'gainst the pane
On a dark lonely night;
And thoughts like the shadows
That flit here and there,
With the sense of a something
We fain try to grasp,
While the world passes on,
While the world passes on.

Life comes and life goes,
A long, endless chain;
To-day we are laughing,
To-morrow we weep,
And the silence but
Taunts us as frenzied, we Stretch our arms toward the Darkness for some one we miss,
While the world passes on,
While the world passes on.

Love clasping Youth whirls
On in the dance; the lights
Flare and flicker; the hours
Speed away; there are Soft strains of music,
The free flow of wine,
To lure on the victim,
Or make glad the bride,
While the world passes on,
While the world passes on.

O souls! there is freedom
In that land far away,
Where the sun ever shines
With a soft lustrous light,
Where the bruised and the weary
Find welcome and peace,
As sweet songs of angels
Lull sad hearts to rest,
While the world passes on,
While the world passes on.

AN ACROSTIC.

Moses Hull, our dear old friend,
Our eyes look upward still to thee,
So much we need thy helping hand,
E'en tho' through tears we dimly see,
Since thou hast joined the angel band,
Heaven does not seem so far away.
Until thine own shall cross the strand,
Let loving hearts e'er be her stay,
Lest she grow weary on the way.

An Unpleasant State of Facts.

The Truth Seeker, after quoting the confession, as published in the Christian Advocate, of one who "has been the pastor of important churches in progressive cities, and is still in active service," but who said, without giving his name:

"I am fully persuaded that a complete revelation of my belief to which my studies have forced me, would set the ears of my congregation tingling, and awaken antagonism to me personally."

Then, passing over much interesting matter, the editor of the Truth Seeker goes on to say:

"We have received many letters from clergymen who have outgrown their creeds, inquiring if the Liberals have an organization by which they can put men on platforms where they can tell the truth and still get bread and butter for their families."

The editor thinks the trial and suspension from the ministry of Dr. Crapsey for heresy, has deterred many from giving voice to their honest convictions. And this is doubtless true.

The most helpless persons in the world are educated clergymen who have abandoned their pulpits. Without trades to fall back upon; without pecuniary resources or experience to fit them for commercial lives, and usually too aged to qualify for success in any of the other professions, they are absolutely objects of sympathy. We have met with many such cases. If bread and butter are the summum bonum of existence perhaps the best thing these heretical preachers can do is to shut their eyes, close their ears, and whoop up hell and the miseries of the damned, as their ancestors did, for the residue of their lives, feeling all the time they are hypocrites, and ought to stand daily with back to a kicking machine for an hour, and receive during all that time its most powerful vibrations.

A New Freak.

The clergy have a new device for extending the orthodox faith. It is known as Gospel Meetings in Factories. The movement is to be inaugurated in New York. One hundred meetings are to be held in ten days, one in each factory where they can gain entrance. Fifty thousand workmen are expected to be reached by persons who never attend church service. Meetings are to be held at noon during recess for luncheon, and each is to last twenty minutes; half the time the ears are to be tickled with music; the other half, probably, to tell how good God was to build a fiery hell in which to burn sinners, then to beget a son and allow him to die on a cross, at the instigation of men, to placate his own anger, the sacrifice not to be effective unless the sinner believes that son is equal to the Father, yes, that Father himself, and co-eternal with him.

So soon as the whistles blow the noon hour, the priestly clan will rush in, take possession of the largest room, with consent of the owner, then, says the report:

"Men in the slaughter houses drop their knives and stand bare-armed, with bloody aprons, and laborers in machine shops begrimed with oil and dust, wrenches still in hand, listen with open ears to childhood instruction they have long since repudiated as the teachings of a barbarian religion, transmitted to an age of enlightenment, and perpetuated that the clergy may gain support at the expense of the toiler."

Ten days will be enough to show the shallowness of the project, and the experiment to save souls by a new process will end, to prevent riots. Men allowed half an hour to lunch have other duties that require attention than listening to a positively ignorant priesthood, whose only knowledge of heaven or God is limited to what some ignoramus of two or three thousand years ago conjectured.

Facts for Home Consumption.

A journalist discoursing on the wonderful progress in the sciences during the last half century, said:

"It is probably true at no previous period of the world's history have so many minds been occupied with attempts to penetrate the secrets of Nature, and make their discoveries serviceable to mankind as during the last fifty years."

Why was this? Because there was a determination on the part of the Christian church to stay progress. Every new discovery had to be treated by the Bible, and if incompatible with what was called "divine revelation" it was declared false and rejected.

Each of the sciences had to be subjected to that crucial test. Copernicus, who revealed the secrets of the planetary system to the world, about 1530, for fear of the Inquisition, withheld his discoveries until death had him well in his grasp.

The writer well remembers the violent opposition the church set up to the revelations of the geologists. Their teachings conflicted with the story of creation, as told in Genesis, and only for want of power did the priests neglect to silence the bold innovators on their creeds. But the geologists concocted an explanation in regard to creation to enable them to gain a hearing. They claimed the days mentioned in Genesis were long periods of time; that each day may have represented millions of years. The preachers caught the idea gladly, and at once geology came into favor.

But the ingenious geologists did not explain how it chanced light dawned four days before the sun was made; neither did they explain how grass and trees with fruit flourished before the appearance of that luminary. Neither did they note the fact that if the six days of creation were periods of indefinite length, and God rested on the seventh period, why man should rest on the seventh natural day, because God set an example.

But there was another retarding influence, perhaps the most important of all, which served to suppress the advance of knowledge and the progress of the race: The great scholars, they who had brains to reason and gain knowledge by questioning Nature; who saw the wickedness of the ruling priesthood, were arrested and silenced by burning them at the stake, or confining them in dungeons, or cutting out the tongue. Go read the story of Bruno, of Galileo, of Vanini, of Servetus, with an innumerable multitude of lesser lights.

The intellect of the world was slaughtered, and those of mediocre ability remained to perpetuate the species.

Suppose the Wattses, the Fultons, the Morses, the Edisons, all the great inventors of the last hundred years, had been murdered so soon as they began to bring out their discoveries, where would we be to-day? Just where the priesthood found civilization when they gained control of the secular arm, and began their persecutions to prevent progress.

The church has been the retarding influence through all the centuries. With Paul's declaration as guide, "Without shedding of blood [there] is no remission,"—Heb. 9:22,—so slaughter and blood have been the instruments it employed through all the ages until recent years to evangelize the world. And it only ceased to employ its most effective weapon when science gained the mastery; but the conflict still goes on and will until priestcraft is silenced, and with it its ability to tyrannize over humanity.

The People Have Rights.

Again and again let it be borne in mind, the church structures in France, unlike those in America built by the contributions of church members, were constructed at the expense of the government. The money was wrested from all classes of the people by burdensome taxes, church members contributing no more in proportion to their resources than infidels. The property belonged to the people and the authorities, representing the people, only reclaimed their own.

Instead of oppressing the churches, an offer was made to lease the structures for church service; but a foreign potentate, known as a Pope, declined the proposition, then appealed to the Christian world telling of his terrible grievance. That Pope attempted to array the Catholics against the French Republic, with the view to a revolution. He was foiled in his scheme.

Protestant clergymen in this country, not taking the dissimilarity of facts into account, have preached long sermons denouncing "atheistic France" for its aggressions on religion. This is another case where a fellow feeling makes the sympathies wondrous kind. For years the Catholic and some of the Protestant churches in America, have exhausted their ability to again reunite church and state; to make the civil arm of the government subordinate to the sacerdotal. Thus far they have failed, hence the reason for their tears, and their long and bitter diatribes against our sister republic.

Ingersoll's Tribute to Lincoln.

Ingersoll, in his oration on President Lincoln, said:

"Lincoln was patient as Destiny. Nothing discloses real character like the use of Power. It is easy for the weak to be gentle. Most people can bear adversity. But if you wish to know what a man really is, give him power. This is the supreme test. It is the glory of Lincoln that having almost unlimited power, he never abused it, except on the side of mercy. Wealth could not purchase, power could not corrupt this divine, this loving man. He knew no fear, except the fear of doing wrong. He longed to pardon. He loved to see the pearls of joy on the cheeks of the wife whose husband he had rescued from death."

THE GREAT WORK.

The discussion in regard to this epoch-making book is exciting great interest all along the line. The fact that all who enter into this discussion are firm believers in Spirit Return and the phenomena arising therefrom, adds special value and significance to the various sentiments expressed, and our Cause will be greatly benefited in the end. The difference of opinion existing among Spiritualists in reference to a great many important questions IS EQUALLY AS GREAT as that now existing between the illustrious Lyman C. Howe and those who contend THE GREAT WORK is the embodiment of truth, and this fact alone renders the discussion especially valuable to every reflective mind.

DANGEROUSLY ILL.

We are pained to learn that Mr. Theo. J. Mayer, treasurer of the N. S. A., is lying dangerously ill at his home in Washington, D. C., and but little hopes are entertained of his recovery. It will be a sad blow to Spiritualism if this illustrious man should now pass to spirit life. All should send him healing, uplifting thoughts, praying for his ultimate recovery.

Japan to Be Christianized.

This is the news from Tokio, and it comes from Christian source: "The first World's Conference held by Christians in Asia, is to convene in the capital of Japan the first week in April; and the general secretary, John R. Mott, of the World's Student Christian Federation, is already on the ground to arrange for the reception of five hundred delegates, and plan the mode of procedure. An evangelistic campaign in the principal cities of the empire is to follow the session."

If Japan is Christianized by pacific action, it will be the first government since the Roman empire reared the banner of the cross, which did not employ force as the means of conquest.

Must Be Universal.

Twenty-six years of constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic in Kansas, and yet Gov. Hoch of that state, in his last message to the legislature, recommends the building of a state hospital for the cure of alcoholism. Does this prove that "prohibition does not prohibit?" as Gov. Robinson, a strictly temperate man, claimed, when that feature of the Kansas constitution was insisted upon.

The Progressive Thinker, its editor and all its employes, are tee-totalers, and yet it is of the opinion, the pending option law in the Illinois legislature, if adopted, will encourage drunkenness, instead of preventing it. Prohibitory laws to be effective must be universal.

Mission a Grand Success.

"I came not to send peace, but a sword."—Jesus—Matt. 10:34.

The strife still goes on, and is everywhere, even in the manger where it is alleged "our Lord" was born.

A cablegram from Rome, of Feb. 5, tells of a recent fight in the Sacred Grotto in Bethlehem between Franciscan, Armenian and Greek monks. The Armenians were officiating at their altar, and prevented the Italian-Franciscan from passing, by felling him with sticks. Others rushed to the scene and a general melee ensued, one Italian, one Spanish, and three Armenian-Greek monks were wounded. Of course the Mohammedan officials had to intervene to save the lives of these Christian belligerents. Such scenes between the worshipers of Jesus are said to be common in the "Holy City."

TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

And More Liberality Is Manifested on the Part of the Secular Press.

To the Editor:—The Herald is one of the leading Boston papers, and used frequently to ridicule the subject of Spiritualism. I will tell you an utterance:

Thirty-five years ago a Mrs. Warner, one of our western lecturers, made a speech in Walton Park Camp. The Herald the next morning caricatured it in the severest manner.

Ed. Wheeler came into the conference one morning with the Herald in his hand, strode out in front and said:

"I have something here for you. When I read it, I said, 'Damn the Boston Herald!' and the recording angel wrote it down as a phonetic prayer!"

We were all shocked at his choice of language until he interpreted it as a phonetic prayer, then we said, "Amen."

The following editorial that appeared a few days ago shows what Time has done:

"The Astral Dr. Hodgson."

"Should any reader about alleged spirit phenomena deride "messages" because they do not tell him what he expected, or what he would like to know, or what he considers "ennobling."? Our very ignorance of the life to come makes it absurd for us to attempt the setting up of standards by which to judge genuineness. If only it be insisted that adequate precautions be taken against trickery, the sensible attitude toward such "communications" as Dr. Hodgson's to Dr. Hyslop is one of respect for the efforts of eminent scientists and of hope that the medium of speech, if it really exists, will become developed, as electricity did, and later a wireless, until the messages may tell something of the next world."

SPIRITISM.

Involving as It Does the Belief in an Existence Beyond the Grave, Spiritism Concerns and Interests us most Intimately and Profoundly. Is there a single Materializing Medium in this city who will submit to a Test like the one narrated by Mr. Berry, the Spirit Wearing Apparel Dematerializing as he Held it Tightly in his grasp? If they Will Not, it is Because the "Spirit Garments" Worn by the Alleged spirits are Manufactured for the Occasion; Fraudulent Throughout, and of course it would "destroy conditions" to have someone take hold of the same. Mr. Berry's article is worthy of careful perusal.

"YES!" WAS SPOKEN, THE FACE DOWNWARD BENT, SO THAT THE EYES, LUMINOUS AND LIQUID IN THEIR EXPRESSION, COULD SEE THEM. "THEY ARE BEAUTIFUL, BUT LOOK AT MY HAIR,' THE WHILE TURNING HER HEAD, THROWING THE MASS TO THE FRONT, EACH STRAND GLISTENING AND SHIMMERING WITH LIGHTS AS THOUGH IT HAD LIQUID FIRE RUNNING THROUGH IT. THE HAIR, OF A LIGHT COLOR, AND LONG, WAS, VERITABLY OF THE HUMAN KIND IN ALL ITS CHARACTERISTICS, SAVE ITS IRRIDESCENT LUMINOSITY.

"SLOWLY, DIRECTLY IN FRONT OF ME, WHILST I WAS HOLDING THE SLEEVE OF THE GARMENT, GRASPED TENACIOUSLY, AND INTENTLY LOOKING AT THE FORM BEFORE ME, NINA WILLIS, OR THIS APPARITION, SHRUNK, FADED, VANISHED, AS THE BREATH DISAPPEARS FROM THE MIRROR, AND I HELD NOTHING IN MY HAND.

"MANY SUCH EVIDENCES OF THE PHENOMENON WE CALL SPIRITISM HAVE I SEEN, AND BEEN UNABLE TO ACCOUNT FOR ON ANY HYPOTHESIS OTHER THAN THAT THE SPIRITS OF THE DEPARTED CAN AND DO RE-APPEAR ON EARTH, AS THIS MOST INTIMATE AND PERSONAL EXPOSITION OF THE MATERIALIZATION OF NINA WILLIS SO CONVINCINGLY ASSURES."

Do spirits return after the death of the human, or are the various manifestations of materializations but shams and delusions? are questions we cannot exclude from consideration, no matter what our doctrinal belief may be; and notwithstanding the many years so-called spirit manifestations have been before the public in the character of exhibitions for gain, the inquiring mind of the seeker for basic truths is as much in quandary as ever, because so involved have been the manifestations, seemingly clean and genuine, with those that OBVIOUSLY WERE THE PRODUCT OF CHARLATANISM.

The question has claimed the attention and received the thought of profound minds, and many volumes have been written pro and con, on the subject, with but little of a determining character.

After the Psychological Research Society of England had pronounced the various and strange manifestations of Dr. Slade tricks and frauds, and for which he was convicted and imprisoned on the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, Zoellner, in his Transcenddntal Physics, staked his professional reputation as an intelligent and honorable man, upon his statement that Dr. Slade did not perpetrate any fraud when he wrought the SAME MANIFESTATIONS before Von Hoffmann, Weber and himself, and could only attribute these phenomena to the powers of a fourth dimension.

Florence Marryat, in "There Is No Death," seemingly proves by the many manifestations of materializations chronicled in that book, that such a sincere and intelligent investigation could not be gainsaid in her conclusion that spirits of the departed can and do return to earth and manifest themselves, whilst Mr. Truesdale, a citizen of Syracuse, N. Y., in his book, "Bottom Facts," describing the various wonderful manifestations he had often mystified audiences with, showed the methods by which the tricks were performed, placing them on no higher level than the manipulations of the magician.

There have been some evidences of spirit influence, of manifestations, and of materializations, that have occurred in my presence, and under my scrutiny, that left no doubt in my mind that there were no tricks of any character employed; that they were as impossible of detection as were Dr. Slade's manifestations before Zoellner, Von Hoffmann and Weber; and if caused by human powers or talent, must be ascribed to a fourth dimension, or to supernatural power.

Many of the seances were of the commonplace character, TOO OBVIOUSLY FRAUDS; but there were others that transcended all my ability to ascribe them to any other domain of cause than that of spirit made visible, audible, and palpable; one in particular stands out so conspicuously that it hushes all inclination to question its verity.

An acquaintance whose mind was of that quality that he was recognized as well equipped by study and experience to reach conclusions entitled to consideration, was so pronounced, and seemingly so sincere in his belief that the spirits of the departed return, that he regularly attended circles where the spirit of his little daughter—who departed this life in childhood, manifested herself in a materialized form. So solicitous was he that I test the matter for myself, I called at a house where seances were held, arriving something like an hour before the time set for the commencement of the entertainment, so as to carefully examine the room and furniture. The meeting-place was a plainly furnished parlor, in an old-fashioned dwelling, in a locality that was in its transition state between its former desirableness as residential section of the better class, and the beginning of a cheap tradesman's and transient boarding business. In the front part of the room were two windows; on the side, a door leading to the hall, and a door in the rear; a tate in the corner between the door leading to the hall and the front windows; a table in the centre of the room, just under the chandelier; about a dozen chairs; and across the left-hand corner, in the rear part of the room, a portierre was stretched, making a triangular enclosure, the hypotenuse formed by the drapery. There was no opening of any kind behind the portierre; the carpet covering the floor was tacked down. So far as my careful scrutiny enabled me to determine, I was convinced that there was nothing which could be availed of to facilitate in the commission of tricks, fraud or delusion.

After an interval of some twenty minutes people commenced to drop in, and when nine persons were assembled, the medium requested all to be seated, the chairs having been arranged in a semi-circle within a few feet of the triangle formed by the corner of the room and the curtain. The gas was turned to a taper, but everything in and about the room was clearly distinguishable.

The medium seated herself on a camp-stool just outside the curtained-off space. She explained that semi-darkness was necessary inasmuch as spirits had not power to become manifest in the light, and that music was requisite, to enable the spirits to gather strength for materialization; and to that end all were requested to sing hymns. "Rock of Ages," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and other well known hymns were sung, all in a subdued tone awkwardly rendered. Soon a deep, stentorian voice cried out, "Come inside!" This, the medium stated, was the spirit of a Mr. Severance, her control. She went behind this curtain, and in a few moments there appeared a globule of light just where the portierre was drawn apart. It moved slightly up and down, from side to side, then forward, expanding the while, until it had assumed form and shape, floating out to the circle, and around, until it was cognizable to every one present; the human lineaments being clearly defined and flushed as if with life.

Some one in the circle inquired, "Whom do you wish to communicate with?" and the spirit answered, giving the name correctly, continuing to float, not walk, until in front of the person whose name was spoken. The party, whose name the spirit had uttered, asked:

"What is your name?"

"Nina Willis!" was the answer.

"Nina, your father told me you died when you were a child; now you appear a young woman!"

"Yes! We grow in the spirit land."

"What are all those lights in the quilling of your gown?" for she, or this manifestation of her spirit, wore a gown of a material like cheese-cloth, the bosom gathered in diamond shapes; in the center of each glowed and shimmered opalescent lights, like unto the flashings of the fire-fly, though the lights were continuous, not intermittent.

"Yes!" was spoken, the face downward bent, so that the eyes, luminous and liquid in their expression, could see them:—"They are beautiful, but look at my hair," the while turning her head, throwing the mass to the front, each strand glistening and shimmering with lights as though it had liquid fire running through it. The hair, of a light color, and long, was, veritably of the human kind in all its characteristics, save its irridescent luminosity.

"Tell me, Nina, if you are from the spirit world, how is it you are wearing a cotton gown, material of the earth?" the while taking hold of the long sleeve of the garment.

"You think you hold in your hand a material substance, and are holding me by it?"

"Yes! I think so."

"I will show you that I am a spirit, that my garment is not material, for I will disappear right before your eyes and at your feet."

Slowly, directly in front of me, whilst I was holding the sleeve of the garment, grasped tenaciously, and intently looking at the form before me, Nina Willis, or this apparition, shrunk, faded, vanished, as the breath disappears from the mirror, and I held nothing in my hand.

Many such evidences of the phenomenon we call spiritism have I seen, and been unable to account for on any hypothesis other than that the spirits of the departed can and do reappear on earth, as this most intimate and personal exposition of the materialization of Nina Willis so convincingly assures.

Whilst human abilities are various and human judgments unreliable, no man's say-so may be accepted as beyond question, in cases of this character especially, for no matter how certain one may be in his opinion, based upon his knowledge and experience, there are many things which may be overlooked or beyond powers of analysis or synthesis, that may vitiate the conclusion reached; still science, because of the many strange and marvelous manifestations so inexplicable upon any theory other than they are what they are professed to be, has accepted the fact that sufficient has been demonstrated, in the materializations, to warrant investigation and definition, so as to formulate, in exact terms, the theory of the visibility of the subtle thing we term spirit of the departed human.

In the realms of science we have progressed sufficiently far to hush doubts as to things heretofore supposed impossible, so that we no longer question our ability to see through a brick wall. The cathode rays photograph and make visible the bones and organs of our bodies, whilst the "N" rays catch and display the pictures of our thoughts.

Wireless telegraphy is now accepted as a matter of course, but is it not quite as mysterious, even though comprehended somewhat, as Spiritism?

We know and understand some of the laws by means of which we can transmit messages hundreds of miles without wire or other mechanical channels, the fact being authenticatedly established as a verity; yet it may be stated that Spiritism can be as easily comprehended, though not now understood, if we suppose the same laws applicable to spirit return as we utilize in sending and receiving wireless messages.

When we speak the atmospheric waves are vibrated sixteen thousand times a second; and in singing some sixty thousand times in a second, but in sending sparks from an electric oscillator the vibrations are to the extent of sixty millions to the second. These electric vibrations pass through earth, water, over mountains, penetrating brick walls, overcoming all obstructions; and a simple contrivance, called a coherer or resonator catches these messages, carried by these electric waves, exactly as started, and gives them up to us. Why, then, should it be considered incredible for spirits to manifest themselves, coming from spheres unknown, passing through the ether, and all opposings of a material character, becoming audible, palpable, visible to us!

Ether, as a substance, is so high in the scale of matter, that we cannot sense it, but Faraday enables us to gain some comprehension of it in his description of the fourth state of matter: "If we conceive a change as far beyond vaporization as that is above fluidity we shall perhaps not fall short of a conception of radiant matter. As we ascend from the solid to the fluid and gaseous states physical properties diminish in number and variety, therefore, if we could think of a matter as many times removed from radiant matter as the latter is from solids we would have a substance almost as far beyond our analytical powers as ether itself."

Thus whilst the nature of ether is not really known, in a measure we understand the laws governing it, one of these laws being that ether vortex rings are absolute and constant, and when thus transformed cannot, by any method known to man, be destroyed. According to Plato, ether signifies perpetual motion.

If by Faraday's fourth state of matter, or Zoellner's fourth dimension—of which our knowledge only approximates, or is suppositional—we are enabled to somewhat attribute these phenomena to laws as fixed and definite as those we operate by in the three dimensions, may we not, when we have acquired a better knowledge of the fourth dimension, be in a position to reach other worlds as readily as we now penetrate space, and use the ether as a medium by which we communicate through that media with distant lands of other planets?

By means of the oscillator, electric waves are projected that cannot be destroyed, and possibly reach all planets; and it may not be overtaxing the imagination to suppose that with an adequate resonator we may catch the efforts at communication from distant planets and ultimately decipher them.

If again, by the powers of a fourth dimension, we may suspend the laws of impenetrability, disintegrate molecules and re-incorporate them by mere volition, may we not expect, at no distant time, to reach that state of development that by laws we will more adequately comprehend, communicate with the spirits of those once upon earth and now dwellers in other realms?

The "X" and "N" rays and wireless telegraphy are marvelous, yet are now accepted as matters of course because of the endorsement of science, hence it is fair to suppose that it may not be long before the scientific investigations now going on may endorse the claim of spirit materialization, as true. But apart from this, proof may be cited from a source most men will be willing to yield acquiescence to that that should go very far to settle the matter as beyond questioning, independent of science, that the spirits of the departed humans can return and hold communion with us. "Then said Saul unto his servants, seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her and inquire of her. And his servants said to him, 'Behold, there is a woman that hath a familiar spirit at Endor.' And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and he went, and two men went with him, and they came to the woman by night, and he said, 'I pray thee divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me him whom I shall name unto thee.'

"Then said the woman, 'Whom shall I bring up unto thee?' And he said, 'Bring me up Samuel.'"

The Bible here evidences the fact that the spirits of the departed can reappear upon earth, though it is contended that it condemns any one for seeking knowledge thus, as is witnessed by the consequences to Saul: "So Saul died for his transgression, and also for asking counsel of one that hath a familiar spirit, TO INQUIRE OF IT." The Unknown Life of Christ.

A New edition of the Unknown Life of Christ is just from the press, and we are able to supply all demands. For the benefit of new subscribers we have added thereto two remarkable lectures, one by Prof. Henry S. Olcott, and the other by Miss Elizabeth Harlow, on the "Dangers of Psychism," a very valuable, attractive and instructive addition to this excellent book, and which should be carefully read by every Spiritualist, investigator and occult student in the land. This book is gotten up in fine style, and the additions thereto will enable it to serve a double purpose. It is still sent out as an absolute gift to all who send in $1.00 for The Progressive Thinker one year, and 10 cents in stamps to pay postage on the book.

Lyceums, Attention!

Help us to obtain a complete list of all lyceums before March 31. Since my former request many have complied and sent list and report, but am sure there are more to hear from. Those who have reported are as follows: Los Angeles, Cal.; Parkland, Pa.; Chesaning, Mich.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Decatur, Iowa; Portland, Me.; Portland, Ore.; Galveston, Tex.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Billings, Mont.; San Diego, Cal.; Hoboken, N. J.; St. Louis, Mo.; Seattle, Wash.; Rupert, Ark.; Washington, D. C. So you see the list is growing. Send in the name of your lyceum and the number of children or adults who are members. Address me during March and April, at 180 Calhoun street, Battle Creek, Mich.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

"The Great Work."

A Review, by Lyman C. Howe, and Reply by Wm. Omer Butler.

Scientific Demonstration.

I note that "A Student" is suspicious of some possible influence that this review may exert to mislead the judgment of readers. Cannot truth be trusted? The same "foreword" may be in demand to prevent readers of the book from being "unduly influenced" by the magical genius of the author in painting a picture for the mind, many of the shades and hues of which are drawn from axiomatic truths that may inspire confidence in all the claims set up for "The Great School." But we should not forget that truth and error are often strangely mixed. Because an author states many vital truths which all accept at a glance, it does not follow that all he says is true; nor that every great principle he enunciates, is all that he assumes it to be. A large per cent of this "Great Work" is made up of ideas and statements which every intelligent Spiritualist has realized and accepted in the experiences and teachings of Spiritualism, and revelations of mediumship.

My opinion is not expected to settle anything, or to disturb the logic of the author, or his claims for superior knowledge. But I may call attention to discrepancies, and point to some apparent conflict between his statements and other revelations from equally eminent authority, and leave readers to analyze and form their own conclusions.

The motto of intelligent Spiritualists for 56 years has been, "Experience and reason the only standard of authority." If we should find a hundred errors in this book, and some that completely discredit great leading propositions, and vital assertions, it would not disturb any truth it contains. This is a fundamental idea in Spiritualism. All teachings from both worlds must be accepted, or rejected, on their merits, as measured by reason and judged by all we know.

Chapter VI. deals with "Scientific demonstration." By his method and definitions he limits all possible demonstration of life after physical death, to personal experience realized by purely psychic processes. In his own words it is this: "There is only one process, or one method whereby the physical scientist will ever come to know with scientific certainty that there is a spiritual world and life beyond physical death." There is but one way by which he will ever make the "scientific demonstration." That is by the development within himself of a higher power of perception."

This reduces the possibility of scientific proof of a spiritual world, and human life after physical death, to a very small compass. Not one in a million can ever have the sweet satisfaction of knowing that death does not end all. Here is a specimen of the way he disposes of materialization:

"What is so-called 'spirit materialization' when genuine? It is the result of a process whereby the spiritual body of an ex-human being is invested with sufficient physical material to bring the outlines of that physical investment within the limits of physical vision. The spiritual form is 'clothed upon,' as it were, with sufficient physical material to bring the physical outlines within the field of physical sight. Neither the Soul, however, nor the spiritual body of the departed is thus made visible to the physical eye. These are just as far from the sight of mortal eyes as they were before the 'materialization' occurred.

"The process of 'spirit materialization' therefore, even when it is genuine (which is very rarely the case), does not bring the spiritual world nor any of its inhabitants within the limitations of our physical sense perceptions. The only results of that process which are visible to the physical eye of man are entirely physical and not spiritual. True, the spiritual form and entity are back of the physical 'materialization,' or within it, but these are not seen nor sensed by the physical eye."

But we associate with human beings in the flesh and are tolerably well satisfied that we see, and hear them, and when we clasp the warm hand in a friendly shake, we do not criticise the demonstration as unreal because we do not differentiate the spirit of the hand within that we grasp; nor do we, when we see the faces, observe the smiles, sense the glow of sweet emotion in the animating soul visible in the sparkling countenance, disparage our senses, and deny the proof that they are living human beings, because we do not see, hear, and sense the inmost spirit, without which our bodies could not exist and act responsive to our appeal. It seem to me that precisely the same difficulty is in the way of demonstrating the existence of men and women all around us, that is here urged against materialization. We do not see the soul that animates human bodies, but the form appears to be moved by a special intelligence, and that intelligence conforms to the apparent individuality before us. The lips move and we hear a voice, and human intelligence is expressed, love is manifested and our own individuality senses a kindred type, and, through the flesh, Soul answers to Soul. Precisely this occurs in genuine spirit materialization, and with more impressive realization, and direct experience of co-ordinating consciousness that thrills, exalts and satisfies. It is sufficiently scientific to convince and comfort many of the most vigilant and skeptical and leave no chilling doubts, or annoying uncertainties. But suppose it be unsatisfactory, and unscientific, what of it? Modern Spiritualism is an infant science.

The author dwells upon the scientific uncertainty of all physical manifestations of mediumship. He says: "The foundation of all this uncertainty, after more than half a century of investigation, scientific and otherwise, is in the effort to make a purely physical demonstration of an exclusively spiritual problem." "It can never be accomplished." What may be possible or impossible I do not know. But I do not think the achievements of the Great School in the first fifty-eight years of its existence made very much of an impression upon the scientific thinkers of its time, or demonstrated much of the realities of immortality. In fifty-eight years, I think Spiritualism has reached, and demonstrated to the satisfaction of more skeptics, than the "Great School" did in its first 2,000 years of its efforts. It seems to me quite probable that it has impressed and convinced more skeptical thinkers in the past twenty years than has the Great School in two hundred years. And I do not think any one is qualified to set limits to the possibilities of its future developments. After it has had ten thousand years of opportunity, and been carefully and wisely cultivated for its scientific and ethical values, if we find nothing conclusive in its demonstrations, it may be wise to pause and ask the reason. The purely physical aspects of mediumship have not been regarded as the highest and best, or more reliable evidence by intelligent Spiritualists for many years—if ever. But it is thought that we need all phases, and every kind of demonstration, to meet the demands of skeptical thinkers and scientific doubters. At the close of this chapter the author asks and answers this question: "How does the writer know that what he says is true?" "Because he has made the demonstration and had the experience." If we could all have the experience we might have no need for mediumship. But the conditions that hedge the way render it impossible to 99 per cent at least of the whole human race.

Chapter VII

deals with "Nature's constructive principle." His definition of that phase of nature is: "That principle in Nature which impels every entity to seek vibratory correspondence with another like entity of opposite polarity." No one, I think, is likely to dispute the active operations of nature in destroying forms, and disintegrating the close relations of her myriad structures, in the work of progressive evolution. If this process were to cease the building could not long continue. If Nature had no way of eliminating the dead, worn-out, molecular structures, her work of constructive evolution could not long proceed. But the author applies to her methods a phase that to my mind is not warranted by anything that has been revealed to science or demonstrated by the Great School.

It is expressed in these words: "In all the kingdoms below him" (man) "the constructive forces and processes of nature appear to work automatically, as if in response to some outside controlling intelligence; but when the estate of Man is reached Nature appears to shift the burden of responsibility to Man himself, and leaves him to work out his own development and possibilities." "Nature at this point rests from her initiatory labors as it were, and leaves her finished product Man to become the independent demonstrator of this Universal Principle that makes for Integration Unity and permanency."

It does not appear to me consistent or reasonable that any such break in the process of evolution occurs. Of course in every new phase that evolution reaches there are likely to be new factors that enter into the progressive work, and add something to the facilities for more extended achievements. So far as I know every new type developed along the line of nature's individualization—which appears to be the index of progress—has brought with it extended means for carrying forward all that is embodied within it, which may be regarded as the sum of all antecedents in the special order of its history. Whatever new factor a type presents in its modes of being is likely to add to its facilities for progress and extend its field of improvement. When Man appeared his intelligent reason, and glimmerings of moral sense, must have slowly evolved some helpful influence in moulding his conduct, which after many ages wrought out an imperfect moral code; and this became a working factor in the process of improving his individuality. This human type, I hold, is endowed with limitless possibilities, except the possibility of self annihilation, or a backward trend that may undo the work of the ages that evolved this climax of individualities. I see no evidence that Nature has ceased her labors for the advancement of human nature and left us to drift, with the chances 100 to 1 that we will go backward and downwards to darkness, slavery and death. I DO NOT BELIEVE IT. While Nature demands of us co-operation to facilitate her work; she provides means to compel us if we will not comply voluntarily. For this purpose it seems she has fenced us in with a variety of commands, supported by penalties for disobedience; and these are increased as we persist, until we realize that "the way of the transgressor is hard," and when we are sufficiently penitent, and seek the better way her kindly aid is ever at our service. Three great facts testify against the principle of "devolution" in individual life, as presented by the author.

First: From the simplest and lowest of forms Nature has steadily wrought toward higher and more complex individualities through the ages when the destructive principle was most active, and universal. In this she has seemed to defy all the powers of destruction in her progressive work of individualization, constantly approaching nearer and nearer to the human type.

Second: When the human type appeared, according to the theory of evolution, it was of the lowest order, but a slight remove from the next inferior organisms, which the author thinks advanced by some influence acting automatically. But, from this lowest condition, in which but the faintest moral conceptions could have existed, in spite of the powerful influence of all forms of destruction then prevailing, the human race has advanced to its present stage of civilization. Since moral incentives must have been exceedingly weak, and inoperative, for ages, the advancing evolution could not have depended solely upon the independent unaided volition of the individual human chain.

Third: If the constructive principle has operated in this world where all kinds of destructive agencies have prevailed, in a way to advance the race as a whole, it seems to the writer quite probable that the destructive principle is a co-operative agency in the progress of evolution; and further that the next life is not inferior to this, but a degree in advance of it, and destruction as an agent for clearing the way for further evolution, not as likely to prevail there as here, the processes of devolution of human life and character, and reducing this splendid achievement of the laboring ages to a condition of slavery, darkness, and annihilation, seems to me too absurd to be entitled to any credence. Eternal progress implies perpetual change. But change itself may be either building, or destroying, or neither; but change that expresses organizing purpose, a structural adaptation to intelligent functioning, is quite another thing. If Nature had never accomplished anything in the vast field of her operations, but a meaningless mutation of forms, without purpose or adaptation, it would matter little whether they were constructive or destructive; but when we survey the map of the ages, and observe the marvellous transformations from chaotic seas and primitive forms of lowest life to the supreme wonder of wonders, Man, and follow him up the shining slopes of the spiritual universe, and contemplate his prospects, and catch the radiance of the "world of sweetness and light," with its countless denizens enjoying pleasant pursuits and fulfilling the order of being, we may well rejoice and trust in the all-conquering power of constructive progress.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Fredonia, N. Y.

Wm. Omer Butler's Criticism of Mr. Howe's Review.

To the Editor:—Referring to the last two articles of Mr. Howe's review of "The Great Work," I should like most respectfully to register an objection to several of his criticisms. It may be an inability on my part to appreciate close reasoning, but at any rate I must acknowledge that I fail to see that the criticisms are valid. I have in mind particularly the following points which I shall, however, but briefly notice, as I have neither time nor disposition to enter upon a lengthy discussion or argument. I desire to offer what seems to me a reasonable reply to the criticism, omitting as much as possible quotations, to save space, and referring the reader to the review itself.

Referring to the author's statement that the majority of people preach while it is only the minority who practice, the reviewer objects and asks: "Do they? Do they practice what the majority preach?" I must confess surprise at this question. It ought to be very plain that the author never dreamed of saying that the minority practice what the majority preach! We are all familiar with the expression—"practice what you preach," and it is certainly well known that it is but a plain, forceful way of saying: "Live up to your profession," "be consistent," etc. All that the author says, then, is that comparatively few people are entirely consistent, really live up to their professed ideals. He certainly is not blaming anyone for not living up to some one else's "preaching." It is plain that in this case the reviewer has entirely missed the author's most obvious meaning.

In this same article there is again, it seems to me, a similar misapprehension of the author's meaning where he calls attention to the "inaptitude of human nature to learn by experience." The reviewer observes, "that mankind are habitually indolent does not seem to be supported by facts—except in certain tropical climates." May I ask, does the author assert or in any way imply that mankind are habitually indolent? Does he not explicitly say "in this department?" Here are the author's words: "Indolence, however, in this department of human endeavor would seem to be an almost universal characteristic of human nature." If we will take pains to observe that the author is not speaking of all "departments of human endeavor," we may find that his statement is supported by facts.

In endeavoring to arrive at the author's meaning, let us observe, first, that he is not speaking simply of the age in which we live, but of past ages also. Let us observe, in the next place, that this "department of human endeavor" is not simply intellectual but ethical as well. The alleged inaptitude of human nature refers not merely to the acquisition of cold, scientific facts, but also to the learning of those truths which concern the soul's health and destiny. Will any student of history and human nature assert that in "this department" it is not a lamentable fact that indolence is an almost universal characteristic of human nature?

Let me repeat that the statement we are now considering does not refer so much to the present age as to past ages. In an age when man's higher spiritual nature is coming more and more into evidence, and in a land where schools and universities abound, it is difficult for us to remember that it was not always so, that indeed it could not have been always so. Let us remember that the race, like the individual soul, as well as the universe, is constantly evolving to higher things. That whenever in its history a new organ had been developed, and consequently new needs discovered, the race creates what it demands, and supplies its own needs. General education would have been brought about centuries ago, had the race demanded it.

But is not the author's contention true even of the present age? Have we entirely outgrown the once universal tendency to accept our knowledge second-hand, to let some one else do our thinking for us, solve our problems, and bear our sins and their consequences? The statement is true, in my opinion, even in purely intellectual studies which alas! are too often laid entirely aside by the "graduate," never more to be taken up, while the prolific human mind continues to bring forth new devices for "spending" time. How much more true, then, of those studies which tend to the solution of life's problems, which require a love for morals as well as mathematics.

Let us now examine the reviewer's criticism of the analogy which the author draws between increasing light and increasing knowledge. Is not the reviewer here still "beating the air"—opposing a conclusion which the author never made nor implied? The statement to which he objects is this: "The presence of one light does not extinguish another light. It only multiplies its intensity and effect." The reviewer admits that "in ordinary experience this may be true." Is it not evident that that is just what the author is speaking of,—"ordinary experience," or rather, ordinary, normal light, and that of such it not only MAY BE but invariably IS true? If we confine ourselves to this subject, THE AUTHOR'S SUBJECT, We will probably find that his statements are true in every particular, and that the analogy fails at no point. Do we not witness the demonstration of this fact daily in our homes as one light after another is turned on?

But the reviewer thinks the analogy fails at one point and that of this the author has failed to take due notice. But, as a matter of fact, does it fail at any point? Let us see. As is well known, ordinary light is not simple in its composition, but is the result of a mixture of colors. It is true that between two of these component parts, under certain conditions, a conflict may be instituted and the one made to destroy or neutralize the other. But under no circumstances is this true of normal light (the only kind in question) taken in its entirety and composed according to nature's formula. Such light may be increased infinitely, for aught we know, without introducing a destructive or neutralizing principle.

The analogy between Light and Truth will be found to hold good to the last detail. Truth, like light, may be "dispersed" or divided into parts, and as a result we have "partial truths." (Something not altogether new under the sun, by the way.) Partial truths may, and as a matter of fact often do, conflict or neutralize each other. Illustrations of this are not hard to find. Indeed, we are obliged to admit the truth of the statement sometimes made, that a partial truth, or a truth separated from other truths of which it is but a part, may be so emphasized and dwelt upon, so magnified out of all due proportion, to the eclipsing of other related truths, that it actually becomes an untruth. But there is no destructive tendency in normal truth as it proceeds from the great source of Truth and illumines the unfolding soul with an ever increasing radiance like the sunrise, that "oriens ex alto" which shines "more and more unto the perfect day."

I shall not use more of your valuable space by extending this criticism, which I assure the reviewer is offered in the most friendly spirit and with the frank admission of a desire on his part to be just. Nevertheless I am obliged to think that he commits the same mistake of which he thinks (mistakenly, in my opinion) the author of "The Great Work" guilty, namely, that of reaching a conclusion which the facts in evidence do not warrant. Whether I am justified in so thinking, the reader must decide. My desire is only that justice should be accorded to this book and its author. Possibly there are inaccuracies in the book, though a careful reading has failed to reveal them to me. Should such be found, I am confident that no one would welcome their exposure more willingly than the author himself. While I believe the reviewer desires to be just, nevertheless I must admit that, in spite of his denial that his criticisms are mere quibbling," I fail to see that those above referred to are anything else.

My study of the book has failed to reveal to me any statements which are "thoroughly absurd" or "illogical, though many of them may indeed be "contrary to the best knowledge we have." Suppose they are, is that fact necessarily against them? Surely, it will not take many more "X-rays" and wireless telegraphs to accustom us to occasionally having our "best knowledge" rudely shocked! There are still some things above us. Furthermore, the author of "The Great Work" does not, if I understand him, lay any claim to "final authority." It is true he advances some (to many of us) new ideas which materially affect certain "grave questions," and this he does with such manifest knowledge, ability and candor as should commend his work to all serious investigators. Yet as for asking us to acknowledge him as final authority in the settlement of these grave questions, he does nothing of the kind. On the contrary, he invites each one interested to become the "final authority" himself, to make the "demonstration" and "final settlement" for himself. The reader is asked to accept nothing on the author's authority, yet I venture the prediction that, if he be spiritually alert, if he has "eyes to see," he will behold with delight a marvelous philosophy, a revelation of truth which is self-evident, which "shines by its own light," and to all such at least "The Great Work" will prove indeed a lasting treasure.

WILLIAM OMER BUTLER.

Savanna, Ill.

A STUDENT OF THE GREAT WORK.

He Makes Many Interesting Explanations in Regard to the Same.

To the Editor:—In reading in your columns the criticisms and comments of THE GREAT WORK, I am particularly struck by the attitude of mind of Lyman C. Howe, in his recent letter about the book.

While he approves the "supreme value of direct personal knowledge, which can only be derived from experience," and which the author of THE GREAT WORK in his study and complete solution of the problem of Death enlarges upon (see page 438), he nevertheless brings in a line of reasoning based upon the inability of some scientists to "personally demonstrate and experience Blondelot's N-ray experiments"; therefore Blondelot, a French scientist of great repute, must stand as challenged and unable to prove the truth of his experiments and his experience. Mr. Howe has thus brought into this discussion a phenomenon of particular interest. He does not give us any advantage by mentioning the names of the English and German physicists who have endeavored to repeat Blondelot's experiments; perhaps the study of why the N-ray manifests for some scientists and not for others, may after all prove the greater discovery of the two.

Charles Warrenne Allen, M. D., in "Radio-therapy and Photo-therapy," shows that the N-ray is still a mysterious phenomenon of electricity; thus it is unfortunate that Mr. Howe should have chosen so elusive an illustration in attempting to discount the value of the kind of "personal experience" taught in THE GREAT WORK, for certainly Mr. Howe would not, on account of the illusiveness of the N-ray, have us deny all our other experiences with electricity.

Mr. Howe says: "To say that Blondelot's eyes are different from other eyes, does not solve the mystery; for others saw the same; yet by whole nationalities the N-rays were invisible, even when they were co-operating in the presence of the famous discoverer," and further, that "a distinguished physicist who measured the deviations of the N-ray that had passed through a prism of aluminum, and continued to do so when the deviating prism had been surreptitiously removed"—THESE ILLUSTRATIONS DO NOT PROVE MR. HOWE'S POINT that "experiences often mislead us; and where they depend upon certain exceptional methods and states of mind, and are contradicted by other experiences can we trust them for scientific revelation," AS BEING THE KIND OF TEACHING GIVEN OUT by "The School of Natural Science" in its third published text-book, THE GREAT WORK.

The N-rays had best be dropped from the discussion else we may find ourselves contending for this or for that, about them; and about D'Arsonval's and Charpentier's additional discovery that the human body is capable of giving off N-rays, when all the while we should be discussing THE GREAT WORK or law of evolution, operative not only in the physical but equally so in the spiritual world.

Mr. Howe preserves the right attitude, as a student, in so great a degree, that it would be well to briefly enlarge upon some of his excellent ideas, or to point the way for other but less surely informed students, to follow, in their effort to gain a wider view of human life and spiritual destiny.

He says: "The claims set up for the 'School of Natural Science' are extraordinary. It hardly seems possible that such a school has existed from prehistoric time, has DEMONSTRATED in the most perfect and positive way that death is but an open door to a large life (as taught by Spiritualism) and the great growing intellectual and scientific world that leads and inspires civilization, know nothing of it."

The field opened up by this statement is too wide to more than touch upon. The source of information alone would fill several pages. A study of the matter might lead one to conclude that the "growing intellectual and scientific world" does not lead and inspire, so much as it seems to do so on the surface.

Back of all the great religions is a "Secret" teaching. Even Rawlinson after a comparative study of ten great religions made, for him, a very broad statement in declaring that they had all been revealed to man from without. There is too much agreement in the teachings of the Virgin-born saviors of the world, Krishna the Brahman; Gautama the Buddhist; Osiris the Egyptian; Jesus the Christian; as well as the Chaldean the Ophite; the Persian, etc.; for one to contend that they did not draw their teaching and their inspiration from a parent source. The teachings in each instance constituted the theory; the life each one led constituted the demonstration, namely the "personal experience that death does not end all."

The same may be said of Manu, Pythagoras, Ammonius, Plotinus, and the philosophers of old; they all had teachings similar to the instruction of the "School of Natural Science."

Then read Buck's Cosmic Consciousness, for a number of great souls who have overcome death, had the personal experience, and put it on record, even as the author of THE GREAT WORK has done.

The reason why more people have not embraced the opportunity "to live the life, to know the doctrine," is not from the kind of indolence Mr. Howe thinks the author of THE GREAT WORK is talking about.

The author of THE GREAT WORK, so it seems to me, is combating the indolence that comes from pre-judging; the indolence that comes from holding to mere opinions and beliefs; and the indolence that makes us a too willing captive of our inclinations, desires and superstitions. One may be indolent in these things and still be a fighter for dogmas, and figuratively, eat up time and effort in many directions based upon the more material or selfish demands of his nature.

So it seems to me after reading the book under discussion, that I feel inspired to aim at the stars, even though I only hit the house top; and in that spirit one can try to get rid of prejudice, which is certainly a laudable ambition; and instead of waiting, as Mr. Howe would seem to indicate, until we are free from prejudice before searching for definite personal knowledge, it would seem to me wise to begin now to work with the law of evolution or the constructive principle of spirituality, as so beautifully taught in THE GREAT WORK, and to note "personal experiences" which come from "living the life."

AN HONEST INVESTIGATOR.

Plain and Pertinent Remarks for Intelligent Spiritualists.

As my husband and myself have been earnestly investigating spirit return for several years, I am at present at a loss how to understand it. We have had seances at our house, and attended a good many at different places, among the best people of this community, with varying results.

Now the greatest problem for me to solve is about those little Indian girls that deliver messages from our departed friends, whom we believe are in the spirit world. Are they true, or are they false?

The greatest curse that has ever come to Spiritualism in this part of the country is the Chase-McCoy case, and the one lately tried in Indianapolis. They have made more skeptics than the Chesterfield camp will ever be able to convince.

How my heart saddened within me when I read in your valuable paper December 1, in the list of sympathizers who are so quick to defend these deceiving workers a name, whose bearer I thought was as pure as the lilies of the field, asking good and true Spiritualists to forgive her for she had done some good.

Honest Spiritualist, stop and think—some good work! Some good work! What about the other part of her work that was not good?

There never was a criminal sentenced, but who had done some good in his life, and yet these few good deeds did not make good the many wicked ones he had done. I could far better forgive the thief that would enter my home at night, and take all I have of worldly goods, than a medium who would play with my heart-strings.

Now I feel very sorry for those little Indian girls. Spiritualism teaches that when a little child leaves this world, it enters the spirit world and there develops spiritually and grows just as they do on the earth plane. I know "little Indian girls" that have been doing service for their mediums for a number of years, and to-day they come in their child voices that we heard fifteen years ago. Now is it right for these mediums to keep them on the earth plane to earn money for them? Are they not keeping those little spirits from developing their spiritual part.

We went to the Chesterfield camp in 1905. I came home disgusted. We left two dollars with Chase-McCoy. Oh, how I wanted to grab the form of one of those spirits, for I recognized the eyes too plainly. But I was afraid of Mr. Chase.

Now I am not discouraged with spirit return, for we have had manifestations beyond a doubt in our own home, without the aid of any medium.

Let us hear from more Spiritualists like R. Bayles. It is encouraging to investigators to know we can open our own doors and have good results where we know there is no sham.

Oh, how I would like to have everybody know this grand and noble truth. What a balm it is to a broken heart that is grieving for some departed dear one. What help to know they are not dead. Oh, how can a medium be so wicked at heart as to deceive mankind in so low and degrading a way.

I believe that a medium who is not pure at heart has only the earth-bound spirits to manifest for her. I don't believe we get messages from the higher forces under such conditions. Maybe old Adams are fault-finding, maybe old Eves are awfully tempting.

I hope the good work of The Progressive Thinker will go on, and may every honest Spiritualist lend a helping hand to help the good cause along.

AN HONEST INVESTIGATOR.

A NORWEGIAN'S EXPERIENCE.

He Gives His Testimony to the Truth of Spiritualism.

To the Editor:—I wish to add my testimony to the great bank of facts, from which human minds may draw. My first proof of spirit return took place in Norway twenty-six years ago last July, when I was a boy at the age of eight, working in a little potato patch near the house, picking out weeds. The day was warm and bright. I felt rather weak, and I looked up towards the sky, and saw a man standing right over me. He looked to be six feet high, well built, blue eyes, and wore a beard. I was not afraid as he looked so peaceful. He also had a blue robes with wide sleeves hanging down from his arms. His arms standing towards me, and I thought he had gold buttons on his robe, as they sparkled like stars. I stood looking at him for eight or ten minutes, then I went in the house and told my mother. As soon as I told her I fell asleep on a chair, and mother thought me dead. After an hour or so I was all right, but after seeing this spirit, I could see and hear and learn many strange things, until I was declared insane and could not attend school, and for two years teachers and ministers and preachers visited and prayed for me, but to no avail, until a woman called a hex (or witch) removed the troubles, but not for good.

During all these two years I saw mountains open up to me, and animals that do not exist on earth to-day, came out, and people that long ago vanished from this earth, came and spoke to me in strange tongues, and many more things which space does not permit me to bring out.

But I will return to the time my trouble of seeing and hearing was removed. I had two years of rest. At the age of 12 the spirits returned, not robed like the first one I saw, no peaceful face to look at, no gold buttons on their bosoms, no consolation to the soul, but war and horrid sights. I was then let down among the lower classes to experience the real sufferings of human souls in the so-called spirit world.

A man who had committed suicide came to me. I was obsessed, and for four weeks fought a battle that no living person can give language to or express. For three weeks I did not sleep nor eat, until I took to my safeguard, and went in a room all by my self, and shut the door, and on my knees consulted God and His power for help, not before. I prayed for help when I could see my last hope almost vanish away, and the perspiration flowing down my body. Then in all my earnest soul. Turning my eyes upwards I saw two spirits coming near to me and flashing in a circle of light, stood right over me, to the right, and the dark obsessing spirit to the left had to leave me, and has never returned since.

Remarkable Invention.

"Actina" A Scientific Appliance for Relieving Defective Eyesight—Has a Record of Many Marvelous Cures.

If your eyesight is defective or you have some form of eye trouble which endangers your eyesight, you should lose no time in investigating "Actina." It is an instrument to be applied directly over the eyes and its potent action stimulates and maintains the circulation of the blood, thereby removing congestion and assisting nature to repair the defects and restore the eyesight to its normal condition. Hundreds of people owe the restoration of their eyesight to "Actina." Among them are the following:

Prof. T. S. Sligh, Mansfield, La.
Rev. J. M. Foster, Burton, Wash.
Rev. W. C. Goodwin, Moline, Kan.
Gen. Alex. Hamilton, Tarrytown, N. Y.
Rev. C. Brunner, Bridgeport, Conn.
Dr. Jas. H. Bell, 225 Perrine St., Dayton, O.
Mrs. S. A. Donnelly, Agt. U. S. Secret Service, Louisville, Ky.

Nine out of ten persons wearing spectacles might better be without them. Strengthen the eye by improving the circulation and it will not require an artificial lens. If you are interested and desire to know what the "Actina" is and what it is accomplishing, write to-day for our FREE TRIAL OFFER and OUR BOOK, TREATISE ON DISEASE. SIX HISTORIC AMERICANS.

A Book That Every American Freethinker Will Delight to Own.

By John E. Remsburg.

The work consists of two parts, "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "The Saviors of Our Republic." In regard to Paine's religious views, Mr. Remsburg establishes the negative of the following (1) Was Paine an Atheist? (2) Was he a Christian? (3) Did he recant? Page after page of the most radical freethought sentiments are culled from the correspondence and other writings of Franklin and Jefferson, which show that these men were as pronounced in the rejection of Christianity as Paine and Ingersoll. That Washington was not a Christian nor a believer in Christianity. In support of Lincoln's infidelity he has collected the testimony of more than one hundred witnesses.

The book is handsomely bound in cloth, giving fine portraits of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant; also portrait of the author.

This book contains 365 pages, printed on heavy paper, well bound in cloth. Price, $1.25. For sale at this office.

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "On Sunday, Feb. 17, the large hall of the First Society Fraternal Order of Spiritualists was taxed to its utmost in providing seating capacity for the large number who came to witness the public installation of the officers of the order. Bro. Geo. B. Warne, M. D., was the installing officer and conducted the ceremony in a most creditable manner, giving it that air of solemnity and impressiveness found only in true fraternalism. Following are the officers installed, and committees appointed: President, Alexander Caird, M. D.; vice-president, Mr. A. W. Bloom; secretary, Mr. Ferd C. Suhrer; financial secretary, Mrs. J. Staner-Adams; treasurer, Mr. Chas. A. Thompson; directors, Mrs. Barbara Hilbert, Mr. F. A. Knapp.

Musical Director:—Prof. Joseph Singer; pianist, Miss Marian Gordon; bass soloist, Mr. Robert V. Fessler.

Our speaker for Sunday, March 3, will be Dr. J. A. Marvin, an interesting lecturer on interesting subjects."

W. D. Noyes writes: "We will leave Tacoma, Wash., March 1, and go to Southern Oregon, and Northern California, and work in the Spiritualist missionary field. We would like to hear from all points on the Southern Pacific railroad, from societies or individual Spiritualists who wish the services of public lecturer and message mediums for a few days in their cities. Our charges are very moderate. My mail will be forwarded from McMinnville, Cottage Grove, Grant Pass, Medford and Fishland, Oregon; Redding, Redbluff, Marysville, Chico, Sacramento and Stockton, Cal. Write early before I pass your city."

The First Spiritualist Society of Tampa will hold their regular meetings every Sunday evening at 7:30 in Masonic Hall second floor. Mr. Letford, the drummer medium, will give tests. Public cordially invited.—Tribune, Tampa, Fla.

Mrs. George Williams writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "Professor W. F. Peck's services at the Temple will end Sunday, Feb. 24. His lectures have been especially fine and instructive. On next Sunday afternoon his theme will be 'Buddha and Christ,' and in the evening 'Vicarious Atonement.' An Old Folks Concert under Prof. Peck's guidance was given at the Temple on St. Valentine's evening. It was such a success, that in response to a unanimous call, it will be repeated on Monday evening, Feb. 25. Prof. Peck will remain over his period of engagement in order to conduct the affair. Quite a sum was realized as a result of the concert, and a much larger amount will undoubtedly be raised through the second performance. Prof. Peck's character sketch, in the days when George III. was king, was very enjoyable; also Mr. McKay's solo, 'Smack Me, Mother,' was a treat, and Mr. George Williams' monologue, convulsed the audience with laughter, it being exceptionally fine, because it was original and up-to-date. Much credit is due to the performers as they gave much time and expense gratis for the benefit of the Temple fund. Mr. Frank Ripley will be at the Temple during the month of March. Seats free."

J. M. Middleton writes from Smithville, Tex., that Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner organized a Bohemian circle of Spiritualists, numbering 27, at Korar, Fayette county. She also administered there the spiritual rites of baptism to a babe, and great interest was manifested.

A. A. Cooks writes from Gas City: "Mrs. Vesta Marine, one of our best workers in the cause of Spiritualism in this city, passed to the beyond, Feb. 13, from the effects of an operation at the Marine hospital. She was a medium of a high degree of sensitiveness, and a couple of days prior to going to the hospital, in one of her semi-wakening visions, she found herself in a wood with her spirit daughter, Leda, who was gathering flowers ahead and constantly urging, 'Mamma, hurry up and come on.' She has answered the summons."

F. E. Dunton writes from Liberal, Oregon: "The board of directors for the First Spiritualist Religious Society of Clackamas county, Oregon, have decided to hold their annual camp-meeting at New Era, commencing on July 6, and continuing until July 29. We would be glad to correspond with lecturers and mediums, who might be available for the above date. May we hear from some physical mediums? Our accommodations are good and our climate and grove bespeak for themselves in the successful meetings held heretofore. Address all correspondence to Geo. Lazelle, president, Oregon City, Oregon, or F. E. Dunton, secretary, Liberal, Oregon."

BEAR IN MIND that the editor of The Progressive Thinker is in no wise responsible for the views expressed by contributors. He may, or may not, agree with their respective views.

Mrs. A. Birdsall writes from Jackson, Mich.: "The First Society of Progressive Spiritualists is flourishing. The convention of the State Association was held here the 8th, 9th and 10th of February, with great success. The speakers and message bearers were highly appreciated, and many were the praises for Will J. Erwood of Indiana. My first thought in writing was to tell your readers of a worker we have had with us a number of times this winter, Mrs. F. V. Jackson of Grand Rapids. For platform test work and lectures she ranks among the first in the field. She can also be engaged for camp-meeting work. Her present address is 114 Canal street, Grand Rapids, Mich."

Samuel A. Huntington writes of the Progressive Spiritual Society, Louise Hall, 138 Pleasant street, Malden, Mass.: "Sunday services, Feb. 17. At the afternoon circle, Mr. Dixon, a past member of our society made an interesting address on 'How to Become a Medium.' Mr. Berry made remarks and gave several messages. Sister Morton also gave messages. Sister Carter and Mr. E. S. Kneeland followed with several fine messages. The evening meeting opened at 7:30 with praise, reading of scripture and invocation. Mrs. Carrie H. Tainter, of Manchester, N. H., was the speaker and message bearer of the evening. She prefaced her work by reading a poem entitled 'There Is No Death,' then chose as her theme, 'Judge not lest ye be judged,' giving a very interesting address, after which she occupied three-quarters of an hour in giving many very rapid and fine messages. Dr. C. L. Willis of Boston will occupy the platform on Sunday evening, Feb. 24, and Mrs. W. S. Butler of the Boston Lyceum, on Sunday evening, March 3. The Rev. F. A. Wiggin of Unity Church, Boston, will serve our society five consecutive Thursday evenings, commencing the 21st of this month."

B. O. Fenton writes: "The Unknown Life of Jesus, if it be true, plainly shows that Jesus was in India during those eighteen missing years, from 12 to 30. The bulk of the work purports to be a manuscript found in an old monastery in India, by N. Notovitch, and is specially interesting to the inquiring mind. The introduction is by Virchand R. Gandhi, of Bombay, India, a great Sanskrit scholar. His portrait may be seen in the last work of Moncure D. Conway, 'My Pilgrimage to the Wise Men of the East,' (Christians call them heathens). Mr. Gandhi shows himself to be a master in portraying his thoughts, completely refuting the statements of Edward Everett Hale of Boston. The work was presented to the writer by Mr. Gandhi when in this country. Let every reader of The Progressive Thinker procure the work. T. B. Wakeman, P. B. Ladd and many others of distinction, claim Jesus to be a myth. There must have been some foundation for the New Testament."

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague's next engagement is Pittsburg, Pa.

Correspondent writes: "The Psychical Research Society of Rockford, Ill., was greatly entertained on Sunday evening, Feb. 17, by an interesting and instructive discourse, followed by messages, from Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig, of Chicago. Her language is good, her points were well taken, and her delivery was admirable, with no excess of gesture to divert attention from the subject matter, a positive fault with some otherwise able speakers. Expressions of satisfaction, and a desire to hear her again, came from all quarters. I am sure she will be listed among the favorites of the society, which counts among its speakers many of the ablest on the spiritual platform. We hope to hear from Mrs. Lichtig again soon. The Psychical Research Society has home talent which is constantly improving, and in the absence of help from abroad, aided by the large developing class, keep up general interest in the work."

Bro. Levick writes from Mt. Vernon, Ill.: "There are several homes in our little town that would welcome and care for any good medium or lecturer who would feel like sojourning with us a few days, but let it be distinctly understood no fakes are wanted."

Fred M. Hunt writes: "The Queen City Park Camp-meeting, Burlington, Vt., commences July 28, and continues until Stptember 2. The management has secured the world-renowned speaker, W. J. Colville; Rev. F. A. Wiggin, of Boston; Rev. B. F. Austin, of Rochester, N. Y.; J. Clegg Wright of the West; and the Vermont state speaker. For test and spirit message medium, Mrs. Effie I. Chapman has been secured for the entire meeting. Effort is being made to have one of the largest and best camp-meetings ever held at Queen City Park. Fred M. Hunt, who so much pleased all his guests last year, has again leased the hotel at Queen City Park for the coming season. Everything at the hotel and park will be put in first-class condition as soon as spring opens. No better place can be found for city people to spend the summer months. The hotel will be open about the first of June for guests. For particular address me at Moretown, Vt., until May 1, after that, Queen City Park, Vt."

Mrs. C. L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid met as usual, and this meeting took the form of a Martha Washington Party. Every part of the day was a very interesting one. Some of the costumes were very unique, and all were very pleasing. Sociability was the order; dancing, whist, etc. Mr. Sam Graham and Miss Alice Waterhouse, furnished some of the music; others participated. The event was one to be remembered. Next Friday, Mrs. Kate R. Stiles will give a benefit for the society, and we hope to see all the friends. Supper at 6:15."

Mrs. Thompson writes: "The Fraternal Daughters held their semi-monthly tea party in Atlas Hall, 406 Ogden avenue, Wednesday afternoon at 2:30, and the following mediums took part: Mrs. Dr. Caird, Mrs. Squires and Chas. A. Thompson. The meeting came to a close at 5 p. m., so as to allow all who wished to go to the convention. We are pleased to state that our afternoon meeting was a financial success. Our next meeting will be March 6, at 2:30 p. m. A cordial invitation is extended to all."

LOVE IS THE SAVIOR.

Ignorance and Selfishness the World's Greatest Evils.

To the Editor:—I would not and do not intend to be without the weekly visits of our excellent Progressive Thinker. You are making of it such an exponent of the great intellectual and spiritual light of our modern religion, Spiritualism, that one who does not have its weekly perusal must miss more in that line of the world's progress than than by any other periodical.

How glad I am to come in touch through its columns with the great family of Spiritualists, the brilliant minds of our age, the illuminated minds of our brothers and sisters who are inspired to give to the world their highest thoughts for the unfoldment of humanity into the knowledge of scientific truths, for ignorance and selfishness are the world's greatest evils, as knowledge and fraternity or love are its saviors.

How glad and proud we all are that we have had a Moses Hull. I wonder if he had the beautiful bouquets in life that have come to him since. We all feel our loss, but I think he knew he was appreciated. A grand, noble, beautiful-souled man. Oh, if we all could feel that we had so nobly filled our life's span. But he was exceptionally gifted, and with a divine consecration used them for the good of humanity, his brothers and sisters.

The thought comes to me that we should not save all the flowers to put on their graves, but now, while they still tarry with us, let them know our love and reverence, for really we have a host of worthy workers with the angels for earth's upliftment into nobler, happier lives.

"As the drop mingled with the surging ocean,
As the sand falleth on the sea-girt shore,
So shall a thought of truth put in motion,
Live 'mong other thoughts forevermore.

"And as one globule doth displace another,
Moving old ocean with its tiny might,
So move our words a sister or a brother,
Swaying them in the paths of wrong or right."

I have in the past been pleased to tell the readers of The Progressive Thinker of our having lectures and an interest taken in the advancement of the harmonial philosophy, but now I have to report that our beautiful church on the hill is closed and the voice of inspiration that used to be heard within its walls is silent. I am sure this will be sad news to the many lecturers all over the country who have spoken in the little church at Alliance. To me it seems especially sad that we cannot continue to sound the glorious truths—in opposition to the dogmas of the orthodox churches which are booming here—or some of them.

I wonder if there is not some person or persons who know themselves qualified to attract interest and instruct our people, who can come and rekindle the extinguished fire on the altar of progressive truth. I am glad to read in the General Survey of the good work in other localities, and am sure if the leader shall appear, that the same results could or would be wrought here, as it seems the times are ripe for rational thought on the God question and salvation.

AN HONEST SKEPTIC'S PLEA.

Creator of the universe,
Designer of this wondrous plan,
Why holdest thou these mysteries
So tightly grasped within thy hand?

Reveal to us in simple ways
The language of the spheres.
Portray to our inquiring minds
The mysteries of bygone years.

The mysteries of life and death
Have never been revealed;
From whence we came or whither go,
Are still from us concealed.

We come, we go, but stay awhile,
And thence to scenes unknown;
The soul has gone from out the clay,
But whither has it flown?

Did death end all? Or is there life
Beyond the portals here?
If life beyond, what nature then,
To cherish, love or fear?

What sayest thou? What shall we hope?
What is our destiny to be?
Does death end all, with mind extinct?
Or life beyond with soul set free?

"The Jesuits." By Rev. B. F. Austin, A. M., B. D. An excellent pamphlet. Price, 15 cents.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

It Is Addressed to the Spiritualists of New York State.

Mrs. T. U. Reynolds, the state missionary and organizer, will answer calls for holding meetings in New York state during the months of March and April. She will visit localities where there are a few Spiritualists and interested persons to give her welcome. She will conduct meetings in churches or in public halls where available at moderate cost, and she occasionally holds parlor meetings when a public meeting is not available. She will lecture and give spirit messages and awaken an interest among your people.

Spiritualism and the beautiful truths it has given us during the last half century has accomplished much.

It has united, in a way hitherto thought impossible, science, philosophy and religion.

It has demonstrated the reality of the after-life, and given us the first rational conception of it. It has opened the fountains of inspiration, and with its present-day revelations and inspirations from the unseen as a basas, is harmonizing with true Christianity as exemplified in the life and teachings of the Nazarene. It gives us the grandest conception of this universe that ever penetrated the mind of man. It embraces the most advanced thought in all directions and gives a meaning to life and its purposes, never before so clearly discerned.

It has demonstrated that "There is no death, but what seems so is transition," that what we call death is only promotion from a lower to a higher department of the great School of Life.

Spiritualism stands for Truth, Equity and justice for all mankind and these are the fundamental principles of brotherhood, the direct and practical application of which would solve the many momentous problems now confronting the people of this earth along industrial, economic and political departments of life's activities. These are a few of the great lessons Spiritualism is presenting to the world, and the efforts of all reformers on the earth-plane, are being reinforced by the efforts and advanced thought of master minds in higher spiritual realms, whose thought vibrations are touching and inspiring the brain of men and women in the various walks of life. As a result of these efforts discerning minds have discovered signs of a great spiritual awakening. That Spiritualism has put into operation forces which are largely instrumental in bringing about these beneficent results we most assuredly believe.

We also realize that there are many people who are indifferent and inactive concerning these things. A knowledge of Spiritualism will surely arouse a large percentage of these and make them enthusiastic workers for the world's reformation.

It is for this reason that the officers of New York State Association of Spiritualists are desirous of awakening the people and of extending the knowledge of Spiritualism.

There are towns and hamlets in New York State where Spiritualist meetings are practically an unknown quantity, and the selection by the State Board of one so rarely gifted as is Mrs. Reynolds, both as a speaker and as a medium for spirit-messages, affords a favorable opportunity to those who wish to have Spiritualism presented to their neighbors and friends in a scholarly and dignified manner and in a way that will attract and interest them in this movement.

Please send in your invitations as early as possible, so that circuits may be laid out and the work arranged with views to economy of time, travel and expense. Write and tell us the conditions in your home town. Direct to Mrs. T. U. Reynolds, 137 Congress street, Troy, N. Y., or to the State President,

OLD YEAR, GOOD-BYE.

Shake hands, old year, and call it square.
We'll bear no malice—you, nor I.
Each meant to play the other fair
And true, I hope, as time passed by.
My failures and mistakes you knew,
But judged me kindly for the same,
And tho' my victories were few,
My motives you could rightly name.

You may have thought I missed my way
Sometimes, and failed to wisely choose
'Twixt this or that, as day by day,
We played the game of gain or lose.
I may have felt you owed me more
Of this world's goods, than I received,
A fuller measure of earth's store,
Or friends in whom I had believed.

You gave me time to do my best;
I tried and failed, the common fate,
We do not realize the test
Of life, until the hour is late.
And if achievements small are mine,
As in the days so lately gone,
True sentries, stationed down the line,
Signal, "'tis better, further on."

Farewell! and shall we meet no more?
Our ways so different lie, old friend.
Adrift in touch with memory's shore,
You fade from sight, around the bend.
New years may come, as yet unborn,
And take their places at your side;
Before eternity's fair morn
For me, shall swing the portal wide.

And though in wait, and vainly grieve
For loved ones whom no more I see,
And blessings flown, they, I believe
In greater measure wait for me.
I'll keep your memory fair and green.
Would I could bury, at your brink,
Misunderstandings, cold and keen,
Which blight the soul in sorrow shrink.

And does there beat a heart so cold
It feels no need of hope or heaven?
So proud and perfect in its mould,
That can't forgive to be forgiven?
Good-bye—well not regret the past,
The way to both was all untried,
Our labor was before the mast
Of discipline, and high the tide.

A harbor opens, wide and fair,
The new year glides into the sea.
With snow-white sail and beauty rare
She enters on her voyage free.
Life's storms will sweep across her bow,
And clouds obscure her joyous sky,
For life means that—this life of now—
Old friend, old year, good-bye, good-bye.

FROM SARA C. SCOVELL

Personal Notes, and the Status of some Kansas Societies.

To the Editor:—You receive so many good letters from all quarters that it seems an infringement on your time and space for me to write, but there are "things" happening out here as well as farther east which may be of interest to our field workers.

It is useless for me to express the great sorrow felt when reading about the transition of two such grand workers as Moses Hull and Jennie Hagan Brown. I knew them both and was proud to class them as personal friends. And yet—they are called, and we of lesser note in the field are left to regret their going.

We were in hopes to secure the service of Moses and Mattie on their return from the west, and even had started to arrange with them for a date. While waiting instructions in full what to write them, the news of Moses' passing over came to us.

The Joplin Society has been quiet this winter, but expects to resume work soon, and with renewed energy. My illness, and the care of an aged mother forbids me doing active work, and only now and then can I be depended upon. The passing stranger cannot enter into the work when it comes to local events, as the resident medium can.

Pittsburg has an active society, and they are doing good work there. I go when I can, and have arranged now for the first and second Sunday in each month with the proviso that any time home duties interfere I must be excused from duty and the local officers attend to the work. They have a good corps of officers, all able to help themselves when necessary to do so.

We are handicapped by the want of an active State Association, but we hope some day to overcome this and be in touch with the National Association, but until this can be accomplished we will have to work under our State charter, and as our Methodist friends do, "pray for more light."

The Pittsburg Society has its charter direct from the State of Kansas, with full power to organize societies, ordain ministers, and all rights that belong to our ministry.

We would be glad if some of our veterans would come here and assist the new recruits. My time is so fully occupied in home and literary work that I can devote but little time to the field.

Where are Brother and Sister Sprague? A little missionary work in this vicinity might accomplish a great future good.

Every society in Kansas would unite with the National if certain conditions could be eliminated in this state; as long as they exist we are compelled to remain outside the National fold. This we do not desire.

We trust The Progressive Thinker may never grow less. It is our "rock in a weary land," when oppressed by conditions which threaten to overwhelm.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to the higher life, Mrs. Virginia Ann Giroux, beloved wife of T. Giroux, Monday, Feb. 18, at 8:20 p. m., at St. Louis, Mo.

For years she had been a Spiritualist, and for a year or more an ardent worker and conductor of the lyceum of the First Spiritual Association of St. Louis. Rev. Laura M. Jones officiated. The mortal remains were incinerated.

OLIN D. WHITTIER.

Mrs. Margaret Hendricks passed to spirit life, Feb. 13, aged 78 years. She had been a Spiritualist for many years, and a reader of The Progressive Thinker nearly fourteen years. She was a kind mother and I miss her much. She had suffered a great deal through life, and deserves a mansion in spirit life.

FRANK HENDRICKS.

Mrs. R. C. Worden of Dallas, Tex., passed to higher life, Feb. 13, at the age of 81. By her wish I took charge of the services. Grandma Worden was a woman whom everybody loved. The untiring devotion of her daughter-in-law and sons kept her with us longer. Her family are all members of the society here, and devoted workers. As she lay in her white casket, robed in white, all the lines of age had disappeared, and a look of girlhood and a smile of love was on her face, for she had gone home to the husband of her youth.

ISA KAYNER.

"AN HONEST GOD."

Ingersoll Meant Just What He Said.

In reply to Mr. Klock's article in The Progressive Thinker of February 2, I will say that my understanding of Ingersoll's saying, "An honest God is the noblest work of man," is that it means just what it says. A personal God is the work of man, either hewn out of stone or pictured in the mind. A man cannot create a God any bigger or greater intellectually than himself, and that is why the Old Testament God savors so much after the ancient kings—jealous, wrathful, bloodthirsty and egotistic to the extent that Mr. Ingersoll as well as others became disgusted with him and were honest enough to say so. Hence the saying. If some imaginative preacher like Dowie or Joseph Smith will create a God as honest, kind and big-hearted as Robert G. Ingersoll he will have done a noble work; and I would gladly take off my hat and bow to that kind of a God.

The World Has Never Seen the Like!

At Great Expense we have secured the copyright of Mr. Ghandi's translation of the "Unknown Life of Jesus Christ." It is to be sent forth as a gift to our subscribers, as set forth in the following:

It is an absolute fact. We are enabling our subscribers to form a valuable library at a nominal cost. One of them writes:

"I have your THIRTEEN premium books, which if I had bought in the open market at the usual price would have cost me at least $15. Sending each year for one copy at the cost of 25 cents, the whole thirteen volumes have cost me exactly $3.25. As you paid the postage thereon, which amounts to not less than $1.40, all you receive for the Thirteen copies I have, is exactly $1.85, causing you to lose in the aggregate each year a large amount of money in order to benefit your subscribers."

The above is an accurate estimate. All we have received for the thirteen premium books when they have been ordered one at a time for thirteen consecutive years, is approximately $1.85, a little more than the price of a single book.

We now offer as a GIFT OUT-RIGHT, one of the most valuable books of the present age—THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST. In order to obtain this book, you must send TEN CENTS in stamps to pay the postage thereon, and ONE DOLLAR for The Progressive Thinker one year. Your library is not complete without this remarkable book. Every Spiritualist should have it for study and reference. Every orthodox Christian should read it, and thus learn the whole truth in regard to Jesus. Remember it is a GIFT to you on the TERMS MENTIONED above. We expect to distribute at least Twenty Thousand copies as GIFTS.

Have You Read OUR PREMIUM BOOK OFFER?

Truly, the world has NEVER SEEN the like before. Search the annals of history, ANCIENT AND MODERN; critically examine the history of Spiritualism; look here and there, in every nook and corner of the world, and you CANNOT find a parallel to the offer made in reference to these THIRTEEN remarkable PREMIUM BOOKS. They constitute a wonderfully valuable Spiritualistic and Occult LIBRARY, and are furnished at a nominal sum. All are substantially bound and neatly printed, and those who purchase them are DELIGHTED WITH THEM.

We have now THIRTEEN magnificent PREMIUM BOOKS which you can select from.

GEMS OF THOUGHT, by SEVENTEEN leading authors, is our last Premium Book.

Any one of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 25 cents. This is the price, remember, when you order only one book in connection with a yearly subscription. The paper, one year, and one Premium Book, $1.25. But if you order more than one Premium Book the price is as follows:

Any two of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price 70 cents.
Any three of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.
Any four of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.
Any five of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $1.75.
Any six of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.05.
Any seven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.
Any eight of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.65.
Any nine of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.
Any ten of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.10.
Any eleven of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.40.
Any twelve of the Thirteen Premium Books you may order, price $3.85.

Lastly, all of these THIRTEEN Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for 4.15, something never before equalled in this country or Europe.

Bear in mind that every order for a Premium Book must be accompanied with a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker, which is $1. We repeat that the world has never seen the like of it before.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end. It is chockful of stirring incidents. Price of this large volume, only $1.50 postpaid.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK.

Torture implements employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity, with pictorial illustrations. By George E. Macdonald. Price, 10 cents.

ANCIENT INDIA,

Its Language and Religions. By Prof. H. Oldenberg. Paper, 25 cents.

Prof. Lockwood's Books.

Store your mind with the great but demonstrative truths found in consecutive order only in these writings.

Prof. Lockwood is the only writer, thinker and lecturer in this country who affirms that the evolution of the soul of man is in strict accord and agreement with the evolution of the soul of nature; and that the only proof of immortality inheres in an analysis of nature's fundamental principles and the co-relation of cosmic elements and energies.

These great truths are explained and demonstrated from the plane of the Spiritual Philosophy founded on Nature itself.

The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature and Its Relation to the Philosophy of Spiritualism. A scientific demonstration of the invisible principles and attributes of nature and Modern Spiritualism. A mint of scientific truths as the basis of its phenomena. Price 25 cents.

The Infidelity of Ecclesiasticism—A Menace to the American Civilization. The entire hierarchy of Ecclesiasticism arraigned as infidels for subverting the scientific demonstrations of universities and colleges, by substituting the immoral phantoms of the Mosaic Hypothesis. It is a hot shot. Price 25 cents.

Historical, Logical and Philosophical Objections to the Dogmas of Reincarnation and Re-Embodiment. A concise and masterly review of the historical origin of Reincarnation as an ancient dogma. Its illogical claims and inconsistent assumptions. Its glaring defects and dogmas dissected. Price 25 cents.

The Spiritualism of Nature. Modern Spiritualism has its basic truths in nature, and is proven not by the bible or any sacred cosmogony, but by an analysis of nature's self-existent principles. Price 15 cents.

Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth: The greatest book, and the greatest truth of any age; a book of 212 pages with several telling scientific illustrations. Continuity of life and the association of spirit realms demonstrated to be in scientific accord with principles of the Co-relation of Force, and the Conservation of Energy. The greatest book ever written in the defence and support of Spiritualism. Price $1.

The Relation Science Holds to Natural Philosophy and Its Conflict with Every Phase of Religion. In this essay the author shows that science is not a thing—a corporation or individual, but a process of inductive and deductive reasoning. Its acceptance means the death of Theurgical religions. Price 15 cents.

All of Prof. Lockwood's publications are on sale at The Progressive Thinker office, Chicago, Ill., and at the rostrum when he lectures. These treatises contain the wealth of a vast historical and scientific research.

Science and a Future Life

By Prof. James H. Hyslop. Price $1.50; Postage 10 cents.

This work is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its ethical deductions, unanswerable in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. For sale at this office.

RADIANT ENERGY and Its Analysis, Its Relation to Modern Astrophysics, by Edgar L. Larkin, Director Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, California. This book treats upon a new branch of research into the laws of nature, and to the student or even an admirer of the modern astrological literature will surely come with great interest. Price, cloth, $1.75

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Alta M. Lilly: Q. How old is Jesus Christ said to have been at the beginning of the present era, the year A. D. 1?

A. In answer I quote from "Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas," page 192:

"Of the date of the birth of Christ, historians agree that there is no historic data of the least certainty or value. Ewald and Asher fix on the 25th of December, five years before our era, Jerome three years, Eusebius two years, on Jan. 6. Canon Farrar says: "No data exists enabling us to determine them, with even proximate accuracy." St. Luke fixes the date when Cyrenius was governor of Syria, A. D. 10. December 25 was the common birthday for all the sun-gods. "It is also to be borne in mind that the Romans counted time from the foundation of the Imperial City, and the year "1" corresponds to 753 of their calendar. Not until 1280 of Roman chronology and 527 of our era, was the counting of time from the birth of Christ began. And it may be remarked that at that time it was absolutely impossible to have ascertained the date of the birth and it was fixed arbitrarily."

How uncertain the date, or the event, may be inferred from the fact that not until more than five centuries had elapsed was the counting of time from the birth of Christ adopted, and the most important sect maintained he had no personal existence, being only a principle or "Idea."

E. J. Orr: The number 3 has been regarded from remotest antiquity as having wonderful mystic properties. The triangle was held as a sacred emblem. God was three in one; man is a trinity of spirit, soul and body. Seven was also held as mystical; there were seven days in the week; seven wonders of the world, etc.

Tartaric acid is the acid constituent of the grape, in which it exists as tartrate of potassa. When the juice ferments it is precipitated on the sides of the casks as crude cream of tartar from which it is obtained in a pure state by reagents.

Antiquarian: Q. In reading "The Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas," I find, page 254, you quote Theophilus and give date 168-181 A. D. If you can verify that date, why does it not establish the date of St. Luke's gospel 168-181 A. D., in place of the dates given on page 233?

A. If it could be "established" then there would be no question as to the date, but the various dates are given to show how utterly unreliable they all are. Unfortunately, the "divine revelation," which was given to man as his only means of redemption is surrounded by dense fog banks, and the student of history guesses through the obscurity over marshlands on which his feet find no security.

O. C. Nuubson: Q. I enclose the following item of news, and ask in what manner it differs from "obsession"?

Kenosha, Wis., Feb. 8.—On the ground that the girl was hypnotized and therefore not responsible for her acts, District Attorney Baker and Chief of Police Hare have released on parole Annie Rumple, aged 18, who had been held as the accomplice of Fred Lichtenteller, said to be a notorious thief. It is asserted that Miss Rumple is completely in the power of Lichtenteller.

The girl is a daughter of Charles Rumple, a Lake Geneva farmer. When she was 16 Lichtenteller began working as a teamster in the neighborhood. Since the day he met her, it is said, she has been a slave to him.

Lichtenteller is a former convict, but notwithstanding, after Miss Rumple had known him a few days, she accompanied him to Kenosha to be married to him. Her father reached Kenosha in time to prevent the marriage, but could not induce the girl to return home with him. When she finally did return she remained but a short time, and then fled in the night to join her lover.

Before she met Lichtenteller the girl had been of a religious nature, but she was unable to overcome his influence. She admitted she had been with Lichtenteller in several robberies and had resided with him for months.

Many letters which passed between the two were seized by the police, and these showed the power the man had over the girl. Miss Rumple bared her heart to the man in these letters and pleaded with him to release her from the spell that bound her.

When she was arrested Lichtenteller was in Milwaukee, but she managed to telegraph him, and he has not been captured.

The young woman returned to Lake Geneva with her father last night. Bonds had been furnished to assure her appearance in court when demanded.

A. There is no difference in principle between hypnotism and spirit influence, except in one the operator is a free spirit, in the other confined to its mortal body. The words also express degree, and spirit influence is not obsession until it asserts complete control over the subject. Hypnotism carried to this extreme becomes obsession by the controlling operator. The old idea that the spirit enters into the body of the subject dispossessing for the time, and taking the place of his spirit, came from the phraseology of the Bible, and is wholly incorrect. A spirit cannot be dispossessed without the death of the body, and two spirits cannot occupy the same body at the same time.

It is possible, as this correspondent suggests, that should this criminal die, his spirit might return and hold his victim under the same control, yet with the change of death, other changes might come which would prevent her mind responding. Of the many similar instances reported, and there are many, I have failed to find a single one where the point of attack, the responsive, were not of the lower faculties. The intensification of the higher faculties, that makes glorified saints is not called obsession, though the soul may be upborne by angel hands. No one objects to this form of spirit interference. It holds no soul in bondage, but assists in self-asserting personality.

The real "possession" (is not this word better than obsession?) drags down to the nether world of the desires and passions. Its danger lies in the fact that it intensifies the animal nature and thereby suggests the ways of crime. It also anesthizes the will and by removing its restraint the subject thinks and acts as he would normally without such restraint, and were it not for this the operator could not control for criminal purposes.

As the physical body may be in such a state of health as to be immune from disease, and the blood able to withstand swarms of infectious microbes, so the spirit may hold itself in such a high sphere of thought as to be immune from lower influences, and obsession, to gain response must come from sources which draw upward—helpful, helping forces.

I repeat, what I have often stated, that "obsession" may call for our charity, but it does not excuse for misconduct. The subject cannot be made to do, by the control, anything he would not do were the restraint of environment, and the will removed.

If one desires to arise out of the lowland fogs to the clear sunshine of the heights, he must climb—up to the heights where there are no clouds—never any clouds, only forever and eternal light from above.

Who Owns the Baby?

"A Modern Madonna," by Caroline Abbott Stanley, a native of Missouri, is one of the much talked about books of the day. The story deals with the tragic possibilities of a law, repealed within a decade in the District of Columbia, which permitted a father to appoint by will a guardian for a child unborn. The attorney-generals of Tennessee and South Carolina, according to the Fairfax (S. C.) Enterprise, are authority for the statements that almost identical statutes are in force in these states to-day, and even in Ohio such a law exists. No matter how much of a "dead letter" this law may be, its existence is a disgrace to any state.

It is fully answered in "Mediumship, and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation," by Hudson Tuttle. Price 35 cents. Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

"RACE SUICIDE."

It Is Quality, Rather Than Quantity, That Is Needed.

Having read with interest both sides of the above question, I feel constrained to give my views. Our president, Mr. Roosevelt, thinks "race suicide" is a menace to the country, while two eminent educators think it a blessing.

In to-day's Examiner is an account of a poor woman who was forced to steal to feed her seven little children. The father has been laid up with rheumatism for two months, and unable to work.

How does a large family bring a blessing to those people? In after years, if the children grow up to be healthy and well educated men and women they may be a help to their parents in their old age. But what is the chance for such a condition of affairs to come about? The parents have a continual struggle with poverty and want; what chance have they to give the children an education that will fit them for the higher and more useful life? The children must be raised in poverty and ignorance, having only their hands to ward off the giant wolf of hunger. In many similar cases they grow up to be tramps, beggars, or thieves—a bright prospect for a mother to look forward to!

The annual increase in population is among the poor, both those of our own country and the poorer classes from foreign lands. As the population increases the army of tramps and vagabonds also increases; the jails, almshouses and asylums are filled to overflowing. Is that the kind of blessings the people of this country want? Would not one million stout and hearty young men be of much more benefit to this country than five million ragged, dirty, whisky-soaked, cigarette fiends?

"Poverty is no crime," but it is a crime to continue to raise children in poverty and ignorance, a crime against every citizen who is working for the uplifting of humanity in general and our beloved country in particular.

Why is it those who are least able to care for children have the largest families? The answer is easy, ignorance and selfishness. Parents who have succeeded in a small degree suppose their children will succeed in a larger degree in this age of progress, without any special preparation of any kind. Selfishness presumes that when the children grow to manhood and womanhood they will be able to support the parents in luxury and idleness.

No doubt the parents of large families love their children, probably as much as I do my one little girl (although I doubt it), yet would not it be better to divide that love and bare living among two than try to make the same benefits provide for seven? Then it becomes a menace to the older children to have others to take up the care and attention which should be bestowed upon them, for "half a loaf is better than none," and when you divide that half a loaf among nine people instead of three or four each must necessarily be deprived of a partial living, and the half of a loaf becomes poor consolation indeed. What we want and need in this country is QUALITY, NOT QUANTITY. E. J. BARNETT.

SURGING AHEAD.

How the Work Is Progressing in the Pine Tree State and in Massachusetts.

To the Editor:—Thinking that many of our friends would like to know something of how the work in the State of Maine is progressing, I take pleasure in making this report.

It was my good fortune to serve the First Spiritualist Association of Portland, Feb. 10, in the capacity of speaker and message bearer. Although the day was stormy, I was greeted by a good-sized and very harmonious audience, both afternoon and evening, and to say that they were appreciative of the work done by my guides, does not do them justice. It being my first visit to this society, I felt somewhat ill at ease and nervous, but the kind, hospitable greeting that I received soon dispelled all the clouds of gloom, and I saw at once that we were to have a feast of spiritual things. The conditions were excellent, and the forces and higher intelligences were there to respond. I found the members a very spiritual people, and as a whole, reaching out for the more perfect unfoldment of the philosophy of this grand truth. There is much that might be accomplished in this city, for the cause, as the class of people who are interested are a thinking people, and of high moral character.

There is a movement on foot to establish a local pastorate and permanent church work. The members are in earnest and need a leader who will bring about results. My stay in Portland was exceptionally pleasant, being entertained at the Chase house, which is noted for the comforts of home. We trust that it will be our good fortune to visit them again in the near future.

The work at Newburyport, Mass., is progressing finely. The First Spiritualists Association is having unusually large and enthusiastic audiences. This society, under the guidance of Brother F. H. Fuller, as president, is making marked strides in the march of progress.

Wednesday evening, Feb. 13, they had a turkey supper and conference meeting, presided over by Brother Fuller, at which Haverhill and Amesbury societies were well represented. The medium of the evening was our beloved co-worker, Mrs. Kate M. Ham, of Haverhill, whose beautiful messages were comforting to all. At the home of Mrs. Weeks, each Tuesday and Friday evening, under the direction of myself, a circle for the development of the higher forces is held. There are fourteen honest, conscientious persons in this circle, and many beautiful presentations of the different phases of the phenomena have been seen. Each member of the circle has been able to see much of the manifestations.

The Spiritualists of Newburyport are waking up, and by the close of the season there will be a new life enthused into the veins of all.

THE MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Letter From Mrs. L. S. Weaver, Secretary.

Since publishing the last list of contributions to the Morris Pratt Institute, we have been called to part with the prime mover and factor in procuring contributions. Our beloved president, Moses Hull, has finished his work on this visible plane of life. He sent in his last contribution of $40.75 only a few days before his transition. In a letter to me he stated he had started to raise a Ten Thousand Dollar endowment fund, of which only the interest is to be used. He enclosed his first subscription to the fund, of five dollars. I opened a page on ledger, "Endowment Fund," crediting to donor the amount paid. Now, brother and sister Spiritualists and friends of education, what is our duty at this time? Shall we allow this page on our ledger to remain one lone subscription; or shall we go on and finish the work Moses Hull began? What more fitting monument could the Spiritualists render to the memory of Moses Hull than to complete his last work? What could give him so much joy as to know his work for which he gave his life would be consummated? It would be a fitting monument to both Spiritualism and education to raise a fund for fitting men and women to become workers in the great cause of freedom and humanity. How many out of the great mass of Spiritualists throughout the land appreciate the work done at the Morris Pratt School?

All denominations of any repute maintain their established schools for the education of their children, and why should Spiritualists be lacking in that which is most essential to the perpetuity of their ideas?

Now that we own a beautiful building well equipped for school purposes, I will make an appeal to every one interested in Spiritualism or education along liberal lines to contribute according to his means to complete this endowment fund, founded by our arisen brother, that we may possess the means to aid those who are kept from acquiring an education, by lack of a little help.

We recently received a letter from a good lady in New Jersey, saying saying she contributed most cheerfully her yearly dues to the school, because a lady who was to give a lecture before an organization in her city was a graduate from the Morris Pratt Institute, and to which, she said she owed her ability to go before an audience as a lecturer. It is due to such letters that we have renewed courage to labor on in the good work. We often receive letters containing contributions, assuring us of faith in the educational work inaugurated in this school.

A few days since we received a letter from a good brother in Arkansas, containing a note for $50, payable in six years with interest annually. He said the Methodist conference had just closed in his city, and it made an appeal for money to barry on their school, and he gave them his note, and some invisible influence prompted him to send a like note to the Morris Pratt Institute. So, dear friends, let us take courage since the trend of thought seems moving in favor of education as the surest means of accomplishing the best results.

Whitewater, Wis. Secretary.

A WONDERFUL VOLUME.

The Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas.

I am reading Hudson Tuttle's new book, "Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas."

It is a wonderful volume of information in regard to the ideas of the different sages, philosophers, tribes and human beings of past ages, as well as of the present generation. The idea of some kind of belief and worship has been extant through all time in the minds and thoughts of humanity. The mystery of most kinds of religion, is beyond our comprehension. The more we study the religions of the world the more we are lost in amazement. Surely man is a strange animal of a high order, and yet he can sink to the lowest depths of depravity, or rise to the highest state of true manhood through education, culture, refinement and progression.

The Progressive Thinker, with its spiritual teachers, writers, authors, lecturers, books, scientific demonstrators, and other agencies in spreading the truth of Spiritualism, is surely awakening interest among its thinking and investigating readers. I wish all persons who are interested in the paper, in its great work of enlightening our minds upon the subject of truth, and eradicating error in the world, a happy and prosperous year for 1907, and for all years to come in the great future.

There are millions of pessimists who live upon our planet, while the optimists are in the minority, as far as my experience goes. The former class of people are continually looking on the dark side of life with all of its tragedies, storms and conflicts, that rage with fury during upheavals of nature or nations.

Among the brave, courageous people are the Spiritualists and mystics, who are ever optimistic in regard to life here upon the earth plane, and through all of the future ages.

Nature is cruel and nature is kind. The earth's surface is filled with rich treasures, but man has to dig them out, in order to get any benefit therefrom, but most people do not get their share of the bounties of life, on account of the selfishness of brainy men, and other causes.

Progression, unfoldment and advancement of the human races are the greatest problems of the future. They are the grandest principles of the universe, and the hope of humanity in this world, and the one to come. According to Hudson Tuttle's "Evolution of The God and Christ Ideas," all religions have developed from myths and priests, while Christianity sprang from Paganism, and its false teachings. What an awful condition of ignorance and superstition would have existed universally in civilized countries, had the dominant churches attained full power over the people, in what is called Christendom! The conditions are bad enough now, but it would be a thousand fold worse were priestcraft and popery in full control of the world's inhabitants. W. S. FRANKLIN.

THE SPIRIT JOHNNY

And His Joke at Mr. Dunakin's Circle.

To the Editor;—Consequent on your publishing my letter to Mr. Rockwell about two months ago, I have received so many letters from people in various parts of the country—letters in some cases pathetic because of the strong longing to communicate with loved ones gone, that I realize as I did not formerly, how how many others feel as I do in this matter of Spiritualism.

I shall not mind if you tell these numberless friends this amusing little thing that happened to me at Mr. Dunakin's last circle.

As it happened, a week before the circle, I had had a photographer at my home making photos of certain rugs which I had for a time in my possession. When he finished I placed myself in position where one of the rugs had hung, and told him to take a photo of me, which he did.

The circle was a week later, I feel very positive that no one knew of the photo except the people in the house and the photographer, although, of course, I could not positively prove it.

At the beginning of the circle Mr. Dunakin's Indian guide told me my daughter (at a distance from me, at school) had been crying. This naturally made me sad, but in the darkness I was not aware that any one was observing it.

Suddenly out of the cabinet squeaked the voice of "Johnny," an apparently very cheerful spirit who never leaves the cabinet, but is present at every meeting. As I said, he suddenly squeaked out: "Say, you lady, what makes you so sorrowful?" When I told him, he tried to show me what an unnecessary thing my anxiety was, and wound up with, "Well, anyhow, what difference does it make if a girl does have a little bawling spell!"

Of course we all laughed, but still Johnny seemed to think he had not sufficiently cheered me up, so he said:

"See here, I'm going to make a joke at you! I want to pick a quarrel with you. Now, you mustn't be offended."

"No, Johnny, I'll not be offended. Go on with your joke," I said.

"Well, then, who'd want to stand on a darned old rug to have her picture taken!"

Of course the rest of the circle knew nothing of what was meant, but to me it was certainly a "joke." Now, how did Johnny know about that photo?

SPIRITUALISM PROSPERING.

Phenomenal Success of the Buffalo Bazaar.

The remarkably successful bazaar held at the First Spiritual Church of Buffalo, corner Jersey street and Prospect avenue, is an encouraging index. It says to all societies, "Go and do likewise." A sketch of it may be an inspiration to others and a tonic to those who worked so earnestly and paid so liberally. The figures as given to me are:

Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb, independent booths, assisted by Mrs. A. G. Atcheson	$334.65
Mrs Johnson, chairman of country store	91.00
Mrs. Dr. Lane	60.00
Lyceum	33.00
Mr. L. Miller at door, and mediums	53.00

The net profits, $538.

In an exciting contest for favorite clairvoyants the friends of Mrs. Dr. Matteson and Mrs. Dr. Lane voted by payments. Mrs. Matteson received 5,600 votes, making $56; Mrs. Lane received 700 votes, making $7.

Mrs. Matteson has so long been known and loved for her good works, that she has a large following, and they love to express their appreciation. Mrs. Lane has not been so long and widely known as a clairvoyant and healer. But her friends are many and enthusiastic. It was an ingenious way to stir up an interest and touch the pocket-book.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley and Mrs. Johnson did excellent work, and Mrs. Atcheson put in six weeks of earnest effort for the cause in connection with Mrs. Whitcomb's booth. She received a fine present of a picture which was won by Mrs. Whitcomb's dog, "Dick." He also won seven other prizes, by raffles. Lucky dog!

Mrs. Matteson's interest and generosity was represented in Mrs. Whitcomb's work, inspired by love for her dear good mother.

It looks as if the cause at the First Spiritual church of Buffalo is in a healthy, vigorous condition. Prof. Lockwood's illness crippled his work for a time, but others have kept the ball rolling. The Professor's strong scientific analysis of Nature's methods has interested many thinkers, and professional men of all schools of all schools of thought, and such work builds from the bottom and builds to stay. Mrs. Cooley is much admired in Buffalo, as elsewhere. With good will for all, I rejoice in their success.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

CLAY FOR THE SCULPTOR.

Alone on the cold, cold street,
Hungry and weary and worn,
With nothing to cover his bare little feet—
No home had the child forlorn.

A lady walked proudly by,
With a pretty boy just his age;
The waif saw them pass, with a poor, helpless sigh,
Life's book turned another page.

"That little boy's home is warm,
With plenty to eat and wear,"
Thought the waif, "and to shield him from harm,
Is a mother's loving care.

Oh! God took my mother above,
If what I am told is true,
Where all is so happy, all sweet peace and love—
Why didn't He take me, too?"

That night, in an open shed
The cold hungry wanderer lay,
With nothing but rags to pillow his head
As dawn passed on to day.

Warm rays of the morning sun
Burst in on that quiet face,
But a great sculptor's work had been silently done—
He left clay in the poor waif's place.

Ninth Annual Convention and Mid-Winter Mass Meeting

OF THE ILLINOIS STATE SPIRITUALISTS' ASSOCIATION.

Held at Handel Hall, Chicago, February 19, 20 and 21, 1907.

Tuesday Evening.

At a little past 8 o'clock Handel Hall was fairly well filled with an anxious, interested audience, and until the president's gavel sounded, calling the meeting to order, a general hearty handshake and social time was indulged in.

The printed program was not closely followed—no one expected it would be—it never is and never can be—but agreeable substitutions were made by the ready and clear-seeing President, Geo. B. Warne.

Meeting opened with congregational singing—"Joy to the World"—led by Mrs. Carrie Crawford Pierce, the able musical director, following which a long, though religiously spiritualistic invocation was given by A. Arnold, President of the United Brotherhood.

The "Bridal Chorus" by the Convention Chorus, was a very appreciable diversion from the old-time musical program, which, by the way, was almost always good and appreciated.

Miss Elizabeth Harlow delivered the address of the evening, taking as her theme, "The Needs of the Hour." It is useless in such limited space as this report must necessarily occupy to even quote what she said in part, but suffice it to say she struck the keynote of the "Needs of the Hour," dwelling largely upon the fact that for 60 years Spiritualism had been presenting its phenomena to the world, advocating right principles and in part living wrong; had been giving out much noise with little real, practical work. She would not only have them live the beautiful doctrine they preach, one day out of seven, but live it every day in the week and every week in the year. One thing we must quote that she said upon the subject of Truth; which was: "The man who tells the truth has but few friends; the man who tells the truth and stands by it has but one or two friends, and the man who strips the truth naked and exposes it to the world stands alone."

Mrs. Clara Lauf Gillette's violin solo was beautiful, following the address, and was encored enthusiastically.

Miss Maloney sang sweetly a song entitled, "Leave Me Not," and the audience tried hard to get her back again.

Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley gave 12 distinct, clear-cut messages, all of which were accepted and recognized. Mrs. Cooley is certainly growing better and better with her constant practice upon the platform and her services are highly appreciated. It seems like a case of reversal of the old saw that "a person is not without honor save in his own country." She certainly holds the honor and esteem of her own country, her own city.

Mrs. Murtha is rapidly weaving a web of appreciation around herself in this great city by her straight-out, honest platform work. Her many messages were highly appreciated by even those to whom no words were spoken direct, and considering the lateness of the hour the audience remained remarkably quiet till the last.

Wednesday Morning.

This session was devoted to the discussion of questions of vital importance to the State and local organizations; and the re-election of officers. There was but one contest to the re-election of all the old officers, that of the vice-president, and Mrs. E. J. Bloom was re-elected. One or two changes in directorship also occurred, on account of the declination of some to be longer in the positions.

Amendments were made to the by-laws and constitution, and some recommendations suggested for future work.

Afternoon Session.

The first address of the afternoon was delivered by Max Gentzke, and was one of the solid and philosophical lectures of the session. He dwelt largely upon the moral status, and looking to the marriage question, and mate selection for the betterment of the race; touching closely upon astrology and the pro-creative principles, as the proper things to be taught to the generations of to-day for the benefit of those to come. A sensible and important address.

After a beautiful vocal solo, "When the Heart was Young," Miss Harlow took the rostrum in place of Geo. H. Brooks, who was reported sick in bed, and gave one of her solid, rousing addresses, touching upon the race question in a very acceptable manner to the vast audience.

Mrs. Jennie Robinson Fisher sang a vocal solo, "Magnetic Waltz," in such a magnetic manner as to completely capture the audience; after which Mrs. Alice Sexsmith gave many good messages, all accepted; as did also Mrs. Dr. Caird.

Wednesday Evening.

Mr. E. L. Brown sang for an opening piece a baritone solo—"A Song of the Sea." He sang it beautifully.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor of the familiar old, reliable Church of the Soul, delivered the first address of the evening. No laudations we might feel like giving this dear old worker could be otherwise than stereotyped, to say the least, for she always has the highest esteem of the audiences, the Spiritualists, the common people and the press, especially the spiritualistic press. To listen to her is always to be interested, uplifted and educated.

The piano duet and mandolin sextette were good and appreciated.

Thomas Grimshaw, talked in a normal state and he was both witty and wise in every point he took, and positive in expression. He is still a host on the rostrum, and weaves a web of the practical and the ideal, the sublime and the facetious into his discourses that carry great weight with his audiences.

A beautiful trio by Robt. V. Fessler, W. R. Pierce and Carrie Crawford Pierce was exceedingly fine, and aided in making good conditions for the message-bearers. Mrs. Isa Cleveland and Mrs. J. A. Murtha, who did extremely creditable work.

Thursday Morning.

The Memorial Services were held in express commemoration of the arisen Moses Hull and Jennie B. Hagan Brown, with a general thought wave to all the old arisen workers and friends and relatives. It was a solemn and beautiful service, led by a short tribute to Our Moses, by Dr. C. A. Burgess, followed by Dr. T. Wilkins in the relation of personal memories and incidents of Moses and a tearful tribute to Jennie, and a Memorial Poem (which will be found elsewhere in this paper).

Dr. Juliet Severance spoke beautifully and at length along the line of personal memories of Moses Hull and paid a feeling tribute to Jennie Hagan Brown.

Dr. Warne spoke feelingly of Moses and his tenacity of disposition to a principle he thought right, naming it stubbornness, because he would not publicly yield a point he had had proven to him to be wrong. He only made this point to illustrate his tenacity to a principle, however and dwelt largely upon his devotion to the interests of the Morris Pratt Institute. Mr. Warne advocated, as a monument most fitting to the memory of Moses Hull, the perpetuation and liberal support of that school in which our brother spent his declining years in an attempt to make it one of the permanent and important institutions of the country and to Spiritualism.

Mrs. Richmond delivered the closing address, paying high tribute to both of these dear old arisen workers, and interweaving a poem from her own inspirers with one from Jennie in spirit, that was beautiful. (doubtless the address and poem will be published in the near future) Mrs. Richmond also pronounced the benediction and the meeting closed.

Afternoon Session.

After the usual musical pieces were rendered Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley delivered one of her most able, forcible and logical, as well as eloquent addresses upon the progress and general trend of Spiritualism of to-day and what can be expected for its future.

Ere the last notes of the piece rendered by the Cremona Mandolin and Guitar Club had died away and the beautiful solo had touched the souls of the audience, the guides of Thomas Grimshaw had him entranced ready for the address he was to deliver in the place of George H. Brooks. Acceptably the place of our able brother was filled. The inspirers were in their best fettle and gave a grand address.

Another beautiful baritone solo was rendered by Mr. Fessler, and the message-bearers, Mrs. Susie Thompson and Mrs. Barbara Hilbert, did splendidly. Their readings were given quickly and in a pleasing manner, giving great credit to these able local workers, of whom Spiritualists of the city can well be proud.

Immediately following the afternoon session the adjourned business meeting convened to finish its business.

The first business before the house was the report of the committee on secretary's report and resolutions and amendments, which committee consisted of Dr. T. Wilkins, Mrs. Lichtig and Karl Shipman.

Committee reported as an amendment to the end of the second paragraph of Section I, of Article IV. of the constitution, "and shall be entitled to 1 delegate to every 10 members or major fraction thereof.

Also that, in Section 2 of Article IV. of the constitution, after the word State in the second line, the words, "and not connected with any other Society auxiliary to this Association," be stricken out.

Also, that Section XI. of the By-Laws be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

"All ordinations shall be in conformity with the Rules and Usages of the N. S. A."

The amendment to the By-Laws was passed and the amendments to the constitution were accepted and placed on file to be acted upon at the next annual convention, according to laws governing such procedure.

The committee also recommended that the secretary's report be condensed and published in The Progressive Thinker; and on motion of Mrs. Lichtig the convention ordered that there be 500 copies of the paper containing the same purchased and sent to the various societies over the state. (Time in preparation and limited space prevent its publication in this issue.)

Report of the auditing committee was read and placed in the hands of the secretary.

Another recommendation, the import of which does not here need publication, was recommended and voted down by the convention.

There being no further business in sight the convention adjourned sine-die.

Evening Session.

President Warne, previous to entering upon the program, spoke to the audience regarding the present attitude of the secular press toward our cause compared to that of the same journals a few years ago, and called upon the Spiritualists of the city to aid in impressing upon them that Spiritualism cannot properly be held responsible for or in any way in affiliation with that class of advertising fakirs admitted to their columns as clairvoyants, wonder-workers, charm venders, face powder mixers, etc., considering it one of the most obnoxious and derogatory barnacles to contend with in our great city.

Services opened with a double chorus —"Spring Song"—rendered in a beautiful manner by the Convention Chorus under the baton of Mrs. Pierce; and this was followed by a sweet duet—"A Night in Venice"—one of the most beautiful songs rendered during the series of meetings; rendered by Mrs. Pierce and Wm. R. Pierce.

Mr. Grimshaw, Miss Harlow and Mrs. Cooley, as well as the chairman, took a few moments to speak to the subject of doing more for the Morris Pratt Institute as a fitting tribute to the arisen Moses Hull, and took up a collection towards sending a pupil to the school for a term. Collection was $69.21—a good start towards this move. The idea is for each State Association to send a pupil to the school for a full term, by way of educating the young workers into a mental fitness for future labors in the field, and adding a needed fund and influence to the institution. In Mrs. Cooley's remarks, referring to the idea sprung on another occasion of erecting a statue to Moses Hull, she thought it advisable to place the institution upon a paying basis, after which it would be eminently proper to erect a bronze statue of Our Moses right at the front door of the edifice, with a bible in his hand, to welcome all comers to the institution.

A whistling solo was here rendered by Mrs. E. Leuthesser, short and sweet, and which called for another.

Thomas Grimshaw delivered the first address of the evening in his usual rousing manner, under a strong influence. He kept the house upon its best behavior and wrapt in the logic of his forceful eloquence from first to last. (This lecture was reported in shorthand for reproduction in The Progressive Thinker at some future time.)

Mr. Robert Fessler sang a baritone solo—"Dear Love When in Thine Arms"—and Miss Harlow, as the last address of the series of meetings, drew many word pictures to illustrate the possibilities of the human spirit in the methods of unfoldment, carrying her audience, interested in her uplifting, outreaching arms and eloquence into the thinking realms of human and the spiritual spheres.

Mrs. Pierce sang a solo—"Merrily I Roam"—in a merry laughing spirit exactly expressive with the spirit of the song.

As message-bearers, Mrs. May Elmo and Mrs. Murtha held the large, tired audience well at ease until the close, which was at a late hour.

Vibratory Notes.

The Sunflower Club was lavish in its platform decorations with large, outreaching palms and vases of beautiful cut flowers—an inspiration in themselves in which it was not difficult to sense the spirit of this wifely auxiliary to the State Association, as well as the feeling of the angelic host always present at these meetings. Such decorations are sweet to the soul in tune with nature and restful to the tired vision that is always the result of the late hours of our sessions.

Miss Harlow, Thomas Grimshaw and Mrs. Cooley were at their best throughout the entire convention, as was President Warne, the right man in the right place. In fact, everybody seemed younger than when congregated together a year ago.

Mrs. Carrie Crawford Pierce deserves more than a mere passing notice for her graceful and methodical management of the musical program, the great harmonial function of all entertainments. The easy poise with which she uses the baton and the mocking-bird voice that she possesses, in fact seems complete master of, render her fitted to fill the position of musical director anywhere and under any kind of circumstances. All the productions were good and exceptionally well appreciated by the audience.

Speaking of Miss Harlow; when we listen to her we are reminded very much of that dear old worker, Mrs. Colby Luther, and perhaps the restless spirit of Thomas Paine is still in the work of reform. It looks to a close observer as though there is no stopping this mighty wave of religious reform, instituted and forged ahead by forces unseen. As soon as an old worker drops out of earthly existence and we have cried a little and wiped our eyes, another young, brainy, still more highly inspired and more forceful springs into the place and the work goes surging on. It seems so in this particular day and age.

Lucinda B. Chandler's cheerful face is always a welcome one among the younger workers.

We were surprised to see the face of the old-time worker, Dr. Juliet Severance in our audiences, as we had heard of her being very ill but a short time ago. She is still on deck.

Mrs. Cooley sacrificed another engagement to respond to the call of our State Association, and be with her beloved home folks on this occasion. She can always be depended upon, and after taking a little rest and doing some work on the side hereabouts she is to appear upon the St. Louis platform with Brother Grimshaw and others at the 59th Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, under the auspices of the First Spiritual Church, of St. Louis. She was the happy recipient of two elegant bouquets from her sincere admirers, during the convention.

Brother Hammond, of Rockford, the indomitable worker and general good fellow was at his post in every meeting.

Judge D. L. Jones, of Waukegan, was noticed in our audience upon one or two occasions, as was Dr. H. V. Sweringen, of Fort Wayne, Ind.

Every medium on the platform did clean and creditable work, and deserve not only the highest praise for their kindness, but the good square endorsement of the State association. Always ready to respond to the call and work faithfully in every capacity. They are certainly outgrowing jealousy and backbiting, and uniting their forces for the greater good of the whole humanity.

As a token of the sweet respect held by the people in attendance a beautiful bouquet was publicly presented to Mrs. Carrie Crawford Pierce at the Thursday evening services. It was a beauty, and every flower seemed to smile up at her in supreme gladness at being privileged to linger on the arm of our favorite little mocking-bird singer. It was a soul to soul greeting.

BEFORE THE FOX SISTERS.

A Veteran of Eighty-three Conversed With Spirits at an Early Day.

It may interest some of your readers to learn of spirit return before the Fox Sisters. I am 83 years old, and when a boy saw two spirits and talked to them face to face. My father died eleven weeks before I was born. My mother was a widow over four years, with a small family to support, and she married a man to help her along. Things went well for a time, but my step-father had a quarrel with me. Perahaps I was not a good boy, and needed correction. I took the matter to heart, and grieved a good deal. I slept in the third story with my brother older than I, and I got out of bed and came down stairs, and kneeling before the fire, with my head on a chair, cried in my trouble. Then all at once I heard a voice saying: "George, what are you crying for?" I looked up and saw two spirits, one on each side of me. I told them my father beat me, meaning my step-father. They said: "Be a good boy and go to bed, and if he beats you any more, tell him I will come to him." Then I arose and walked across the floor to the stairs, one spirit on each side of me. They saw me go upstairs to bed, and then left me. At this time I was not seven years of age.

I believe spirits do return and talk with mortals. I knew nothing of Spiritualism at that time, but since then I have learned a good deal about it. G. L. WATSON.

IN MEMORIAM.

Lines to Our Arisen Workers; Read by the Author at Memorial Services of the Convention.

Let us bow our heads in silence and in kindly thought for those Who have fought their earthly battles ever bravely to a close;
Let us wait our blessings to them, in their homes of well-earned bliss;
Let us speak to them in spirit, and throw each a loving kiss.

We shall miss them in their places for a long and lonely while;
We shall miss their words of wisdom and their kindly soulful smile;
But to honor their devotion to the Cause of Truth and Right,
We should buckle on the armor and press on into the fight.

If they had a fault or failing let it pass along with them;
And take time for introspection, never stopping to condemn,
And the faults THEY left behind them in the memory of earth,
Will look smaller, and their goodness will attain a greater worth.

In the onrush of the future, in the changes yet to be,
When our work on earth is finished, and our spirits are set free,
We shall meet in deeper friendship all our loved ones, higher grown,
In a loyal love reunion, ever clinging to our own.

As these workers pass before us to a land we cannot see;
With their pains and ills behind them and their spirits floating free;
When we see their fruitful labor and we know their real worth,
For a long time we shall miss them in their places on the earth.

But instead of woe and weeping, and instead of solemn song,
We must all be up and doing to help push the Cause along,
And upon the side of spirit they will grasp the thread again
Where on earth they had to drop it, and work on for fellowmen.

We will often hear the echo of their voices from the spheres,
And will catch their words of wisdom rolling down the coming years,
And our high appreciation will be wafted to them there,
As they gain and hand back to us gems of thought and visions rare.

In Memoriam let us pause to honor all arisen friends;
To send a thought of love to them, where love all else transcends,
And make them know the high esteem we hold for them on earth,
While angels welcome them beyond the gates in higher birth.

VARIOUS OPINIONS.

Columbian Students' Views on God.

The editor of the New York Commercial, as an introduction to some pertinent remarks on the mission of D. Torrey and Alexander, said:

"We are living in a striking age from whatever aspect considered. An age of decadent creeds and changing standards."

A living illustration of this fact is made manifest by the daily investigations and refutation of what was once considered as "ultimate truths."

The existence of a Deity is not exempt from this inquiry as the following will show:

The faith of a class of students in the Columbia University, New York City, was put to a test not long ago, according to the newspapers, by the propounding of the following questions:

1.—Do you conceive of God as a personal or impersonal being?

2.—What difference do you make between a personal and impersonal being?

3.—Under what image or images do you think of God?

4.—What difference would the non-existence of God make in your daily life?

Out of the forty-five students in the class only sixteen conceived God at all. Few of them took the trouble to capitalize the pronouns as is customary with writers referring to the deity and the pope of Rome.

1.—Thirteen of the young men said it would not make the least bit of difference in their daily lives if they had never heard of God. Some thought the universe could hardly be kept moving without some sort of a deity, and consented to believe there was a supervising deity.

2.—One bright young fellow was candid enough to say that the word God suggested no image, while admitting there was probably such a being in existence; if God did not exist he should "feel a greater responsibility for his acts, and have a greater fear of doing wrong." That is a reasonable view to take. If God made us, we do as he designed and he is responsible for our conduct, while if the contrary is the fact, and a man is what he makes himself, he cannot afford to discredit his own workmanship by doing wrong.

3.—A junior replied that when a child he was taught to conceive of God as a large man wearing a white robe, but that conception being no longer possible he had no clear ideas about him. Another had a notion of a "controlling force," though he seriously objected to calling it God because that word is connected with religious worship.

4.—Altogether, the young men of the class examined do not appear to be ardent theists. The teaching they have received regarding God has left their minds in a more or less of a muddle, with slight prospects of clarifying. Age and observation will not bring them further knowledge on the subject. No manly searching can find out God, he can only find out new words or combinations of words by which to express his ignorance of the matter.

"What mortals think they know of God
A thousand times rehearse;
What mortals do not know of God
Fills all the universe."

The above answer shows a tendency towards atheism by the students of our great educational institutions and goes to prove that man by nature is an atheist as Wesley maintained. In Wesley's sermons, vol. II, p. 309, we find the following:

"After all that has been so plausibly written concerning the 'innate idea of God;' after all that has been said of its being common to all men in all ages and nations, it does not appear that man has naturally any more idea of God than any of the beasts of the field. He has no knowledge of God at all; neither is God in all his thoughts. Whatever change may afterward be wrought (whether by the grace of God, or by his own reflection, or by education) he is, by nature, a mere atheist." A. BELL.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE GREAT WORK THE CONSTRUCTIVE PRINCIPLES OF NATURE IN INDIVIDUAL LIFE.

Vol. III of the Harmonic Series—by the Author of The Great Psychological Crime—Text work of The School of Natural Science—and vital addition to the Philosophy of Individual Life. Over 425 pages—beautifully bound in silk cloth and gold. Price $2.00.

This much anticipated and long delayed work of Exact Science, Psychical Research and Moral Philosophy marks a crucial period in the Extension Work of the Great School, and opens an entirely new and impressive theme to its Students, Investigators and Critics.

THE GREAT WORK is an exhaustive exposition of The Constructive Principle of Nature in Individual life, covering the Ethical Section of the Scientific Formulary for Independent Spiritual Self-Development, with an explanation of the "Technical Work" and of certain subsidiary Disciplines and Exercises.

It defines and explains the School of Natural Science and for the first time in history furnishes

THE LINEAL KEY

to its Origin, Character, Methods and Purposes.

The work nears the close with "The Mark of the Master" and a scientific analysis of "The Transition Called Death" carrying the reader to the doorway of the succeeding volume—in a final chapter entitled "The Passing of the Master"—from the plane of Earth into and beyond the dark "Magnetic Field" outward and upward through "Nature's Brilliant Barriers" into the dazzling splendor of the "Real Spiritual World."

Because of lateness of publication we are urging our friends to send Holiday Orders without delay—and to accompany them with cash payments—by P. O. or Express Orders or Bank Draft. Price, $2.

THE PATHWAY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT.

Or, the Pathway of the Spirit Traced.

By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage, 12 cents.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 35 CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 9, 1907 NO. 902

A GOD OF WRATH AND LOVE.

These Attributes Are Inharmonious and Destructive of Each Other.

"God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth his wrath for his enemies."—Isa. 1:2.

"Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it."—Isa. 13:9.

"And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord; for he is an holy God; he is a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins. If ye forsake the Lord, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good."—Josh. 24: 19, 20.

Such was the God of our fathers. Such was the God worshiped by the orthodox church for more than two thousand years, and which they are worshiping yet to-day. Is it to be wondered at that man has advanced no more than he has? Rather should we marvel that he has attained the position of eminence that he now holds.

Contrast the foregoing references with the following: "Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm; for love is strong as death; jealousy is as cruel as the grave; the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame."—Song of Solomon, 8:6. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee."—Jer. 31:3.

What a wilderness of perplexing questions and thoughts arise in our minds when we try to harmonize the qualities of wrath and love; when we attempt to endow our god with such opposing characteristics. The heathen offers up his children as a sacrifice to appease the wrath of his god. What are we to do to appease the wrath of our god? to win his favor and gain his love? Is the wrath of one god different from that of another? Although the orthodox believer has never offered his children as a burnt sacrifice, has he not consigned them to his god in almost the same spirit? When his child is suffering on the bed of affliction he offers up a little prayer, "Lord relieve my child of this affliction, if thou seest best; nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." Thus he offers his child a living sacrifice to his god, hoping that in some way it may please the deity.

How are we to harmonize a god of love with a god of jealousy, as revealed in Ex. 20:5? "Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me." How are we to associate those qualities together? They are absolutely foreign to each other. I cannot conceive of a god of love having one grain of jealousy in his nature. In man we call jealousy a "green-eyed monster." Could it be anything better in deity? Deity is complete in its nature. Every characteristic is developed to perfection. Then a god possessing the attribute of jealousy would certainly be a hideous monster beyond the conception of mortal mind. His rule would be worse than that of a tyrant, his laws worse than anarchy, and his throne worse than hell. Yet the orthodox believer has been worshiping a god which the bible tells us is a jealous god, a god of wrath, and yet a god of love and tender mercies. What a combination. Orthodoxy by representing such a god has been able to scare many into the church. By preaching the terrors of a never-ending hell of fire they have scared the love of God into their converts. There There are very few people that would ever enter the doors of a church but for the fear of a just orthodox God and a never-ending hell of fire. It is not love that has been bringing people into the church. Therefore it is man's duty, as his brother's keeper, to inquire into the nature of God and find those laws which will support a religion that will win the heart of man through love and not through fear.

Gaze upon nature in all her marvelous beauty, serenity and grandeur, and point out, if you can, one of her component parts that would indicate that a god of wrath or jealousy could have had the making of her laws. Man is a part of nature, and the same god rules over all—the God of nature, nature's God—and I can find nothing in all nature that would indicate that it is anything other than a God of love.

It goes without saying that for more than two thousand years orthodoxy has been preaching of a god which never existed, only in the minds of a few of the ancient leaders who so instilled their doctrine into the mind of man that it is only of comparatively recent years that he has even dared to pull at the cords that were binding him to a false religion. But light is dawning upon his mind as it never has before. He can no longer be held to the worshiping of an angry god and the service of a false religion. He will, and is, breaking the bonds which have bound him for ages in heathenish worship. While he has lived up to the best he knew so has the heathen. They both had a wrong conception of deity. Orthodoxy has followed as closely as the heathen their code of biblical laws, never stopping to question their authenticity, but blindly accepting every statement as an unalterable fact uttered by the mouth of God.

But as man has slowly come into closer communion with the God of nature, and the God of his own soul, he has come to realize the fact that he was mistaken in his form of worship. And true to nature, as soon as he saw his mistake he immediately sought a god which he could harmonize with his higher and broader conception of deity. Though, as yet comparatively few orthodox people have resigned allegiance to the faith, nevertheless the number is constantly increasing. They are learning to put aside the God of the ancients, the God of wrath and jealousy, and are adopting in his stead the God of the Twentieth Century, the God of Love.

Memorial Services.

Remarks by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond at the Memorial Service to Moses Hull and Jennie Hagan Brown, Held by the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, Chicago, February 21, 1907.

Perhaps the most astonishing thing about Spiritualists' memorial services is, that the ones you are talking about are the nearest to you at that time. So we shall have to be very careful about what we say about Moses Hull and Jennie this morning. They are here. While they would not restrain us from speaking every word of truth, it is certain that we would say to them face to face what we are saying now of them spirit to spirit and soul to soul.

Although engaged in the work of Spiritualism ever since your present speaker was a child of ten years of age, she did not know Moses Hull to any great extent, excepting as meeting in conventions or at public meetings, until a very few years ago. Yet there can be no two workers in the field of Spiritualism who do not know each other all the time.

The particular quality that brought Moses Hull into prominence in Spiritualism was the quality of sincerity in his convictions. He was sincere as a Campbellite preacher. It was his duty in the Second Adventist movement to know the bible from the beginning to the end. For the Adventists were a peculiar people; they had to meet other theologies on the basis of distinct argument, and as far as the Bible is concerned the Second Adventists have the advantage in this: that as a rule the Old Testament advocates the going to sleep (literal death of body and spirit) and the awakening or resurrection physically at the time of the advent of the Lord. But his was a perfect knowledge of the Bible, knowing where every text could be found; chapter by chapter, word by word, derivation by derivation, and a great deal of this was so important at the time that he came into a knowledge of this great newer truth.

You will remember that at that time, fifty years ago, or forty years ago, if a thing was not sustained by the letter of the Bible, then it could not be considered true, no matter how it was demonstrated. When he appeared upon the platform of Spiritualism it was at a time when Professor Britten, Professor Hare, Judge Edmonds, Warren Chase and a score of other old war horses had already taken up the argument in favor of Spiritualism, and it seemed then as though the advent of Moses Hull upon the Spiritualistic platform settled the theological question for once and for all.

The peculiar quality of his mind, his clearness in reasoning, his logic and education, his knowledge of the derivation of ancient Scripture was such that no scholar could meet him without feeling that he had met more than his equal. As for argument no one could stand against him. Yet because of his clearness of mind and largeness of heart there never was anyone more generous to an adversary. He never allowed himself to descend to personality. He never used the weapons of personal abuse in arguments, he always held his opponents to the highest standard of debate, and he made them for the time being almost the creatures of his will so superior was his method, his gentlemanly observance and his adherence to the line of argument under consideration.

It is perhaps in this great theological work, if it shall be found necessary in the future to bear forward this same line of controversy, that he has left the best legacy; some of his printed works in the hands of our young speakers or teachers would be invaluable, and if that great monument is to be borne forward in the work of the Morris Pratt Institute. The theological works of Moses Hull will be one of its greatest, if not its greatest, inheritance. Do not think all this controversy is over, every young life starting out in this new form of thought as teacher or speaker, beginning from the educational standpoint to bear forward the work of Spiritualism must meet similar arguments. Of course the theological lines are not drawn so closely; people have been broadening out without knowing it under the liberal interpretations of Spiritualism. Even the ministers of the most orthodox denominations have become pervaded in a great degree by the spirit of the new interpretation. But it is a most singular thing, and true, as well as beautiful, that in dropping the theology of the past Moses Hull did not drop Religion; that religion was as pervading and as essential a part of his nature as the affections of the heart and the clearness of the brain, and it was his privilege to use it on the higher and more perfect plane of the Parenthood of God and the Fraternity of the Human Race. This religion of Spiritualism was one of his greatest and most ennobling themes. He does not consider it as "catering to the old-time customs of theology," but rather that the new religion and new philosophy should have a fitting setting; that there should be a better expression for that innate thought of the worship of God and the fellowship of mankind.

So he established within the last thirty years a counter current. We mean to say that he educated the Spiritualists to value the Bible; in all that it contained of spiritual truth. We mean, that instead of atheism and entire skepticism concerning the inspiration of past time, he regulated the thoughts of Spiritualists, as well as the thoughts of the outside people who were against Spiritualism. Your present speaker in co-working with him for the last ten, fifteen or twenty years has found that he had a sincere, logical and successful basis for the great religious truth of Spiritualism, that finds a corresponding statement in all the religions of the world.

There are more people among Spiritualists to-day who accept the truths of Spiritualism that are contained in the Bible, than there were twenty-five or thirty years ago. This is largely owing to the great religious element that Moses Hull brought into this discussion in connection with Spiritual Truth. Not only was he able to meet the theologians in discussion, but to lay bare that portion of the Bible that was fallacious, and restore to it and the Scriptures of every age their real Spiritualism, and the real foundation of their inspiration. And he wished to see among the Spiritualists of this country a fraternity of religious observance that would in turn give to the world the flowering out of the religions and philosophy of every age. And that, in our view, is what the Morris Pratt Institute, under the presidency of Moses Hull stood for.

When Morris Pratt, in his mind, planned the Institution, it was not only to be an institution that was to be equal to any in its departments of science and belles lettres, but there should be a distinctive expression, which Dr. Warne referred to, in a psychic department, of especial instruction along the line of higher criticism in connection with theology and true religion in connection with the manifestations of truth to the world. And if, as Dr. Burgess has suggested, you desire to express your appreciation of the work of Moses Hull, you will not build a monument, but you will not let a day nor an hour pass without making known your wishes by contributing to the bearing forward of the living work to which his life was dedicated and particularly his later work in the Morris Pratt Institute.

President Harper of the Chicago University could go down to New York, or wherever the president of the Standard Oil Company might be, and get a million or two dollars for the university at any time. But it is not every president of a college who (nominally) has a salary that he is obliged to go out and earn it, almost every cent of which he turns into the college of which he is president, and that is what Moses Hull did, and Mattie. They went forth on their missionary work for Spiritualism and the Morris Pratt Institute, having only their daily bread, and not even taking this from the funds they gathered up for the college. And Professor Weaver has done many similar things. So well do we all know if there is the light of Spiritualism shed from the institution that shall bear forward the name and work of Moses Hull, it will be the best monument that you can make to his memory.

In personal association in these later years with Mr. Hull there has been the sweetness of social life, there has been a breadth of kindly charity, there has been a loving tribute to all his co-workers. It was not stubbornness, your present speaker thinks, that prevented him from publicly condemning a medium, he could not do it from any personal knowledge, and he would not do it on that which proceeded from hearsay. Your present speaker in working with and consulting with him never heard him say a word against any human being. However much he might criticise the theologies of the controversialists, however much he might differ in opinion with any one, he never made it a personal matter. It was this breadth of loving-kindness that may have prevented him from speaking many times even when it was thought that, perhaps, the cause might have required it. The very fact that he drew upon himself the brunt of opposition in the past years, never making any explanation was rather due to the chivalry and kindness of his heart than to the tenacity and stubbornness of opinion or attitude.

But in him ever was the staunch loyalty in his love of truth and its advocacy, as he saw it, and triumphant as the champion of that truth, wielding sledge-hammer arguments of logic that no one could confront, and still, withal, there was the gentleness of a child and a sweetness of disposition that made him ever at the fireside a beloved man. Adored by his daughters, his children and his grandchildren. When Mrs. Niver, whom Dr. Warne has mentioned, was speaking of him and the possibility of his passing out at any time, the tears in her eyes and the quivering of her lips testified to the great affection of her heart. Hers is a work of art, because without exception we regard her as the finest teacher of oratory we ever heard, not excepting Prof. Emerson, the founder of the Emerson School of Oratory in Boston. Her work in the Morris Pratt Institute cannot be overestimated.

These loving tributes from one's household, and the tender value of him by all these loving friends, make us know that the work and words, and the heart and religion of the one we have memorialized will not only live year after year, but will grow broader as the years go on; that out of the great altar-fires that he has kindled will come a flame that will in time illumine the world.

We are each bearing our part in this great work. But let us remember that not one of us could either do the work of another or take that work from the work in which we are all engaged without marring the perfect structure and fabric that the founders of Spiritualism in the spirit world have desired to see. Therefore, it is with the greatest pleasure and the most appreciative loving-kindness that we hail this moment to pay tribute to the work and life of our arisen brother, Moses Hull.

Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown.

Jennie Hagan was a flower of New England, like the sweet, lowly flowers, the trailing arbutus, that come up on the cold rocks of Plymouth. She, as many another, was a distinctive product of Spiritualism, as no other religion in the world takes young children, especially young girls, out of the district schools, out of factories and makes them eloquent speakers and clear poets on the platform. Jennie Hagan was one of these. Taken out of the simplest life and brought forward by distinct inspiration. Spiritualism has produced many of these, as the one standing before you, who though entering into the work earlier than Jennie Hagan Brown, nevertheless, has met her at many times and places.

The peculiar quality of Jennie's life and character was strangely in contrast to that of Moses Hull, so much so that it seems almost impossible to couple them together. Yet such is the universality of Spiritualism, which is adapted to the needs of every person, that this young girl not only found a place, but her work was a needed place in the ranks of Spiritualism, which will not only be greatly missed, but will not soon be forgotten.

She was personally a most joyous nature, full of fun and laughter, in fact, some people thought she was altogether too mirthful. When we met we always had a most joyous time joking and laughing, and she was full of stories of her laughable experiences. When inspired there was a strain of sympathy and beauty in her poetic thought which was particularly good.

It was our privilege to be on the ocean together when your speaker went to London in 1898 to attend the World Conference of Spiritualists as representative of the National Spiritualists' Association. Mrs. Brown went as a representative from Fort Worth, Texas, where she had built up a fine society which under her ministrations, built a beautiful temple, which we assisted in dedicating. Dr. Peebles, J. J. Morse and other Spiritualists were also on board the same ship. Some were indisposed, but Jennie was always bright; she and Mr. Richmond and ourself were always joking with each other, and we had no end of fun. "Fra Elbertus" was also on board, being an acquaintance of ours, he soon had an invitation from the officers of the ship and the passengers for your present speaker to speak. Of course, the others were invited to participate, so we had a regular Spiritualistic meeting, which was much enjoyed by all on board the ship who were present.

She was ever ready and willing to work, and, as Mrs. Severance says, she was just as ready to play.

Between these strong and pleasant personalities that we all met frequently in their work we will remember all the days of our lives. We speak of the young when they go saying, "Oh, they are too young to go, they are not ready to go." It is not our province to say when people should go. They are always ready for the next step of life, and they knew where they were going.

Now our sympathy is going out to the lone man away down in Texas. He will not find her on the ranch. Friends give him your sympathy, and to all in the home that was hers. Her earthly mother who was with her so many years, and those of her household who have gone before, all welcome her now. None the less will her voice and her presence cheer the workers on in this triumphant cause of Spiritualism.

Sometimes when we were together there came a mutual inspiration and the poems would be given in alternate verses. Will you try to open your spiritual visions now and see her standing there? While this same voice will have to give her part of the poem, remember that the alternate verses of this poem will be given by Jennie or her inspirer. She is standing there, right there, in all the radiant light of her new found existence.

Sister, since unto that realm you have passed,
How have you found it in that state unseen,
That you saw here as through a magic glass,
When the inspiration to you had been
Vouchsafed, and you knew the blessed love
Of those within the heaven above?

"I make answer," she says, "I have found the light
As it has been revealed unto me,
More and more beautiful in the sight
Of the awakening to eternity.
Oh! in blessed answer to my prayer,
The first whom I saw was my dear mother there."

And as the new morning upon you doth glow
Now in the great light of the spirit above,
And having met those whom you loved below,—
For they now within your presence must move—
Shall you now, as then, help those on the earth
To a knowledge of the higher birth?

"Oh, yes! though I follow as a little child,
Until I shall grow larger in the pure light,
Still my teachers are both wise and mild,
And they will reveal more unto my sight;
Newer visions of higher thought and powers
Than ever came in my earthly hours."

Then will you be able to lead by the hand
The one whom you have left here on the earth?
And will your friends, at your love's command,
Receive that knowledge of the higher birth?
Will the Great Cause still win you on and on,
That you the earth may shed more light upon?

"Oh, yes! With all my heart and mind at command
I will bless and care for him below,
I will speak to the friends abroad o'er the land,
To those whom I must already know.
And I will receive my power from above;
And consecrate unto the highest good
This message of the heavenly love,
That it shall be more and more understood."

Now on behalf of her, I give you her thanks for your recognition of her here. But in the light of the thought that we almost live more and more in that heavenly sphere, let this tribute of love in this morning hour but augment our interest and power until we, like them, shall become as those among the hosts of God's workers there who never see the gateways of death, but LIFE, the life that is everywhere.

Sacred are the lips from which has issued only truth. Over all wealth, above all station, above the noble—the robed and crowned—rises the sincere man. Happy is the man who neither paints nor patches, veils nor veneers! Blessed is he who wears no mask!—Ingersoll.

There would be more happiness in the world if we would rejoice more with others instead of feigning sympathy with their sorrows.—Max Bower.

INTERESTING QUESTION.

What Is a Spirit's Experience Immediately After Transition?

To the Editor:—Some two weeks ago there appeared in your columns an inquiry something like the above from a correspondent from Washington, wanting to know what a spirit's experience was immediately after leaving the body. I can see no better way of answering such a question than by giving your readers quite an interesting experience that occurred about one year ago in my own household.

Living about four miles from our city was quite an aged gentleman, who was a Spiritualist and an old time friend of the writer of this. He fell ill and continued to grow worse until finally the end came. About eight o'clock on the evening of his transition I telephoned the family to know about his condition, and received the reply that he was unconscious and liable to pass away at any moment, which he did shortly after nine o'clock the same evening, or something over an hour after receiving the message. I had visited this gentleman and family and held circles with them, consequently my guide was familiar with the place and surroundings. Soon after receiving the message as above stated, I retired for the night, but before doing so requested my guide to go and visit the sick bed of my friend, and if he passed away before morning to let me know if possible. It was half-past eight o'clock when I retired, and being somewhat weary from my day's experiences, I soon fell into a slumber.

At midnight, as it proved to be, I awoke. My guide requested me to arise and get paper and pencil as she wished to give me a test. I arose, and striking a light I put on my clothes, and going into an adjoining room that I might not disturb my wife, I sat down at a table after procuring paper and pencil, and the following is what was written through my hand:

Mr. Predmore, your friend T—'s transition has taken place. I entered the room where his physical body lay upon the bed a few minutes after his transition. His spiritual body stood at the bedside looking intently at his body of clay. I placed my hand upon his shoulder and accosted him thus: "This is Mr. T—— I believe?"

"No," he replied, "that is Mr. T—— on the bed there.

"No," I said, "that is your body of flesh, but you are the real Mr. T——. Your body is dead."

"No it isn't," he replied. "That is me on the bed there."

"Come with me to a glass here, my friend," I said, "and see if I am not right."

I led the way to a mirror in an adjoining room, and pointing to it I said, "Look in there, my friend, and see for yourself."

He gazed at the reflection of his face for a moment, and then exclaimed: "Well, I declare. I believe you are right. Who'd a thought it?"

I remained for a short time and soon spirit friends made their appearance and I left him in their charge.

I retired again after getting this message, and the next morning read it to my wife and a young man who was in my employ. We sat down to our morning meal and soon the telephone bell rang while we were yet eating, and the message informed me that my old friend had been released from his physical body soon after nine o'clock the evening before. It seems that the above incident should partially answer the question of your correspondent at least. A body that has naturally rounded out life to a good old age, in my opinion scarcely realizes the change, so natural it is, until circumstances occur which apprise them of the fact, and usually if not always spirit friends awaken the new-born soul to full consciousness.

Broken Bow, Neb.

Rev. Moses Hull, and His Departure to Spirit Life.

Whereas, One of the great leaders in the cause of Spiritualism, in the person of Moses Hull, president of the Morris Pratt Institute of Whitewater, Wis., and the most distinguished exegete of the Bible from the spiritual point of view, took leave of earth on Friday, Jan. 11, 1907, and

Whereas, Spiritualism and Spiritualists alike having met with an irreparable loss in the departure of Brother Hull, because of his widely extended labors in defense of the former and instruction of the latter, and,

Whereas, We, the members of the board of trustees of the Washington State Spiritualist Association, have been called upon to part with a personal friend, as well as leader and teacher, likewise zealous advocate of organization and the principles of co-operation, in the transition of our distinguished brother, be it, therefore,

Resolved, That we, the representatives of the Washington State Spiritualist Association have heard of the departure from this life of our gifted brother, Moses Hull, with profound sorrow and regret, yet rejoice with him in his signal triumph over seeming death and the grave, likewise in his new-found freedom in the realm of the soul.

Resolved, That our sincerest sympathy is hereby extended to the members of his family in their grief over their great loss, reminding them that their sorrow is the sorrow of their brethren everywhere, all of whom have in common the comforting assurances of Spiritualism to soften the force of the blow that has fallen upon them, feeling assured that those nearest and dearest to the arisen one will also be helped by our sunny gospel of the ministry of the angels.

Resolved, That we extend greetings in spirit to our brother as he takes up his work anew in the spheres unseen, and assure him that his labors for the enlightenment of our race shall not be forgotten, nor allowed to become as void from his exchange of worlds.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread in full upon our minutes, and certified copies, under the seal of our state association, be forwarded to his bereaved wife and children.

TRAVELING IN SPIRIT.

Some Interesting Experiences in Connection With the Death of Moses Hull.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley was a guest in my home during her stay in Buffalo. She is indeed a wonderful woman; space and distance are no impediments to this highly developed soul, and we had constant proof of being surrounded by unseen forces.

What, to me, seemed one of her most wonderful experiences, was in connection with the burial of Moses Hull.

We had heard of his transition, and she had spoken of it, and wondered where he would be buried. During the conversation Mrs. Cooley expressed the thought as to whether his remains would be brought to his home at Whitewater, Wis., and she wrote a letter of sympathy to his wife, saying it would get there about the time of their home coming. Our conversation on this subject was not resumed until later, when Mrs. Cooley came from her room where she had been resting, and said, "Moses Hull's funeral has just taken place."

She then related an experience, in which she claimed she left her present surroundings and found herself in a larger room, or what might be taken for a small hall, and there she saw a coffin which contained Moses Hull's body. Mattie, his wife, was standing beside it, talking to a company of people, saying, "Moses looks just as though he is asleep." Mattie was in a white garment, but a vapor of finer white substance, or ether, surrounded her entire form.

Mrs. Cooley went into full details and said, "Let us watch for a report of his funeral and see if it agrees with this experience."

In the meantime we related the experience to several, but no one had heard of the burial; but the following week's paper brought us the news which corroborated Mrs. Cooley's statement in every respect—the day and hour was exact, allowing for the difference in time between New York and California.

Mrs. Cooley informed me that she had had many such experiences, and to her it seemed but little; to me it savored of greatness of soul development, and taught me that time and space were of little consequence to spirit, and that it is beautiful to have a splendidly developed mediumship, such as this woman possessed, but still more beautiful to be as well rounded out in soul as she must be to be able to visit places miles away from her house of clay. While I think Mrs. Cooley one of the most sensitive persons I ever met, at times speaking one's very thoughts for them, yet she is also one of the most practical mediums I have ever met. Her sense of justice to others is very keen. She requires no petting; never seems to be slighted; cares nothing for flattery, and is ever ready to work in any way to advance the cause of Spiritualism and the society she has charge of.

Suffice it to say, this worker makes hosts of friends and holds them.

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND SEVEN.

There's a wonderful work for the people to do,
In nineteen hundred and seven;
A work needing hands that are willing and true,
In nineteen hundred and seven.
'Tis time for the people to carry the day,
And control greedy trusts in their despotic sway,
And sweep down the barriers that stand in the way,
In nineteen hundred and seven.

There's need of great men to stand forth from the ranks,
In nineteen hundred and seven,
To help Uncle Sam watch the railroads and banks,
In nineteen hundred and seven.
The great money steal that has put us in thrall,
Must let go its grip and go back to the wall,
For the interest of one is the interest of all,
In nineteen hundred and seven.

Religion has come to be naught but a name,
In nineteen hundred and seven;
The priests are in league with the millionaire's game,
In nineteen hundred and seven;
And brave men and women must work with their might,
In church and in state, to illumine the right,
And clear out the mists that have clouded our sight,
In nineteen hundred and seven.

There's much to be done in the Spiritualists' ranks;
In nineteen hundred and seven,
To drive out the frauds, to discourage the cranks,
In nineteen hundred and seven.
There's great need of those who care much for their brothers,
And will sacrifice self in their efforts for others,
And stand firm for justice e'en though 'tis another's,
In nineteen hundred and seven.

The churches are banding, their strength to uphold,
In nineteen hundred and seven;
Their members are giving their silver and gold,
In nineteen hundred and seven;
And unless you look sharp, they'll steal all your thunder,
And legislate laws that will tear you asunder,
And when 'tis too late you will wake to your blunder,
In nineteen hundred and seven.

We must get up and hustle and work with a will,
In nineteen hundred and seven,
For we've only just dug 'round the foot of the hill,
Up to nineteen hundred and seven.
There are heights to be climbed that are gleaming with light,
That now are obscured from our dim earthly sight;
For truth and the right let us work with our might,
In nineteen hundred and seven.

TOLERANCE OF OPINION.

One Answer to "An Honest Question."

Let us begin with the statement after the question, and work up. The writer says: "It seems just that adverse criticism be allowed to do service and show the ancient faiths are not worthy of acceptance in these wiser times."

These times undoubtedly are wiser, but not everyone living in them is wiser. Being in different stages of growth, each needs different treatment. For instance, babies are not fed with solid food before teeth are grown to help digest it; a foreigner is not expected to read or speak our language until he has studied or learned it; to some a "Primrose by the river's brink" is only a primrose—nothing more. Not all individuals are ready for advanced conditions; and growth, to be sure, is usually slow. So the time has not arrived yet for ancient faiths to be wholly discarded.

Now about the "Bible being thrust upon us as the inspired word of God."

The Bible to many Spiritualists in these times is considered a history, written by men inspired, perhaps, as men are now, and colored more or less by the writer's conceptions, containing errors and truths. It has been revised and modernized so much that it is very readable now. The work of great fraternities such as Freemasons and Odd Fellows is based, we have been told on Bible history. That certainly will help perpetuate the Bible. As for characters described in it, some of them might have been mediums. Would it not be surprising were they not?

"Fictitious characters"? Perhaps, but they serve a purpose. And, as for "speakers and writers laboring to make Spiritualism an appendage of ecclesiasticism," we think this a mistaken idea. We are all reaching out, reaching higher, for something good, something better than we know or have. We read for enlightenment. Whether we find a good thought in The Progressive Thinker, or the Bible, it matters not, as long as we get the good thought, absorb it and become better for it.

Some of us have learned the lesson of tolerance. We do not go about telling ecclesiastics their teachings are false. We shall not get hearers to turn the currents of their thoughts into new channels by vituperating and antagonizing their beliefs. Nothing is gained for the cause of Spiritualism or any philosophy or religion by rash speech. People must think new things to outgrow old opinions, and their attention first is necessary.

Spiritualism doesn't need "flummery of the church" to advance it. (We infer church ceremony is meant by flummery). But we need order, organization and love for humanity. Certainly attractive methods of conducting the work, and attractive surroundings give dignity and beauty, and "like attracts like."

When a Spiritualist says "I believe," it is usually knowledge to him, but it isn't knowledge to one having no proof or experience. Concise definitions or brief explanations of the religion and the philosophy are often required, and until a better substitute can be found, will not "I believe" answer? It cannot, of course, take the place of knowledge, and "in doing good for the love of it." Lowell says:

"Not what we give, but what we share,
For the gift without the giver is bare."

And again:

"That is no true alms which the hand can hold,
He gives nothing but worthless gold
Who gives from a sense of duty."

Because certain methods are employed by some of our speakers (methods we do not like) it isn't necessary to break up a society through selfishness on our part. How or when the truth is presented is not of so much importance as to get the truth.

They Compromised.

A late news dispatch from San Francisco, says:

"Jesus Christ, and all other sacred names that invest prayer with the tinge of Gentile sectarianism, are to be hereafter omitted by Chaplain Darling, of the State Senate. Since Rev. Darling has been delivering opening invocations in the upper house, he has been having much trouble.

"First the Democratic minority took exception to the Chaplain's appeal for a blessing on the victors in the late elections. Then Senators Wolf and Hartman, Hebrews, who are prominent, waited on the chaplain with objection to his mentioning Jesus Christ. The chaplain compromised by agreeing to refer hereafter to 'Our Lord' without designating him by name."

TO WINIFRED.

I have had a dream of heaven, dear,
For I have dreamed of you,
And now my soul is all aflame
To know it to be true.

Entranced I gazed at your beautiful face,
Crowned with raven-black hair,
And holding your perfect form in my arms
I found my heaven there.

Your lips so sweet, that it thrilled my soul
When you pressed them close to mine,
And in the depths of your big black eyes
Shone the light of a love divine.

Your voice like music soft and low,
Bewitched my listening ears,
As you told the story of your love for me,
And I banished all my fears.

You said that, welded soul to soul,
To greater glories we should ascend,
To our beautiful home in the summerland
Where our lives and love would never end.

If this be naught but an idle dream,
May I never awaken the truth to learn,
For another life without you, love,
For me has no concern.

NEW RELIGION IS SEEN.

University of Chicago Professor Predicts the "Laboratory" Variety—Hits Old-Style Standard—Builds Up Creed With Unselfishness, Service and Communion as Its Points.

"Laboratory religion" will be the religion of the future, according to Professor John Merle Coulter, head of the University of Chicago botany department.

In an address on "Personal Religion" at the opening meeting of the university revival services last night at Mandel Hall Professor Coulter declared that religious ideas must conform to the principles of the scientific laboratory instead of the old-fashioned standards.

"There is no possible reason why the modern laboratory methods of education should not be used in religion as well as in the classroom," he said. "In Religion we have the same general materials as in science, and we should make our adjustments accordingly.

"I have built up a creed by this method. The three points in it are unselfishness, service and communion. The problem is a clear one—to live the most effective life. We must adjust ourselves to other conditions scientifically, and the three most important things are one's self, one's fellowmen and one's God.'

Best Relation Is Service.

"It is the centrifugal life that is effective. The best relation with our fellowmen is one of service, and you cannot render this without unselfishness."

"Society is characterized at present by an instability of ethical standards," said President-elect Judson in speaking to the students. "Men do not look deeply into themselves or find the basis of conduct upon which they can rest. It is said this is because the old foundations of religious experience—fear and hope—have been given up. I think, however, that we have adapted these elements in a different way.

"We need not learn to fear a specific and real evil that may come to us in regard to the future life, but a new conception of evil working in our souls. And we need not learn to hope for the same very definite thing in regard to the future life, but for a joy beyond painting and past imagining.

Says Religion Is Anchor.

"Why should one try to imagine the exact conditions of the future life? Personally, I do not care to know. But no human soul without the reality of personal religion is safe. It is the anchor, and without the anchor no one can be safe."

Professor George E. Vincent, Professor Shaler Mathews and Professor Myra Reynolds also spoke.

Students tend to grow away from the religious life," said Professor Vincent. "The religious life is the all-inclusive life. Students of modern psychology have unfolded to us a great deal in the teachings of Christ that formerly appeared mysterious and cryptic. Taking Christ as one's dominant comrade is one of the chief things in personal religion."

POVERTY.

A grimy-handed monster,
Like gnarled and knotted tree,
Doth lurk about the homestead,
A source of grief to be.

Like moisture from the rain-clouds,
It creeps in with a chill,
Depressing every inmate,
Foreboding naught but ill.

At first with snaky smoothness,
It winds itself about,
The luxuries of home-life,
And lastly eats them out.

Not yet therewith contented,
But like a beast athirst,
And like a wolf an-hungered,
It seeks to do its worst.

Among its train of followers,
Foul enemies of Peace,
Are Worry, Grief and Hunger—
Whose torments never cease.

So oft you see the mother,
Whose heart is first to feel
The cravings of her children,
In prayer about to kneel.

'Tis not for wealth she's asking,
But food and shelter for
The children of her bosom;
Her very soul they are.

A tell-tale streak of pallor,
Shows on her cheek so wan;
With Love for her commander,
She girds her armor on,

And flinches not at duty,
Though life is ebbing fast;
But feeble strength is conquered,
By Sacrifice at last.

The father worn and weary,
Takes up her burdens now;
With no one left to comfort,
And soothe his aching brow.

The home without a mother,
Is robbed of sweetest joy;
And happiest hour within it,
Is not without alloy.

Each morn comes cruel Mis'ry,
Each noon comes awful Woe;
At nightfall comes Dejection,
Each calling to bestow,

Their gifts in horns of plenty,
To home where tears are shed,
And song of happy children,
Is changed to cry for bread.

One piercing thrust unmentioned,
Hurts deeper still than all;
When Wealth for paltry farthing,
Doth make him creep and crawl,

Lest roof be taken from him,
And humble home destroyed;
The only earthly refuge,
That his weary soul enjoyed.

O hasten, Christian Era,
And lend a helping hand,
To suffering humanity,
So plenteous in our land!

Canst thou not summon power,
From holy land above,
To teach Earth's wayward children,
To drink from fount of love?

Each draught of which will freshen,
Uplift each drooping flower;
That hath the right to blossom,
And praise its birthday hour.

Canst thou not summon justice,
From Rip Van Winkle bed?
Doth seem as though he's sleeping,
In hearts of ancient dead.

And may his true endeavors,
By heavenly band be led
And wreath of right be woven,
To deck America's head.

Then she, most glorious nation,
Will lead out in the right,
And emanate to kingdoms,
A flood of "Kindly Light."

And "Kindly Light" a blessing,
To all posterity,
Will bring about conditions,
To hurl out Poverty.

Spiritualism and the State of the Dead.

Dr. J. M. Peebles in Calcutta, India, Lecturing on Spiritualism.

Dr. J. M. Peebles, the celebrated Spiritualist of America, delivered his third public lecture in Calcutta on Friday evening, at the Star Theatre. The subject of his lecture was "Spiritualism and the State of the Dead." The meeting was attended by a large number of educated and thinking people, both European and Indian. Amongst those present we noticed Roy Yatindra Nath Chowdhuri, Babus Moti Lal Ghose, Hirendra Nath Dutt, Monmotho Mohan Bose, Pundit Jwala Dutt Joshi of Allahabad, Mr. P. N. Mukerjee, Dr. Chandra Shekhar Kali, Babus Hemendra Nath Sen, Amrita Krishna Mullick, Mr. and Mrs. Armitage and a large number of European ladies and gentlemen.

Mr. N. N. Ghose who was voted to the chair, in a neat little speech introduced the speaker of the evening. He said that Dr. Peebles was well known in the Western world as a speaker and writer on matters connected with Spiritualism. He was a medical man, liberal in politics, and a profound scholar. The subject of the speech was one of surpassing interest. The question, he said, "What became of us after death?" had been agitating the public mind from the earliest day to the present time. Spiritualism, according to him, was a matter capable to be demonstrated like chemistry. He then asked Dr. Peebles to deliver his lecture.

The lecturer, before he began to speak on the subject of the evening, said that he was glad to find Spiritualism had found a place in Indian mind and that books and pamphlets on this subject were being published here. Referring to the Hindu Spiritual Magazine, the speaker said that it should be widely circulated, for it aimed at illustrating the phenomenon of truth and Spiritualism. It would enlarge the mind and extend human ideas.

He then began his subject.

He said, an old Christian hymn began with these words:

"And was I born to die
And lay this body down"?

No! man was not born to die. And man, essential man, the Spirit, the Atma, does not die. It cannot die being a potentialized portion of God, who is "Spirit" pure, infinite, omnipotent and immutable. Man is a reasoning and a spiritual being and it is natural, whether in worlds visible or invisible, for spiritual beings to communicate with one another. This they have done at times through all past ages. Spiritual phenomena are God's abiding witnesses of a future life. If you have not seen them it is your misfortune. I have, and so have millions. And these are blessed beyond all blessings, because they know that death is but a new birth with better conditions for progress.

Spiritualism is not atheism, not materialism, not agnosticism, not sectarianism, not a negation of any kind, but an affirmation with demonstrations that prove the truths of its teachings.

It does not rely upon Bibles that have been translated and re-translated—revised and re-revised for its proofs, but upon the inspirations and well-attested phenomena of to-day, for its authority as a science—and as a religion.

Reading about bread does not feed the hungry to-day. Reading about Spiritual manifestations, visions, trances, levitations, materializations, and spirit voices of the long past proving that the dead are alive, does not satisfy you. No! you want to see for yourselves, know for yourselves in your own homes. Very well, this you may do, if you will comply with the causes and conditions. If you wish to send telegraphic messages to friends in Bombay you must have the telegraphic instrument and the metallic wire. These are the conditions. And these, or similar ones, must be complied with in Spiritualism.

There are priests in all lands who seem to want something for nothing, wealth without labor and scholarship without study. These are mental vampires. All honorable and exalted positions in life are attained only through concentration, purpose, labor and struggles. You are all influenced more or less by invisible intelligences, and nearly all of you by complying with the proper conditions may become clairvoyant, clairaudient, clairsentient, have visions, or be entranced, enabling you to hold conscious converse with your departed loved ones. What can be more blessed?

Objective spirit phenomena are indispensable to those who need them. This is an age of materialism, and there are atheistic materialists so flinty-brained that they require thunder-claps to convince them of the presence and potency of spiritual beings. These should and can be gratified by forming seance-circles and complying with the psychic requirement necessary for spiritual intercourse.

Spiritualism demonstrates a future life. The pronounced dead are alive, and in the process of dying, the more spiritually-minded do not for a moment become unconscious. They sweetly swoon into immortality, there is no death—only change—disorganization of the material elements and reorganization. The spirit is not an aggregate, but an indivisible unit. It does not—can not die. It is of God.

"What" —is it further asked—"is the atma, the conscious spirit?" It is a divine centre of life—of a dazzling point of conscious force, God incarnate. And hence we are wisely called the "offspring of God," and the "sons of God."

"And where," says one, "is the spirit located, for what exists must exist somewhere."

Certainly it is not located in the heel, the stomach or solar plexus, but in the brain. The erudite Des Cartes located it in the conarium, a delicate cell-like, cone-shaped point in the centre of the cranium vitalizing and illumining the human form.

Philosophically considered there is no death. The pronounced dead are alive. Every object, every particle in its inmost is afire with life. There is change, disorganization and reorganization but no death. According to the latest scientific research that there are a thousand corpuscles in a hydrogen atom, and 200,000 in a radium atom, and motion with radio-activity shows them to be aflame with life.

There is life then everywhere and our loved "dead" are alive and if so what are they doing? What are their occupations? The spirit world is a world of activity. Mortals take with them their memories, desires and tendencies. These are the necessities of personal identity. The astronomer here over there explores and measures undiscovered worlds, the geologist studies the nebulous process of world-making, the musician and the poet revel in realms of poetry and music, the artist labors in the art galleries of the heavens, for labor there is the labor of love. Philanthropists continue their work of beneficence by descending to the lower spheres to teach and to serve, something as Jesus, according to Peter, preached to imprisoned spirits.

The spirit-world is largely the world of causes. The inventors of earth are inventors over there. Spirit telepathy is becoming common, wireless telegraphy was first invented in the heavens and was impressed upon Marconi's mind and made practical, and, by the way, he is a Spiritualist.

The depraved of this world, the scheming and selfish at death become earth-bound spirits, obsessing spirits, demons, and may do moral injury. The lower spheres are called the hells, and the higher the heavens, and the still higher the celestial heavens. Evolution and progress pertain to all worlds.

The doctor then related the remarkable case of Mary Roff re-incarnating herself as a spirit in the body of Lurancy Vennum. He also related the very wonderful experience of Aaron Knight as a sinful mortal, his experiences in Hades after death and his final release and salvation. The heavens and hells are more conditions than locations. We make them for ourselves, and must reap the harvests of our sowing.

With votes of thanks to the speaker, the chairman and the theatre authorities, the meeting separated.—The Amrita Bazar Patrika, Calcutta, India.

THE OTHER SIDE.

Illustrating the Important Fact that the Japanese and Chinese Are Not Wanted in California.

To the Editor:—In regard to the editorial upon the San Francisco school question which appeared in a late number of The Progressive Thinker, I would say that I think you are certainly mistaken in supposing that the clergy and the Christian churches are the most violent in their opposition to the Chinese and Japanese in this country. I think it proceeds from all classes alike. It is not a question of religion at all; it is a question of labor, the struggle for a living and morality.

If you knew these people as well as we do, you would not wonder that we want to keep them out. I could tell you tales told me by the old residents of California, in Shasta county, that would make you shudder.

As to the opposition to the Japanese in the primary and grammar grades of the public schools in San Francisco, it was fully set forth at the outset of the trouble by the school commissioners, and Roosevelt and the Japanese consul were made fully aware of it. The San Franciscans know probably better than any one else does, just what is at the root of the matter.

In the first place, if I understand it, they are really beggars on the state's bounty, for they are not naturalized citizens. They pay no school taxes or tuitions, yet they demand the highest in the gift of the state.

But they have not been barred from an education, as you seem to think; the schools set apart for the Oriental children, it was asserted, were in every way equiped equal to those of the white children and they were also allowed to enter the higher schools. Does that look as though it was a question of color?

Their only trouble was that they felt insulted in not being allowed to enter the white schools.

I think they have made a grave mistake in forcing the issue. Whatever liking or respect the people of this coast may have felt for them before, this foolish squabble for a higher place will win them nothing but disgust and contempt.

But Japan with Roosevelt as her ally has won the day, as we hear. There will now be another treaty, with an exclusion clause which does not exclude, and the rush of students and business men to this coast will begin.

It seems strange to me, that the Northern and Eastern states can look at the question so indifferently.

"Where are the teachers for the millions of Japanese youths who wish to be taught English, to come from?" you ask.

Well, must California do it all? Why don't you of Chicago, for instance, hold out some inducement to bring them to you? Californians are not selfish, bless you; they don't want to monopolize all the glory.

You might need an appropriation from Congress for the extra expense, perhaps; but the President would see to that all right, and pass it over to you with his best bow and a smile that will go all over his face.

In fact, he might accommodate a few thousand round about Washington.

Yes, that's it; pass them on in a golden stream, Japanese and Chinese, all over the North and East; then you will see how it is yourselves.

It may make trouble for us in the near future, but Roosevelt and Japan want her boys to be taught English, and what she wants must come.

THE TRUE POET.

The true poet's language is beautiful,
Musical, dreamy and sweet,
All nature to him is a poem,
He is life's artist complete.
He paints in truest of colors,
Not with brush but with pen;
The world is a book that he studies;
He's the noblest and deepest of men.

He is not to be thwarted by jeering,
Criticism only inspires;
He writes while others are sleeping,
Or dreaming beside their fires.
He writes from divine inspirations,
From the soul and not from the mind;
He is never guided by mortals,
But the Creator of all mankind.

He loves the little wild creatures,
The insect, the bird and the beast;
He loves the innocent children,
Even those considered the least.
A friend to the forsaken and fallen;
A companion, a brother, a friend,
His paintings are truly inspiring,
And nigh unto perfection they blend.

Thus do I sing of the poet,
A man among men you will find.
He sees as no other man living,
Naught is there hid from his mind.
Thus do I sing of the poet,
The dreamer who ever will dream,
When his life on this earth is over,
Will embark on the immortal stream. —Homer Trask.

NEW YORK MASS-MEETING.

Held by the State Association of Spiritualists, in New York City.

One of the most enthusiastic as well as the most harmonious gatherings of Spiritualists, was the grand rally, or mass-meeting, held in Elks Hall, 59th street and Columbus Circle, New York City, February 14, 15 and 16. The mass-meeting was under the direction of Mrs. Harriet M. Rathbun, of Port Washington, assisted by Mr. A. T. Reidinger and Mrs. Margaret Gaule Reidinger of New York City. The hall was beautifully decorated by the Ladies' Aid of the First Association of Spiritualists of New York City.

The address of welcome was given by Mrs. Henry J. Newton, president of the First Association of Spiritualists of New York City. Response was made by Tillie U. Reynolds of Troy. The music was under the direction of Mme Louise B. Voigt. Her vocal selections were finely rendered, as well as the violin solos of Robert J. McIntyre who added very much to the entertainment at the several sessions.

The program was fully presented with two exceptions: H. W. Richardson, president of the New York State Association, was not able to attend, owing to the illness of himself and family; also, Dr. Geo. A. Fuller, president of the Massachusetts State Association, could not leave his wife, who was very ill. In the absence of the president the duty of presiding officer rested upon Tillie U. Reynolds, vice-president, who with Mrs. Harriet M. Rathbun, treasurer of the New York State Association, and Sarah A. Woodruff, secretary, were the only members of the board present. Other workers, Miss E. C. Resch of Brooklyn, Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham, speaker, and Miss Belle V. Cushman, president of the Spiritual and Ethical Society of New York.

Rev. Frederick A. Wiggin of Boston, Mass., was certainly an attraction to the audience, by his lectures of truth-telling ideas and the ballot tests given by him. Mrs. Helen L. P. Russegue of Hartford, Conn., a powerful speaker, held marked attention at every lecture given by her. Dr. Edward W. Emerson, long a favorite, gave indisputable evidence of spirit return. Miss Amalia F. Pfenning of Brooklyn, a graduate of the Morris Pratt School in Whitewaster, Wis., gave an address which reflected great credit upon that institution. Margaret Gaule, lecturer and message bearer for the First Association of Spiritualists, in her spirit messages won the hearts of all.

Mrs. Milton Rathbun offered the following resolution of thanks:

"To our faithful and loyal co-workers, speakers and mediums, who have so ably and generously labored to make the convocation a success; to Mme. Louise B. Voigt for the soul-inspiring music so exquisitely rendered; to Miss Corinne Wolerstein for artistic accompaniment; to Mr. Robert J. McIntyre for the entrancing violin solos and obligatos; to the First Association of Spiritualists, New York City, for hearty support in co-operation; to the Ladies' Aid, Auxiliary to said association, who so generously furnished and arranged the beautiful decorations, and in so many ways evidenced practical interest; to Mrs. Henry J. Newton, president of the First Association of Spiritualists, New York City, and chairman of reception committee, and to the members of her committee; to Mrs. George R. Storm, president of the Ladies' Aid and chairman of the entertainment committee, and her colleagues—those who so kindly opened the doors of their homes to entertain, who acted as ushers, and to Miss Edith Main as messenger; to Mr. A. T. Reidinger and those who assisted him in the financial department; to Mrs. Margaret Gaule-Reidinger who with her husband worked with unabated ardor and enthusiasm, early and late to make success sure; to our kind donors, one from Baltimore and one from Brooklyn;—to all who aided us in any way, we tender our hearty and sincere thanks on behalf of the New York State Association of Spiritualists, and all who have been privileged to enjoy the series of highly interesting sessions."

Before putting the resolution to the assembly for adoption, the chair insisted that Mrs. Milton Rathbun's name should be added to the list meriting thanks. The audience heartily endorsed the suggestion, and, by a rising vote, unanimously adopted the resolution, as amended.

In every detail this assembling together of earnest, spiritually-minded people was a success, and a unanimous rising vote of thanks was given to all the workers who have so earnestly labored for the success of the meeting. In this mingling together good seed was sown, an uplift given to our cause, and the rally will go down in the annals of the New York State Association as the banner mass-meeting held under the auspices of that association in the interest of the principles of the philosophy of Spiritualism. So great was the interest that on Saturday evening it was 11:30 before the closing hymn, "God be with you till we meet again," was sung by the congregation. Benediction by Helen Russegue.

A GOOD REPORT.

The Work in Columbus, Ohio.

To the friends, I would say that our city is certainly having an awakening such as it has not had in some years. For the last three winters Miss Elizabeth Harlow has been the regular speaker for the people here and she has done most efficient work in presenting the truth of Spiritualism in a dignified and intelligent manner. Also she has been a power to call together the people and center them in a working force, which has slowly but constantly grown until now anything we want we simply get it by the work of the many willing hands.

Miss Harlow took two months off this season, so as to have a test medium here, feeling it was for the best good of all. We secured the services of Mrs. Murtha. She came to us an entire stranger, but she has proved her worth as a woman and a medium. She is certainly one of the best we have ever had here. Her work has proven such a success we have kept her since Miss Harlow's return, and have decided to until April 1.

Sunday evening, February 25, the services were given over to a memorial to our arisen workers, Moses Hull and Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown. They had both worked here in days gone by, and had many warm friends here. Miss Harlow paid a high tribute to the work of each, and the place they had filled in the structure of the Cause they represented. Their places can never be filled, for they were both unique in their work. But we sincerely hope there will be others brought to the front to take up the work where they have laid it down on this side of life.

SPIRITUALISM.

The Universal Power in Human Progress.

The following essay wis written by Hamilton De Graw, of Watervliet, N. Y. and read by the author at the Spiritualist's meeting held in Keenan Hall, Troy, N. Y., Sunday, October 14, 1906. Subject, "Spiritualism, the Universal Power in Human Progress."

"O, there's a fullness in the heavens above,
The well-springs of life overflow,
And ministering angels all radiant with love
Come precious gifts to bestow."

My dear friends, how true it is that the wellsprings of immortal life are overflowing, and if we have come here this evening with an honest desire to receive the gifts of the spirit, they will be ours.

We propose to present to you for consideration a few facts showing that Spiritualism, in regard to the phenomenon or the influence which it exerts over human life, is not confined to any religious sect or party, but is universal in its application. That it permeates and is the life of all religious organizations, and also political ones. Without it they would fall to the ground, cease to have any power over the minds of the people. And whether conscious of the fact or not, the political, social and religious organizations of the world receive their dominating influence from the spiritual world. It so interpenetrates and overshadows life that it cannot be where the spiritual influence does not reach it.

This does not imply that mortal life is released from all responsibility and is a mere puppet in the hands of the spiritual forces. We are placed here to perform our work and we must do it; that we have assistance is true, but the responsibility of its performance rests upon our individual selves.

Our statement that the political organizations also have their directory prepared in the spiritual world may not be acceptable to that class of politicians who suppose, if we judge them by their assertions and demeanor, that they own the country, and that even the earth would be disturbed in its revolutions if it were not for the mighty influence they exert. A proper amount of self-confidence is a good thing to have, because without it the advancement that has been made toward a higher civilization could never have been accomplished. There have been many antagonistic forces that human life has had to and will have to meet, and there is needed an indomitable will power and perseverence to accomplish the beneficent result which is human advancement to the higher planes of its existence. There is needed in the affairs of life that spirit which dominated the young man when told that every individual sometime in their life had to meet their Waterloo. He replied that "when he met his Waterloo his name would be Wellington.

One of the greatest blessings conferred upon mankind through the teachings of Spiritualism is that of individual responsibility. That no atoning blood will ever wash away the errors of life, but only by a rejection of those errors will life be liable to advance. When that truth is universally taught and practiced, instead of the doctrine of atonement that is taught by orthodox theology and promulgated is one of the doctrines essential for salvation, then the advancement of human society on all lines of thought will be more rapid, because one great obstacle that now impedes its progress will have been removed.

Spiritualism is permeating the internal working of human society politically, socially and religiously to an extent never before realized. It is teaching mankind that it is their duty to understand and adopt a higher moral code and that it is needed. And that the political temple of human life needs to be cleansed from the corruption that has accumulated within its portals. It is teaching mankind that an individual can be a politician and be honest; can be deeply interested and take an active part in the operation of the governmental system under which he is living and do it with an earnest desire for human betterment.

We see human life carrying along with it some of the elements and conditions that were dominant traits of its life when the evolution from the animal had scarcely begun, and we wonder why such things are allowed; they belonging to an age that in the main has closed its program. Well; they are the reflex action of that former animalistic age which the race has not entirely evoluted away from.

The prophetic gift is the direct result of the spiritual unfolding of life. It can only come in its fullness to those who have had the animalistic forces of life dominated by the spiritual. It gives the ability to more fully understand the law of cause and effect than can be done by the materialistic scientist when the occult forces of life are to be dealt with, and from that high plane of existence the true prophet can see the shadows cast by coming events and predict the result. There is nothing mysterious in the operation of that gift, it is one of the laws of the universe, and in the progress of human life it will eventually be able to understand and control the elements, thereby preventing those convulsions of nature so disastrous to human life; it will be able to speak with authority and say to the tempest "peace, be still."

While admitting that there is need for human life to advance to a higher plane than the one on which it is at present existing, the spiritual philosophy does not recognize the fall of man, but that he started very low in the scale, so low that it would shock our finer sensibilities if we could have it come before our vision and see the pit from whence he was dug. But he has been rising, and in spite of all the demoniac forces that he has to contend with he will continue to rise. To admit that the trend of human life is backward is too revolting a thought to entertain, and the intelligent believer in the philosophy knows it to be untrue. The influences from the lower world that have not yet been evoluted away from, are at present the cause of greater anxiety than was ever before manifest, and that is indicative of progressive movements toward a higher life, a convincing evidence that the coming civilization will be superior to the present as that is superior to those that have passed.

The social fabric of human society which is so closely intertwined with the moral forces of life that they appear as one, is being cleansed by the power of the spirit world. It is making society feel the necessity of being guided more strictly by higher ideals than it has formerly entertained. The religious world is feeling the influence of Spiritualism in the rejection of those forms of thought which theology has placed the people under bondage to. It is furnishing them with a system of religious belief that is founded upon scientific facts. It is anxious to have the scientific minds of the world investigate the philosophy, knowing that the more thorough the investigation, more clearly the truth on which Spiritualism is founded will be made manifest.

The immense amount of political, social and religious rubbish that has been allowed to accumulate in human society necessitated the manifestation of a strong iconoclastic spirit in the early manifestations of Spiritualism to the world, and the fact will not be denied by anyone that understands the thought of the civilized world even with our twentieth century progress, but that the power of the iconoclast or idol smasher is still needed. But the pathway of life has been cleared to that extent that Spiritualism is beginning to build a structure superior to any that the world has ever evolved.

All forms of thought have their time and day in which to work out the plans assigned to them by the spiritual powers, or we will use a form of expression better understood by the popular thought and say Divine Providence which gave them the work to do, and when it is accomplished those forms of thought that have been evolved from still cruder material will retire from the arena and be replaced by more advanced thought, and that by still higher ideals and so on through the endless ages. That is eternal progression.

The great mission of Spiritualism is to impress upon human thought even while incarnated in mortality the truth that there can be no boundary line placed to the soul in its efforts to advance. That the field is absolutely limitless, and where we are standing to-day intellectually and spiritually, those forms of thought should by to-morrow be left in the rear. The ideals that were dominant in the ages that have passed were undoubtedly the best that could be understood by the thought of those times. One thing that has prevented a more rapid advance on progressive lines has been the fact that we are great worshipers at the shrine of antiquity. It is hard work for us to change our belief, especially on political and religious questions, even when we see that they have outgrown their usefulness and have become antiquated.

The only thing that is immortal is the truth, and Spiritualism tells us that it is our duty to seek a close communion with it, as thereby we will be enabled to more perfectly understand the glories of the truth of immortal life. We are to seek it regardless of whether it will be to our material interest or not. It tells us that if we are to be martyrs to the cause of human progress, we must bravely perform our duty, knowing that immortal life is ours, and if we must enter into the kingdom of glory through the gates of martyrdom, our lives will be glorified thereby. That we must feel the power of the spirit of Savonarola did when about to suffer martyrdom by being burnt, and the Bishop said to him, "I expel you from the church militant and from the church triumphant." Savanarola replied, "Not from the church triumphant, that is beyond your power."

THE VOICE OF A DAISY.

I am sister to the boulder, and for ages he's been here;
Yet we know not which is older, for I come and go each year.

Though a short time nature frees me,
in a meadow bright and fair,
When the eye no longer sees me,
think'st thou I'm not anywhere?

Flowers appear from fields Elysian,
soon again to dust we fall;
Nothing, seen by mortal vision, is the something of us all.

You may crush me, little dreaming,
tho' my form is lost to view,
That I live beyond the seeming, of the sight bestowed on you.

There's a plane of life and action,
from earth's limitations free;
'Tis the source of every fraction, mortal sight can ever see.

Forms of life are shadows fleeing,
through a point of time; the whole Universe is simply being, Earth the body; God the soul.

Seen is but unseen reflection in the seed, the flower, the tree;
Nature's yearly resurrection mirrors immortality.

The Angels Stopped the Clock.

While officiating at the funeral services of Mrs. John Shurley of Texas, Mich., I was much surprised to hear of the remarkable and beautiful light that came from the spirit world to visit and astonish the bereaved family. The deceased had, previous to her passing out, bid farewell to a loving husband and father. Just before his departure to spirit life the old clock she used to wind every night stopped ticking. The angels came again and stopped the clock as the dear mother's spirit passed out. Will the angels still manage the old clock for warning purposes, that her many loved ones may know and understand that they shall all meet sometime in that beautiful summerland where she longed to go. Mrs. John Shurley left behind her to mourn their loss (but her gain) nine children, sixteen grandchildren, two great-grandchildren, and was the first white child born in Texas, residing there fifty-four years. They were old pioneers, and loved and mourned by many friends. Many other beautiful truths could be told of her divine and devout spiritual life. No wonder the angels loved to visit homes like this. Where harmony dwells in homes of earth, there must have been a spiritual birth.

STRANGE PREDICTIONS

Planetary Professor Foretells Events and Quickly Reads the Lives of People, Though Thousands of Miles Away.

Sends Letters to the Rich and Poor Alike in Which He Advises Them About Business, Marriage, Speculation, Love Affairs, Wealth, Etc.

Offers Free Readings to All Who Write and Send Date of Birth.

In his office in New York City, surrounded by charts and dials of strange design, Prof. Albert H. Postel studies daily over the lives of men and women who have written him for advice on affairs of business, love, speculation, travel, marriage, health and the important events of life. The following letter gives an idea of Mr. Postel's ability:

MISS EFFA M. TRYON.

Prof. Postel:

Dear Sir—You are certainly the most wonderful astrologer living. Every one of your predictions came true. I consider that you not only saved me from an awful death, but prevented the loss of hundreds of dollars. I trust that many people will profit by your advice. Sincerely,

MISS EFFA M. TRYON.

The accuracy of recent predictions made by this eminent Astrologer has caused many of his friends to believe that he possesses a supernatural power, but he modestly asserts that his predictions are due alone to a scientific understanding of natural laws. The many thankful letters Prof. Postel has received from people who have benefited by his advice furnish ample proof that he is sincere in his work and has a kindly feeling toward humanity.

Readers of this paper can obtain a reading free of charge by addressing a letter to Prof. Postel, Dept. 285, No. 126 West 34th street, New York. Simply say you wish a reading of your life, stating your birth date, sex and whether married or single. If you wish to do so you may inclose 10 cents (silver or stamps) to pay postage and clerical work; however, the reading will be promptly sent, whether you inclose the 10 cents or not.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

OR

Dial Planchette.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than twelve years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

SCINTILLATIONS

From Prof. Larkin, the Eminent Scientist.

The Indo-American Book Company, Chicago, is a center of brilliant radiation of advanced thought. Three remarkable books stored with strange ideas, mysterious teachings and occult things have been published. I would like to add a fourth based on recent strange discoveries in the vast physical world. If there is a vast spiritual world filled with supernal splendors, nature takes extreme care to guard its portals from me.

If the human soul exists, that one great fact itself is kept out of my sight. Hour by hour, day by day, year by year, for more than forty years, I have analyzed all laws of nature so far discovered. Then I combined them with each other over and over again. Thus I would take a law of chemistry and compare it with all others; then a law of astronomy or electricity and compare, combine and apply to each one of all the others.

Not one law nor combination of laws, three or more laws, presents any analogy, suggestion, clew or hint that an entity called the soul exists. Now that wonderful woman, Florence Huntley, on page 5 of her admirable book, "Harmonics of Evolution," makes the assertion that "Life after physical death is a fact scientifically demonstrated."

That other equally wonderful woman,—she looks into deeps—Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in this very room where I am now writing here in the intense solitude of the distant mountains, on this peak, three years ago, told me over and over again in the most solemn and impressive and at times in an awe-inspiring manner, that the entity called soul exists here and will after the body dies. Letters, from every direction come, simply begging me to see the bright light; to become conscious or aware in some manner, that I am a soul. These hundreds of letters contain every argument that brain can devise to convince me of the soul's existence; and they implore me to become imbued with that idea and publish it as a set fact to the world.

This long-time solicitude, to me, is touching and pathetic. To all these dear friends who for years have sent me these good letters, I express my thanks, gratitude and love, and also to those who have sent me all conceivable kinds of books, treatises, pamphlets, essays, monographs and poems on this one supreme subject—the soul. Often letters come expressing astonishment that: "An astronomer living among the blessed and beautiful stars, and of all places, on a mountain peak, cannot, at least at midnight, receive tidings from the other shore, ever so near you." And this: "Oh! why will you not listen to the sweet voices calling, calling all around your mountain?"

E. E. Beeman, in The Progressive Thinker, page 3, No. 897, says: "I am one of the best mediums in the country." And see here: "Oh! dear astronomer on the mountain, do you not feel the blessed influences from another world?"

This vast granite pile rises in majesty above a wide expanse of ever-living green, of orange and lemon trees; of the lovely magnolias, acacias, cypress, eucalyptus, almond, apricot and walnut trees. Its colossal walls look down on roses, heliotropes, sweet violets and hydrangeas, and a thousand kinds of flowers besides blooming every day of every year in the blessed sunshine. At night, my friends are planets, stars and granite peaks. And then the great telescope.

The dear friends who ask these questions know that I feel the wonderful influences all the time when awake, and dream of the splendid things when asleep. Have I not published thousands of articles describing all these supernal glories and wonders? How could anybody write this to me: "Oh! do you not detect or feel the sweet influence of the Pleiades"? That is the very reason why I live up here on this mountain, to be in the wondrous influence every minute. Let me ask: "Do YOU really feel the sweet influence of the stars?" If so, how can you, without a telescope? Especially if you live on a flat plain, or in the most dreadful of all places, a smoky city in thick layers of dust. How can I be mistaken? All thoughts, dreams, activities, impressions, influences, intuitions and entities whatever, that ever appeared in my brain were caused by the oscillations of matter. And they cannot be caused in any other way.

Corpuscles.

I wish to outline some of the astounding deductions of very recent physical science—the only kind there is, or can be. From 1804 to 1904, physics and chemistry were based upon the absolutely indivisible atoms of matter the smallest bodies in existence, the atom of hydrogen being the least in weight. But now that unutterably small thing is broken up into 700 parts, and the atom of mercury into 200,000. The average number of particles dalled corpuscles, into which the atoms of the elements so far examined can be divided is about 30,000. The mas of one corpuscle is such that the number required to weigh one drugstore grain is 100,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000. And a row of them side by side one inch long would contain 12,500,000,000,000. So far, no difference can be detected between them and electricity. They have inertia, the chief property of ordinary matter. So far as can now be seen by the most searching science, nothing exists but corpuscles, that is nothing exists but electricity.

The atoms of all the chemical elements are made up by union of different numbers of corpuscles, and the chemical and physical properties of these elements are caused solely by varying rates of oscillation. For corpuscles move with a raging, terrific speed, beyond all imagination. No brain, not even that of the ablest mathematician can commence to think about a corpuscle, of its weight or diameter. The concept called a mathematical abstraction is most wonderful; so is that other concept—center of force. Now a corpuscle may be called either of these. Then a stupendous thing follows of necessity; Matter vanishes into corpuscles, and disappears as ordinary gross substance. Corpuscles are at the limit of human scrutiny.

Therefore, I feel like signing my name to this statement: Nothing whatever exists but corpuscles. This seems to render obsolete the prehistoric word soul. If souls exist, they are congeries of corpuscles. From the most elaborate researches now going on by day and by night, in the electromentological laboratories of the world, facts have been discovered able to convince me that mind is an electrical oscillation and nothing else. Mind in all beings from the primordial microscopic bathybius, a creature without a nucleus, up, up through countless organic forms to the lowest man; and then upward and onward higher and higher to the greatest mathematicians, I assert and repeat is an oscillation of electrical corpuscles. Since nothing nor entity exists but corpuscles or ever did, they cannot end and are eternal.

The mighty question now looms up, can corpuscles oscillate at rates able to set up mind without an organism in which to act?

The Great Psychological Crime,

by a wonderful, but to me unknown writer. It reveals and exposes the most appalling crime known, the abuse of that formidable mental agency, hypnotism. This can be used as a benefit to man or as a terrific engine of insanity and death. The book reveals all and the wonder is that mental type can portray the horrors of this brain and blood-curdling hypnotism. Obsession is more terrible than leprosy and cancer; yet human beings will as deliberately put themselves into position to contract the disease as a maniacal suicide in front of a locomotive. I have circulars from hypnotic places advertising practices as dreadful as those carried on in Babylon, Jerusalem and Thebes. This book ought to be placed in the hands of every person, especially the young, that receives these advertising slips. Books treating of sexology are excluded from the United States mails, yet these horrible ads are sent by millions. Hypnotism is rapidly converting every modern city into a den of crime, for youths are nightly deprived of their heritage from Nature—reason and self-control.

The appalling horrors practiced for thousands of years by those precious scoundrels—the priests in every temple in India, Bactria, Persia, Assyria, Babylonia, Palestine, Egypt, Greece and Rome, are now going on here on American soil, and statesmen are in deep slumber.

The Great Work.

How I do wish I could see the distinguished author, for I have great admiration for his marvelous logic. I have studied every phase of Hindu and other Oriental philosophy, in the exoteric form for years, putting a whole lot of esoteric and occult, to suit myself, between the lines; but have never seen an "adept" nor a trace of genuine phenomena. I have intense desire to see an adept; and watch him bring apports such as cuneiform bricks and tablets from Nineveh. Addie L. Ballou of San Francisco, who went with Mrs. Stanford to Bailey's seances in Australia, brought home six. I examined them in her office before the fire. They weighed about seven ounces each and were composed or a red stone and inscribed with cuneiform writing.

The Great Work quotes Dolbear. Everything, he said, is modified by the discovery of corpuscles. The author cuts Rome, the Hierarchy, to the quick to the very "graft" in 58 slashes, p. 374. His treatment of the standing wonder of nature, consciousness, is the best I ever read.

And now I must put up a war on the author for not denouncing the eating of meat, flesh of dead animals. How can beef-eaters with vast hemispherical abdomens be "spiritually"-minded? The new definition of the word morality is the best ever given: "Morality is man's established harmonic relation to the constructive principles of his own being." Nothing theological about this—it is rigidly scientific, and of mighty import, for the entire universe of corpuscles beats and oscillates at definite and strictly harmonious rates.

Here is the problem of the 20th century, one so grand that imagination is submerged. Man must and will discover these rates and place his mind in harmonic oscillation with them. No dream of imagination, now, in the beginning of the century, can picture what man will be when he finds out how to appropriate corpuscles from space. I assent again as I have everywhere for years that the human mind has no limit. Mental powers will be increased a hundred, yes, a thousand times the moment man discovers the rate of oscillation for mind. I believe that the time will come when matter will be moved by mind, Trine's vast law "Getting into tune with the Infinite," is as intensely scientific as Kepler's and Newton's laws. Six words—they constitute the key note of the 20th century. Ninety per cent of everything we now think, say and do will be hurled into oblivion. Nearly everything is obsolete now except mathematics.

Stand from under, chaos is coming, nearly every weight is about to fall. Then the capital discovery—the rate of pulse of nature, will be made, and we will at once place our minds in oscillation at the same rate and transform mankind. Every disease and drug store will vanish.

It is with extreme regret that the author marred the white paper with the horrible words "religion," "sin," "evil"; nature knows nothing of these and they should be put in the back part of the dictionary. All that this great writer has to do is to find some way of forcing corpuscles to manifest as mind without an organism, then immediately come here with Florence Huntley and talk hour after hour with me on this granite mountain all bathed in glorious sunshine.

Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas.

And now comes good Brother Hudson Tuttle, putting up another elaborate book. Would that every religionist could study this classic work. Here is a startling thing—I never conversed with one solitary religionist who knew the origin of his belief. There may be such, but I never met one. This is a very impressive fact. Men will hold to dogmas with the tenacity of life and death, without a trace of knowledge of their origin. This seems to be incredible, but it is true.

Vast study has been bestowed on this work and the great scholar has ransacked every nook and corner of archaeology, anthropology, linguistic archaeology, mythology, astrology and priestcraft from the ground up.

Personification, an underlying fact in human nature—where every activity seen in nature is personified into a human-like god, is fully explained.

The origins of the great bibles of the world are cleared up; and destruction of these books by rival cults also. Men's minds are marvelous entities, and it is simply wonderful to mentalists to study the endless varieties and types of gods that have been propitiated by the murder of thousands of millions of animals and entire hundreds of millions of men and women during thousands of bloody years. The record is enough to inspire the hope that religion will vanish from the beautiful face of our home—the earth.

And now I must come down on the good brother friend for using the words, Cosmic Mind. The fad now is the stupendous word Directivity, which means that corpuscles know what to do, and when to act and where to go. Nothing exists but corpuscles, and they cannot be distinguished from electricity. Corpuscles race through brain cells as water through a sieve and set up mind.

After all there is no difference between Cosmic Mind and inherent eternal corpuscular directivity.

Never before has the Christ myth been so cleared up. He who runs may read its origin in prehistoric night. The modern official in our courts, appointed to defend an accused man who has no money is the secular side of this very ancient idea.

The paradise myth is explained, and the "fall" as well. Human sacrificial murder and animal, are traced to their awful sources. The myth of the virgin is made so plain that all can see its origin.

The historical or non-historical rather, trial of Jesus by Pilate, on page 272, is shown us in a convincing style. But Appendix C on the computation of the positions of the planets at the winter solstice at the alleged beginning of the Christian era appeals to me. Kepler had no knowledge of mathematics that could come anywhere near solving this tremendous problem. In his day there were no mathematical tables of the planets in existence. Kepler knew nothing of planetary perturbations except that he detected slight disturbances in the places of Jupiter and Saturn. He died in 1630.

The first accurate research on the mutual perturbations of all the planets was commenced in 1756 by Euler. But he did not know of Uranus and Neptune. It is therefore in only very recent times that tables of the mean motions of the planets in the solar system have been made; and tables of amounts of perturbations. And it would now tax to the limit, the resources of the most profound mathematicians armed with instruments of the highest precision to compute accurate places for the planets 1907 years ago—a task far beyond Kepler—although he was one of the greatest of all astronomers. Thus every element of religion now believed in Europe and the United States was devised by prehistoric men totally ignorant of even one law of nature. For ethical culture, Eugenics and Tune with the Infinite are coming on apace. EDGAR L. LARKIN.

SEVEN PRINCIPLES.

Indicating What Spiritualism Stands For.

In several of the recent issues of The Progressive Thinker one of your contributors wants to know what Spiritualism stands for, and what the National Association shall formulate as a declaration of principles. To my notion it would be easy to get Spiritualists to unite on all the essentials that pertain to Spiritualism.

First and foremost of all is that the so-called dead do live again, and life is a continuation in spirit of the life begun on earth.

2. That under proper conditions they are able to communicate with the inhabitants of this earth.

3. That happiness in spirit life depends on how good we have lived on earth. Did we feed the hungry, clothe the naked, dispense comfort to the sorrowing, defend the weak, and stand for justice and right in all things as far as our intelligence and knowledge could lead us? Then we can safely look for joy and peace in spirit life.

4. That we stand for the inexorable law of justice and compensation both in this world and the next. No shifting of the responsibility of our evil deeds on others. That this life is a school of preparation for the life that is to follow.

5. That no good deeds go unrewarded, or evil ones unpunished; for the law of compensation and restitution is inexorable.

6. That it does not count much what we believe, so long as our belief corresponds with what we know about the future life.

7. That we wage no war on other religions, but believe in pursuit of knowledge of a future life. They have all borrowed and copied from traditions so remote and hidden and obscured by the infantile habits and usages of the human race as to make all of them unworthy of this enlightened age. Therefore all we ask of other forms of religion is for them to take no privileges to themselves not granted us, knowing that equality before the law lets intellectual progress flow along the lines of least resistance.

J. H. LANCASTER.

In Memory of My Dear Friend, Jennie Hagan-Brown.

From the sunny south-land to my home amid the snow-clad hills of New England, came the letter telling me the silent messenger of peace has swung ajar the gates, and my dear friend, Jennie has passed to the higher life.

She had been much in my mind of late, though with no thought she was ill or dying, but rather in a reminiscent way, thinking over the happy days we have spent together at Ocean Grove, Harwich, Onset, in her home and in my house, and of the drives we have enjoyed over these dear old hills, always her delight.

Reading over her past letter, closes in the same way so many have in the years of our friendship—"Remember, I love you just the same," and expressing a longing to once more come to my home in the hills.

Oh! the sadness of the thought that never again will the slender fingers pen me words of love.

Jennie was a wonderful psychic, and never will we see her equal on the Spiritual rostrum again. Her psychic gifts became manifested in a remarkable degree when a mere baby, before she could talk plainly. Her mother has often told me, and for 30 years she has been a faithful instrument for the invisible workers.

Very few of the pioneer speakers are left in the mortal; well may we ask, who will fill their places?

One by one the cherished faces
Slip away from mortal sight;
Gentle touch of spirit fingers
On our forehead, day and night,
Tell us they still linger near us,
Still our joys and sorrows share;
Still are glad when shadows lighten—
Help us all our griefs to bear.

When the gates that open heavenward
Swing ajar and we glide through,
Long hushed voices once more welcome;
All old friendships we'll renew.
In that land beyond the sunset
We'll be greeted once again
By the vanished hand whose touches
We have longed for—not in vain.

LOVE, TRUTH, CHARITY,

As Surveyed and Critically Examined From a High Spiritual Standpoint.

These sentiments are guiding stars which pilot all human souls to the Haven of peace and activity. There is no peace without activity. The sluggard seeking rest never finds peace, while the active soul doing its work day by day, carrying the burdens of others and helping the weary, is the only one who enjoys fully the blessings of contentment.

Love is inexpressible. It is infinite. Truth should be the actuating principle of each individual life. Charity, the greatest of all virtues, should help the degraded from the lowest depths, without a question, placing them in our hearts as sisters and brothers, with love and respect.

Mature respect is true love. Gain the confidence of any creature, human or animal, through kindness, and thereby win their love. Animals are more worthy at times than their progressed brothers, called men. They lick the hand that chastens them, while men often lick those who love them. Which is the nobler? Any religion, sect or creed which does not include the animal kingdom in its mighty struggle for love and intelligence, in this age of individual thinking for one's self.

While searching for truth look among your acquaintances and read their characters. Some express pride in the shallow manner of the peacock. Others demonstrate different phases of animal life. Have you not met those whom you would not trust? and say instinctively, "He is a snake in the grass." Try to delineate character and you will be astonished to find animal life embodied in the human family. The writer often feels his prenatal characteristics of the tiger, when an injustice is done by man to any creature of earth.

Charity teaches: The creature, lowest in degradation, struggles with conditions and environments, hoping to conquer seeming fate. A kindly word, sincerely spoken, may drive the wolf of passion or despair away. Speak those words of charity and encouragement to unfortunates who have gone estray. Open-souled, free-hearted creatures are ofttimes weak, while the small-souled person who looks through the keyhole at life, with both eyes, is too narrow and selfish to lose his smallness through excesses of passion or appetite.

These fundamental truths prompt reply to several articles recently published in The Progressive Thinker, in condemnation of reincarnation. On the title page of issue number 899 under date of February 15, 1907, C. Curtiss Gardner writes under the question, 'What is Spiritualism?"

Generous motives actuate his writing, as shown in the concluding sentence: "Yours for humanity and onward progression." His spiritual power is developing and grander truths will be made known to him ere long.

Those persons seeking absolute truth and who are willing to rise above all ism's allowing the soul to grow into its grandest spiritual development, will, receive light on the path by reading Fourteen Lessons in Yogi Philosophy, and the Advance Course in Yogi Philosophy, published in Chicago, Ill.

The writer of this article was born in surroundings which taught salvation through nonsensical theories, which are stunting the growth for independent thought. Appreciation of refined, beautiful and spiritualizing surroundings, is the great power which brings contentment in this probationary period of life. The delicately tinted, fragrant, perfumed flower gives no comfort or pleasure to one who treads upon it, while others raise this emblem of inspiration and tenderly soothe injuries inflicted by an unappreciative soul.

Human powers are physical, mental and spiritual. Here and now we should cultivate all these attributes, and as the last leaf of earth life is turned, it will reveal a beautiful spiritualized soul, brave enough to cross the border line, knowing it goes forth to unselfish friends and a happy ethereal home. What happiness could the physical mental souls find in the spirit realm? None whatever.

They would still desire the conditions of earth life to give expression to their powers. According to laws of eternal progression, these souls die in spirit-land, are re-embodied in earth life and begin again to climb the progressive paths which lead ultimately to the eternal light.

"What is Spiritualism?" It is the only power sufficiently strong to stem the tide of infidelity which was sweeping our country one-half century ago. Atheists and Agnostics are the products of unreasonable religious teachings of centuries past. Spiritualism with its great frauds and humbugs, proved through its remaining proportion of truth, that life is continuous. We should revere the memory of Paine, Ingersoll, and others who destroyed playhouses of worship which were founded on error and superstition. They left nothing in place of illusions to comfort the credulous, childish sentiments of men. Spirit return is a glorious truth, a scientific fact; but why not give the world other and grander truths, which come from advanced spirits, to soul-hungry mortals, through truthful and refined mediums?

Many would-be mediums are incompetent; others practice at times to get the almighty dollar; others are rank fakirs who rob people under the protection of a city license, which drives the clean, conscientious mediums from the public field by the excessive burdens imposed through taxation.

Test the spirit, prove the medium. Do not become ecstatic over a description of an old lady with bent form, lace cap and hair combed over her ears. It may be some other person's grandmother, and those childish, commonplace sayings are not for you.

Stagnation is not permissible. Grand beacon lights of truth exist, but the great body of Spiritualists are looking forward to the home over there, as one of constant bliss and contentment. They do not make the best of this life; they play a waiting game. Perfect truth does not abide with Spiritualists, for they have not peace among them. Their religious homes are few and far between. Jealousies and selfishness exist among their teachers and societies. Bequests made for the cause are construed by some courts to be evidence of the testator's insanity.

Buddha, Socrates, Confucius and Christ are waiting anxiously in the spirit form to give truth to the children of men through unsullied instruments. Awaken from the trance of stagnation and do not allow the progressive element to outgrow the teachings of Spiritualism, and looking backward say, "What a grand religion it might have been.'

Read carefully the subject of reincarnation. Contemplate fully its vital significance in the continuity of Spiritualism as the everlasting, true religion of the world. Its truth is confirmed only by the most advanced souls, simply because the others speak without knowledge.

Sentiment is a noble product of the brain, but do not allow it to overpower reason, and rush into print. The Progressive Thinker's space is too valuable for personalities. Write only in the spirit of LOVE, TRUTH AND CHARITY. J. W. CUNNINGHAM.

MINNESOTA SPIRITUALISTS.

The Most Successful Mid-Winter Mass-Meeting Ever Held in St. Paul, by the State Association.

To the Editor:—We have just closed the most successful three-days' mid-winter mass-meeting that the State Spiritualists' Association of Minnesota ever held. The audience was large at the first meeting, Friday afternoon, Feb. 22, and continued to increase at each meeting, and Sunday night people were turned away unable to get into the hall.

Mrs. C. McFarlin, vice-president of the State Spiritualists' Association of Wisconsin, was the principal speaker at all the meetings; also the local talent of the Twin Cities took part in the exercises.

The following are a few who took part in the children's lyceum exercises of Minneapolis and St. Paul before the afternoon meeting. A paper was read by Miss Nellie Whitwell on "A Few Stray Thoughts on Spiritualism." Miss Annie Whitwell read a paper on "What Spiritualism Teaches Me." Arthur Lindblom's paper was on "How to Be Good." Miss Esther Wendberg read a paper on "The Invisible Forces." We have good cause to be proud of our children's lyceum, which numbers about eighty. People came from all over the state.

The state association will have to give up Odd Fellows' Hall where they have held the annual mid-winter mass-meeting for so many years, and secure a larger hall next year. Is Spiritualism growing? You would think so if you saw how anxious people were to get into the hall last Sunday night, and how disappointed they were when they learned they could not get in.

Yes, the cause of Spiritualism goes marching on; if you do not think so, read The Progressive Thinker which always keeps a person fully posted.

DELIGHTED WITH THE BOOK.

"The Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas," the Great Work by Hudson Tuttle.

I seldom write anything for publication, as others keep The Progressive Thinker so full of good reading and instructive matter it seems anything I might write would be superfluous, yet there are some thoughts that may be of use to some one else if they would take up and read Brother Tuttle's last book, "The Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas."

The portrayal of the power and tenacity of ideas in that book astonished me beyond measure, proving that the ideas of men thousands of ages ago have had the power to shape and form the ideas of to-day along the religious lines of thought, while along the scientific lines they are almost obsolete.

Brother Tuttle has shown us the causes that have acted upon the minds of mankind to suggest the thought of God, the Infinite, the Unknown, the Great Eternal Forces. The objective scenes, ever before the untutored mind of man, formed the thought of some intelligent being that must have created it.

The evolution of the conditions surrounding the primitive man were beyond his concept. He could not conceive objective matter was ever changing in form, evolving what was involved within it; so at one stroke, it was all made a few thousand years ago in six days, from an eternity of nothingness, if we could know what that was.

I only wish to call the attention of the readers of The Progressive Thinker to the value of that book, showing from whence, and how, originated the ideas to which the human family cling with such intense devotion.

I read seven years ago a lecture from Brother A. B. French upon the Power and Permanency of Ideas. The "Everlasting quality of Ideas," the lexicographers tell us is the expression of an imaginary thought. The word-picture of God comes from the imagination of primitive man.

Brother Tuttle explains the ideas were the best at the time, but like other ideas of objective nature are subject to the improvement of this age which is represented in other lines of thought. Instead of God being like man, getting angry, repenting and changing from day to day, as man does in his feelings, Brother Tuttle portrays God or nature as one infinite intelligent force, ever moving in a systematic and progressive manner. He does not condemn the primitive man for his thoughts or ideas. They were the best he knew at that time, but suggests that progressive minds of to-day which have formed ideas of these infinite forces should be heard and accepted as the superior in quality of conception over that of our ancient brethren!

It would seem to me the influence of The Progressive Thiner among its many readers would interest them to read this intensely interesting work of Brother Tuttle.

In reading this "Evolution of the God and Christ Ideas," my mind turned to my childhood days when my mother read to me in the old family bible, and showed me the pictures. These pictures represent the thought-ideas and imagery of over a century ago. I wonder if the idea of Uncle Sam as portrayed in our papers each week in some form will in time be made a Saint, representing the God of America. It started from a similar source as the pictures of Christ or the Virgin Mary, all in the imagination of man who formed his ideas in a sketch of character of the thought that passed before his vision.

The words of Brother Tuttle as he gives us the views of the past cannot fail to make people think upon broader and more progressive lines. I hope his book will reach the hands of all thinkers as well as Spiritualists.

WHAT THE FOOL SAITH.

No One Knows Another's Secret Thoughts.

"The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." How did the author of that saying know what the fool said in his heart? Was he himself the fool? "In his heart" means his secret thoughts, and the author could have known only his own thoughts.

But what does all this talk about God amount to? Nothing. Dictionaries and encyclopedias do not finally explain. We get Jehovah, Elohim, Deity, Supreme Being and many others, in various languages; but they all need explaining, and we are forever in doubt about God. Christians pretend to believe in the old Hebrew Jehovah, or God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; the most cruel, and vindictive monster of all the man-invented Gods, and the silliest, most foolish one, too.

How can we account for such human credulity? If people capable of reasoning, could obliterate from their minds all the foolishness taught them in their youth, then read the "Holy Scriptures" just as they read other books, there would be no more believers in pagan gods.

The church's three-masted god, and two-horned devil are just as pagan as any of those of Egypt, Greece, Rome, or of our own British or German ancestors.

All of them are impossible Gods, but the god borrowed from the Hebrews and doctored by Constantine and others is the most absurdly impossible of all.

A being capable of creating a universe, omnipotent and at the same time all-wise and all-merciful, could not, permit for a moment the existence of the horrible suffering, misery and crime which afflicts the world today.

Old God-makers have clothed these deities with impossible attributes without seeming to be aware of it. If the Hebrew-Pagan-Christian God were really omnipotent and a good, benevolent being, too, would it not have been as easy to have "made man" so perfect and so pure that he could neither sin nor suffer?

Why do such statesmen as Roosevelt and Bryan pretend to Modern Christianity—do they believe it historically or theologically true? Certainly not, if they ever reasoned on the subject for fifteen minutes.

We know absolutely nothing about a triune God that contradicts the multiplication table, nor any other. No, let us all acknowledge our ignorance, like Ingersoll, and exclaim, "I don't know—I don't know."

I am three years older than Dr. Peebles and am more of an agnostic than he. C. E. TOBEY.

SPIRIT RETURN EVERYWHERE.

Sees Bright Beings in Spirit World.

A wonderful psychical phenomenon that has attracted the attention of scientists to Afton, Iowa, has served to make a revival that is being held there sweep the surrounding country like wild fire.

The phenomenon consists of a trance into which May Mutchler of this place, was thrown during the progress of one of the meetings.

The trance has continued through many days and in it Miss Mutchler has been able to communicate with the inhabitants of the supernatural world, she says.

While she lies at home with her eyes closed, seemingly unable to see or to speak, she writes messages to her relatives and friends.

According to the messages which she writes every day, she is fully conscious of a distinct separation of her body and her soul. The soul, she says, journeys through infinite space and communicates at will with bright beings that have no prototypes on earth.

Rev. A. A. Athington, the California evangelist, who is in charge of the meetings there, pronounces Miss Mutchler's trance to be the most marvelous affair of which he has ever heard.

OCEANIDES

A Psychical Novel.—Price Paper, Cover, 50 Cents.

This great novel is written with a distinct purpose, to set forth certain phases of spirit life and experience, as related to the gifted and inspired author. The question of soul mates, or of the united male and female constituting the completed ego or angel, is advanced as a vital truth of spirit experience in the higher realms. The work radiates a good spiritual influence, and is very interesting.

It is a spiritual book for Spiritualists, and interesting for everyone.

MARY ANNE CAREW

Wife, Mother, Spirit, Angel.—Neat Cloth Cover, Price $1.00.

This great work relates the experiences of a young wife and mother, early called to the portals of death. It is very realistic, and the narrative is charmingly natural, and beautiful in its tone of sweetness. It brings that other world very near to us; the comfort it brings to those bereaved of the dear ones of the home and family, is beyond one's power to describe. All readers will be charmed with it as well as spiritually aided and uplifted.

COMMON SENSE By Thomas Paine. A Revolutionary pamphlet, addressed to the inhabitants of America in 1776, with explanatory notice by an English author. Paper. 15 cents.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. Is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

The Long Contest Ended.

The United States Senate, by a vote of 42 to 28, has rejected the four years' effort to unseat Senator Reed Smoot from that body, on the false pretense that he was a polygamist. Was not the real motive of the thousands of women who signed the petitions to oust the Senator, because he is a Mormon?

While politics, as such, has no place in the office or columns of The Progressive Thinker, we cannot avoid the expression, it will be a sad day in American history when any system of religion, however worthy, shall gain the ascendancy in Congress, and shall exclude therefrom members for no offence other than holding religious opinions adverse to those of the majority.

Ours is a secular government. It was founded by the fathers of the Republic, and secured as such, by constitutional provision, and that provision must be perpetuated at any cost. The religious views of members cannot be legally inquired into by Congress. Actions, not opinions, must continue the standard of merit, and the most offensive heretic is the peer of the most orthodox in that body.

"Louder" Was the Demand.

Kant, the German philosopher, said:

"Apart from moral conduct, all that man thinks himself able to do to become acceptable to God, is mere superstition and religious folly."

This reminds us of a young man who, a Methodist, upwards of sixty years ago, offered to educate for the ministry. Telling a friend of the proposition, and expressing doubt of his ability to occupy such a position, he was met with the assurance: "There is no danger of a failure. Should you gain a position in the pulpit, noise ensures success. If you find your discourses are not satisfactory, raise your voice a little higher, increasing it as needs demand. When you reach the proper key you will stand at the head of the clerical profession."

It is a pleasure to note a great revolution has swept over the country during the last half century, and the successful Methodist minister now needs partially educated brains to fit him for his position. A senseless clanging of words has ceased to charm modern ears.

They Need the Money.

"A New York man of God added a lady whistler to his church's attractions, and found a notable increase in his congregation. This policy may develop until a professional boxing-match figures on the program. One pugilist might 'knock spots' off another, and then the minister might go into the pulpit and knock spots off the devil."

The above is copied from the Freethinker, London. The Progressive Thinker related the same fact some time ago in its columns in regard to the introduction of a lady whistler as a church attraction, to enlarge attendance on divine service. And, why not? We are told, Isaiah 7:18—"The Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt." The Bible commentators agree in saying: "The Hebrew word there rendered 'hiss' is equivalent to whistle, and should have been so translated." If the Lord God is a whistler the introduction of that native music in church service must have filled him with delight.

But the editor of the Freethinker, as a suggestive prophet, must come to the front. He said: "This policy [the whistling] may develop until a professional boxing match figures on the program." This has already been accomplished, and one victim was "knocked out" at the expense of his life as a consequence, as related in these columns two weeks ago.

A God Government.

A theocracy is a government which pretends to be administered by God, under the immediate supervision of a priesthood. The high priest claims to be in direct communication with the Supreme, and every act of his is ascribed to God.

A people whose history is believed to be wholly fictitious, known to moderns as Jews, are credited with having been subjects of a theocracy.

If there were such a people as the Jews, and they were God-governed, if the Old Testament literature can be trusted as historical, they were but one remove from savages in their beginning, and were the worst governed nation ever known to history. They were first presented to us as slaves in Egypt, where they were held 430 years. Then, after their escape to Palestine—without entering into details,—consult Cruden's Unabridged Concordance where book, chapter and verse are cited for authority, under the title, "Captivity," and we there read that during the reign of the "Judges," embracing a period of 320 years, the Jews were six times in captivity. Then, during the reign of Sennacherib, the Assyrian king, they were plundered, and defeated in battle three times. The third time their city was burned, and the people, "with hooks in their noses," were taken to Babylon, where they were held as slaves for seventy years. Later, Pompey, at the head of the Roman army, overran Judea, and placed Antigonus on the throne. They were finally destroyed 1837 years ago, by Titus, the few survivors were sold into slavery, or removed to Rome to grace the gladiatorial feats in the amphitheatre for the amusement of the people.

Thus eleven times certain, these pets of Jehovah, and God-governed at that, passed into bondage, and were finally completely destroyed, and should have disappeared from history, and would, but for the imposition of the Phenicians in their place, who, ignorant of their own history, are posing as Jews.

God gave to Abraham and Isaac, and strengthened the gift by an oath to Jacob, that they and their seed should possess Canaan forever. Instead, even those who are simulating the Jews, are scattered world-wide over other nations. They are wanderers among strangers, no country anywhere peculiarly their own.

The Old Testament is represented as a record of God's covenant with the Jews. Read it carefully, and see how these people were favored. Prof. Millard, in his Travels in the Holy Land, p. 257:

"Most of the Jews in Jerusalem and other parts of Palestine, are of Spanish or Polish origin. Most of the former are descendants of such as were driven out of Spain in the 16th century, and who fled at that time into Palestine."

Had Prof. Millard traced the origin of these "Jews" still farther, he would have found they were descendants of the Phenician colonies established in Carthage 900 years before our era, and who, in turn, crossed the Straits of Gibraltar, and had numerous colonies along both banks of the Guadelquiver towards central Spain.

Near the southwest angle of the supposed site of the ancient temple in Jerusalem is a narrow, crooked lane, terminating in a small open space; there the self-styled Jews "purchased the right," says Millard, to assemble, pray, and wail over the ruins of their city, and the downfall of their nation; and this is all that remains of the Jewish theocracy, and probably, its people.

May we not hope that Judea will be the last God-governed country on earth, if this of Bible fame is an exponent of his earthly government of humanity?

Saint Valentine's Day.

Valentine's Day, that annually occurs on the 14th of February, is a relic of Roman paganism. Like all other Christian holidays and festal days, it is coming more to the front as Catholicism gains influence with us. Soon these sacred days will be as numerous as saints in a Catholic calendar.

The feast of Luperculla was observed in ancient Rome on the 14th of February in each year. During the revel each member placed the name of a favorite lady friend in a box. After being well shaken and the names mixed the reveler drew his partner for the ensuing year. This selection was made in imitation of the birds which are claimed to select their mates at this time.

Christians found it impossible, say their apologists, to arrest this heathen practice, so they adopted it as theirs, just as the Saturnalia was made the birthday of their Jesus, and as the Easter day was made to do service as the period of his resurrection, and just as every other pagan festal day was adopted as theirs, and made to appear some way identified with "our Lord."

Forcefully Presented.

Who is there who does not sympathize with Ingersoll, when he said?—

"And suppose after all, that death does end all. Next to eternal joy, next to being forever with those we love and those who have loved us—next to that, is to be wrapt in the dreamless drapery of eternal peace. Next to eternal life is eternal sleep.

"I would rather think of those I have loved, and lost, as having returned to earth, as having become a part of the elemental wealth of the world; I would rather think of them as unconscious dust; I would rather dream of them as gurgling in the stream, floating in the clouds, bursting in light upon the shores of other worlds; I would rather think of them as the lost visions of a forgotten night, than to have the faintest fear that their naked souls have been clutched by an orthodox God."

THE GREAT WORK.

Mr. Lyman C. Howe, in the next number of The Progressive Thinker, will conclude his review of The Great Work. He has presented his views in a remarkably lucid and forceful manner, showing that age or sickness has not diminished in the least his remarkable reasoning powers.

PROF. W. M. LOCKWOOD.

Next week we will publish an exceptionally interesting article from him on "Divorce, a Sublime Factor of Natural Evolution; Its Meaning in an Etymological, Physical and Legal Sense."

He will deeply interest our readers next week with an illustrated article on "THE KINGDOM OF THE UNSEEN."

FURTHER EXPLANATIONS

In Regard to the Works of Andrew Jackson Davis.

To the Editor:—In my letter you kindly published a few weeks ago, I tried to express my thanks and hearty appreciation of your voluntary efforts in behalf of my list of books, now out of print. Recently you reasonably explained why you would discontinue such efforts, and now I learn that, notwithstanding your discontinuance of the notice calling for subscribers to full sets of the books ($20 per set of 29 volumes), that you are still receiving the names and addresses of persons who desire to purchase as soon as the works are again in print.

Now my aim in writing you this letter is to express my thankfulness to you first of all, and next, to most gratefully thank the loving and intelligent subscribers, and lastly, to ask you to request all interested to withhold their names until there shall appear in your prosperous Progressive Thinker another announcement and another call. As was fully explained in my former letter, let it be remembered that I am not the owner of my plates, having sold them out and out to the Banner of Light Publishing Company; that a pledge was given, properly signed by the president, secretary and treasurer of that company to keep all the books perpetually in print and accessible to the public, that, a few months subsequently, the treasurer and chief manager of the Banner company, for some unknown causes, committed suicide, which was like an earthquake shock to all interests concerned.

Soon after this unhappy event, the entire establishment went into the hands of another manager, and now, under the style and control of another company which seems more completely inactive, the plates are practically hidden away and unused for printed editions. They are classed among the "assets" of the present management. My business relation to the party or parties, is simply that of a common creditor. At my advanced age it is not wise for me to again own the plates as I have during the past thirty years.

Under these circumstances, and amid some unspeakable complications it becomes necessary to "keep an even mind," and watch the legal or other steps which, sooner or later, under the guidance of good and true minds in this world and in the other, wait and see the salvation and solution of the whole matter.

I feel confident that the books will be in print before the completion of the Panama canal!

There is one fundamental consolation, namely, the books are in the world; they are in numerous private and public libraries, and their light "can not be hid under a bushel." Besides, behold what an immense crop of books has come into the world from the fertile fields presided over and harvested by our inspired authors in Spiritualism on both sides of the Atlantic! So whatever "happens," the universal education and spiritual development of all mankind is abundantly assured. A. J. DAVIS.

Poison and Its Antidote.

We stated last week that a great movement is on foot to Christianize Japan. It comes from outside interneddlers, and will gain but little support beyond the humblest classes. But the antidote follows close along the trail of missionaries. Mr. Hayashi, late ambassador from Japan to England, has translated Thomas Paine's Age of Reason into his native tongue, and it is probable it will be scattered broadcast over the Japanese empire. "Let truth and error grapple. Who ever knew Truth to lose anything in a free and open encounter with Error?" "As the circling ripples dance away from a stone flung into a pool, so Truth will radiate until falsehood hides in obscurity among the bogs of ignorance."

Not Good for Business Purposes.

Wonder what relation was the man who never told a lie without first saying a prayer, to the newspaper publisher who opens his office each morning with prayer? And were each of the parties connected with the Chicago bank that commenced business every morning by asking for God's protection during the day, and soon failed for some $400,000? Prayers may be a good thing, but it does not seem worth a cent for banking and business purposes.

Maybe God has no more qualifications as a banker, or for the newspaper business than he had when at the head of the Jewish government. He made a terrible failure in bossing that job.

Reason must be our last guide and judge in everything.—John Locke.

'The Psychic Riddle.'

Another Important Book by That Profound Thinker, Dr. I. K. Funk.

A remarkable collection of psychic or Spiritualistic experiences [as set forth in a review by the Chicago Record-Herald] is contained in "The Psychic Riddle," by Dr. Isaac K. Funk, of Funk & Wagnalls, publishers, which has just been brought out. Dr. Funk gives many startling stories of messages from the dead. He declares he is not a Spiritualist in the accepted sense of the word. He is interested deeply in psychic research, however, he says, 'because it seems more and more likely that by these efforts may be discovered marvelous powers of the human soul not yet recognized fully by the science of psychology, as telepathy, clairvoyance, prescience, secondary personalities, cure of diseases by hypnotic suggestions, etc., and by them also much new light may be thrown upon many forms of insanity."

In one chapter of the book, Dr. Funk repeats a remarkable story told him by a friend well known as author, physician and publisher. It is a story of his own personal experience.

Asserts He Left Body.

He is convinced that one evening while in Florida, he actually passed out of his body, and yet retained a most vivid conscious existence. In the few hours of his discarnate state he visited the family of a friend a thousand miles distant, saw what they were doing and heard them talk, was recognized and spoken to by his friend, and after other experiences he returned and by a supreme effort of the will he re-entered the body and regained control if it. He gives this important corroboration of the story: The following morning he wrote a letter to his distant friend narrating his experience at his home, what he there saw the family do and what he heard them say. And the distant friend that same morning wrote to him narrating how he had seen him in his room the night before, and what he had said to him, and that now he was greatly alarmed lest some misfortune had befallen him. These two letters crossed each other in transit. Dr. Funk says:

"It should be remembered that this story is told by a trained physician who knows the symptoms of approaching death, and who is an experienced psychologist. How much more satisfactory it would be to the reader, and certainly to the scientist, were I permitted to give the name and address of this physician, the name and location of his freind, and other details of his strange experience. But, no, this physician feels that he must hide his identity under anonymity, as publicity of this sort would hurt him professionally."

Banker Has Experiences.

Another friend who has taken Dr. Funk into his confidence is the head of an extensive banking house. "His name is known from Penobscot Bay to the Golden Gate as a synonym for veracity and level-headedness." He, too, declines to permit his name to appear in support of certain personal psychic experiences.

"For," says he, "my board of directors would be startled and many of our customers would feel their confidence shaken in my sagacity."

The new book, in short, is a collection of the experiences of himself and his friends in connection with spiritualist mediums and of comment upon them. There is none more interesting than the story of what happened to Walter Hubbell, an actor, in the Spiritual Temple, in Boston, where Rev. Mr. Wiggin was officiating as speaker and medium. It had been stated that Mr. Wiggin is controlled by the spirit of John McCullough, whom Hubbell had known in the flesh. So Hubbell took a piece of blue paper of a peculiar shade, and with purple ink wrote these words upon it:

"John McCulloch, do you remember this: 'Does no one speak? I am defendant here!"

Mr. Wiggin sat blindfolded in the center of the stage when Mr. Hubbell entered the hall. The various questions sent up by the audience were dumped out of the baskets upon the table in front of Mr. Wiggin.

Replies to the Question.

After Wiggin had given a number of answers to the writers he stopped for a moment and said:

"Friends, I wish to say that I, the spirit of John McCullough, the actor, control this medium, and that some person in the audience has written some words I often spoke upon the stage in earth life, upon a piece of paper, asking me if I remember them. I know the person who asks this question well, and he has appeared upon the stage with me. The words he asks about I spoke for years before Appius Claudius in the Forum scene, of the fourth act, of 'Virginius,' after my return from battle, and they are: 'Does no one speak? I am defendant here!' The paper containing them is now upon the table, and I have not touched it."

Mr. Hubbell continues his story as follows:

"I replied that this was all correct. He then addressed me and said: 'And you have been in that same play?' To which I replied: 'Yes, but not with you, John, but with another.' And he answered, or rather affirmed my statement by saying: 'Yes, I know that.' All of which is the truth, I having appeared with him in 'Coriolanus,' 'Jack Cade,' and 'The Gladiator,' but never in 'Virginius,' appearing afterward as Appius Claudius, when another man played Virginius after John had passed away."

Tells of Edwin Forrest.

The seance then proceeded, letters being answered for a score or more of persons. Mr. Wiggin being blindfolded all the while, as from the first, with a black silk handkerchief. When I heard him remark that the sance would soon close, I said: 'John, may I ask you a question?' He replying in the affirmative, I asked if he had met Edwin Forrest in the spirit world. The answer was, 'Often.' I then asked if Forrest was now happy. He replied that no man knew Forrest better than he did in earth life, and that he knew Forrest's surrounding conditions made him, while on the earth plane, unhappy, but that now he was with people who understood him and that he was contented."

Wiggins or McCullough, as you will, concluded his conversation with Hubbell by remarking that there were but few tragedians on the stage, owing to the strange ideas of the managers, who were wrong about it.

Dr. Funk begs not to be misunderstood. He does not claim that Spiritualism has been scientifically demonstrated. "I say exactly the contrary, believing that we are many miles distant from such a demonstration. What I do say is that such a demonstration is to my mind, after nearly thirty years of investigation, far more likely than are the probabilities that Spiritualism is not true; that the proofs in favor of its truth are much stronger than those against it; that to-day, as the proofs stand, a man is more logical, more sane, in accepting the spiritualistic belief of the communion of spirits through the physical sensories than he is in rejecting it."

WELCOME NEWS.

Hopes Are Entertained That the Philanthropic Spiritualist, Theodore J. Mayer, Will Recover—Letter From the Secretary.

February 26, 1907—To the Editor:—In the name of the N. S. A. and its beloved Treasurer, we thank you for the tender mention you make of Mr. Theodore J. Mayer in a late issue of your paper. It is true that he is very ill, and that only the most devoted care on part of attendants, medical and otherwise, the undivided aid of the Spirit hosts who love him, the good thoughts of his numerous friends on earth, and his own indomitable will and cheerfulness, can bring him back to a point of physical safety and health.

All of these aids he has in abundance, and yet we cannot be but anxious and wait with almost bated breath for the moment when all can be assured that he is on firm and secure ground of convalescence. Our good friend is cheerful, tranquil and in the finest condition of mental health.

That angel as well as mortal influence and magnetism are with him we can all believe; his good works have been many. Not only do Spiritualists all over the land, and especially poor and aged mediums, have great cause to bless him, but also those who well know of his many benefactions outside our ranks, private and public, hail him as a grand man who cannot be spared from this field of action and love.

Hospital philanthropy, Educational College work in the District of Columbia, and other noble objects for human good, have been largely forwarded by Mr. Mayer. He is not a Rockefeller in means, but according to his money and opportunity, he has done far more for the world's advancement than any multimillionaire has thought it possible for himself to do. Those who know Mr. Mayer best love him most; they cry out for his recovery, for his continued life in the mortal for many years.

"WE CANNOT BEAR TO HAVE A GIANT IN GOODNESS PASS FROM EARTH; HE IS NEEDED HERE."

The writer of these lines is daily receiving letters from personal friends of the sick man, and from others who know of him, expressing their prayers and hopes for his restoration to health; already in many public meetings silent and potent prayers have been offered in his behalf; thousands of human hearts are blessing him and asking for his return to physical strength.

GOD AND THE ANGELS BLESS HIM WE KNOW; THOUSANDS OF MORTALS DO LIKEWISE.

SAMMY.

Two years old, and going on three,
Square and chubby, and bold was he.
Gladly he heard his mother say:
"Don't bother me, child, go out and play!"

For out on the street were other tots,
Vaguely forming their baby plots,
And babies are better chums, God knows,
Than a sobbing woman who sews and sews.

Out on the street where traffic swirled,
Sammy dreamed of a strange, new world,
For the streets joined a hilltop far away—
A hill that he meant to climb some day,
But the street-car man was large and gruff,
And the teamster-man had troubles enough,
So they paid no heed to Sammy's shrill
"P'ease, Mister, take me up the hill."

He asked a man on a touring car,
But the man was busy, as tourists are;
He asked a coachman, in livery trim,
But the coachman only glared at him;
He asked a mounted policeman, too,
With shiny buttons and coat of blue,
The mounted policeman shook his head
And over the pavement swiftly sped,
But Sammy was brave and pleaded still:
"P'ease, Mister, take me up the hill."

One fine morning—the air was clear—
Sammy thought that the hill seemed near;
And while he was hailing a truckman grim
His baby feet proved false to him,
And the people knew, as the car ground past,
Sammy had climbed the hill at last.

Honor to the Memory of Bruno.

Ten thousand persons, says the Truth Seeker, marched through the streets of Rome on February 17, and on reaching the Campo dei Fiori deposited floral wreaths on the monument of Bruno which stands there. An address was delivered by Signor Ferri.

Bruno, English Brown, lived only three hundred years in advance of his time. His name, like a multitude of others, will ever be remembered as evidence of the brutal character of the church, when clothed with power.

Dead, Aged Seventy-five Years.

"Do not believe because a thing is old, because it is found in so-called holy books, because it was believed by ancestors, because it is believed by the majority of men, because it is believed by learned men, because it may agree with your preconceived ideas; believe it only if it agrees with reason, and you find it useful for your progress."

MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Suggestions Solicited—Plans Invited—Donations Welcomed.

"Watchman, tell us of the night, what its signs of promise are." Verbal and written inquiries are being made as to the future of the Morris Pratt Institute. It will not follow the mortal form of Moses Hull into dissolution, but rather, like his uncaged spirit, enter upon the realities of an enduring resurrection.

Sixteen students are enrolled upon its roster of attendance for the current year. Never have its running expenses been so minimized as at the present time, because of the gratuitous services and personal sacrifices of Prof. and Mrs. Weaver, and Mr. and Mrs. Hull. Both couples have given their time and strength for love of the cause and from prophetic foregleams of the future in the distance.

Time can be taken for the choice of a successor to Brother Hull as President. That position need not be filled until the right man or woman is found for it. In the meantime the work of the Educational department will be safe under the supervision of Professor Weaver, its present Principal. Give the institution a board of trustees composed of practical business men and women who are not strangers to the work of education. The president of the board need not be a member of the faculty, or teaching force.

Oratory and physical culture cannot be in better hands than those of Mrs. Niver.

A strong and comprehensive Psychic Department is needed—one that grasps the truths of mortal systems of psychology and substitutes for their mistakes the better lessons of the teachers on the higher planes of spirit life. Its principal aim should not be to make every student merely a medium but to teach each one how to attain the fullest unfoldment of mental and soul powers possible for the individual, and make all such real helpers of humanity as well as instruments for spirit intelligences. Right living of life on this sphere is a perfect fitting for the next one to follow. Money for the maintenance of such a department will depend largely upon a wise choice of its special teacher. Who in the United States is our best fitted instructor for such work?

The mission of the Institute is not alone to fit future workers to proclaim Spiritualism from the platform. Only a minority of students at our denominational colleges enter the ministry of the sects maintaining them, but the most of them as laymen and lay-women either in social and home life, or in the business and professional world, work efficiently for upbuilding the denomination that educated them. We need educated Spiritualists in all the avenues of life as well as upon our platforms.

Make the Morris Pratt Institute self-sustaining by increasing the numbers of its students. At its recent Chicago Mass-meeting, the Illinois State Association adopted without dissent Thomas Grimshaw's suggestion, and decided to pay one student's tuition for a two-years' course at the Pratt Institute, one hundred dollars. Will every other State Association do likewise? Numbers of Spiritualists are able and should be willing to contribute fifty dollars a year for the tuition of worthy young men and young women at Whitewater. That sum will encourage some deserving person to undertake the struggle for better self-equipment. A large percentage of the pupils in our public schools do not continue beyond the grammar grade. Many come from country districts, or if in the more pretentious ones of town and city, are forced by circumstances to begin the struggle for a living and withdrawn from school. The Academic Course at the Pratt Institute is not only open to all such, but to those who, because they did not appreciate and improve the opportunities of youth, now bitterly realize their deficiencies, and are grasping for help. Students in special courses are also welcomed there and benefited by the instructions given.

"Those only deserve a monument who do not need one," Haslitt has said, while Hawthorne wrote, "No man who needs a monument ever ought to have one?" Moses Hull needs neither massive shaft nor sounding eulogies to preserve his memory, but his labors for Truth, lo, these many years, deserves to be perpetuated by the endowment and maintenance of the Morris Pratt Institute.

I invite criticisms of the present methods, and suggestions for the future welfare of the School. Whenever so desired the personality of the writer will not be revealed. I will undertake to prepare everything of that nature for the consideration of the board of trustees at its spring meeting.

SPIRIT RETURN CONFIRMED.

In a Spirit Message the Missing Man Tells His Sweetheart He died in the Larchmont Wreck—Brother Declares Words of Comfort Come Through Him From World Beyond the Grave.

Through remarkable messages from the spirit world, which she says she has received, Miss Mary O'Brien, who lives at N. 29 Quincy street, Somerville, is assured that her sweetheart, Thomas Dixon, whom she was to have wedded the Sunday following Easter, went to death in the wreck of the Joy Line steamer, Larchmont, on February 11.

Frederick Dixon, brother of Thomas Dixon, who has been missing ever since the Larchmont foundered, says that he has heard four times from his brother. The brother says that Thomas perished when the boat sank, but that his spirit is happy in the world beyond the grave.

"Tell my girl not to be worrying. I am dead and am resting comfortably," was the message from across the dark divide, according to the missing man's brother. This communication came to the Dixon home on February 12, at noon, shortly after the family had learned of the fate of the vessel. They feared that Thomas Dixon was aboard, and Mary O'Brien had gone to them with her heart full of woe for comfort.

And yesterday, seemingly in confirmation of this message, which the brother asserted he received from his brother in the spirit world, came a letter from James A. De Bell, president of Cigar Maker's Union No. 1., of Providence, stating that on the day the Larchmont sailed for death, Thomas Dixon had come to the office of the union for a loan, and had left to board the New York Joy line boat.

"Four messages have I received from my brother Thomas," said Frederick Dixon, who lives at No. 1 Portland St., Cambridge, to a Boston American reporter.

"The first was in the nature of a warning that something had happened. It came on Tuesday morning, February 12, about two hours after the wreck. I was asleep, when suddenly I was awakened by a rushing sound as though a million of small stones were slipping down a steep hillside.

"I got up and called out: 'Any trouble?' I received no answer, and still no sounds continued. About 4 o'clock the noises died away and I was able to sleep.

"The next morning came the story of the wreck. We knew that Tom had started for Providence to take the boat for New York, where he was going to look for work. Soon Mary O'Brien, whom Tom was to marry on the Sunday after Easter, came crying to the house saying: 'Tom, Tom: I won't believe it!'

"I went into my office at noon and called: 'Tom, Tom, Tom,' and soon a voice, his voice, said: 'Tell my girl not to be worrying. I am dead. I am resting comfortably. I am in a boat on the right side of it. I was going to get out of my room and I got into another where some children were. It was too late for me to get out. You will see my body, but not all of my body. Tell mother and all of the family not to be worrying. Everything is for the best.'

'Then the voice was heard no more and I knew I was alone. I hastened to the family and to Mary O'Brien, Tom's sweetheart, and told them all. This was in my own house in Portland street.

"That same Tuesday, it was at night, I was at my mother's, No. 149 Harvard street, Cambridge. I went into the parlor where Tom's picture was hanging. The folks were all in the kitchen awaiting me. I called three times:

"Tom, Tom, Tom.'

"Suddenly, standing right in front of me was my brother, smiling and clad as he was when he left home. He looked well and happy. 'Anything to say?' I asked him.

"'Very little," he responded in natural tones.

"'What is it you've got to say?' I demanded. 'Everybody is in the kitchen waiting for my news. Is your body in Providence or not?'

"'No, my body is not in Providence," he said. 'Tell my family not to be crying. You will see my body just the same again.'

"Then the smile faded from his lips and he vanished. I called him again and again, but I got no further message or sign.

"On the Friday following I was in Monahan's undertaking rooms, in Providence, with my brother George, who had come over from New York to help me look for the body. There were ten dead bodies in the room where we were.

"'Tom!' I cried three times.

The room grew chill, and I knew a spirit had come.

"'Don't worry, Fred,' said Tom's voice. 'I know you are doing the best you can to please my family. If anybody asks for me give them my best word. Make them feel good about me, Fred, let me rest. Good-bye.—Hearst's Boston American.

The Unknown Life of Christ.

A New edition of the Unknown Life of Christ is just from the press, and we are able to supply all demands. For the benefit of new subscribers we have added thereto two remarkable lectures, one by Prof. Henry S. Olcott, and the other by Miss Elizabeth Harlow, on the "Dangers of Psychism," a very valuable, attractive and instructive addition to this excellent book, and which should be carefully read by every Spiritualist, investigator and occult student in the land. This book is gotten up in fine style, and the additions thereto will enable it to serve a double purpose. It is still sent out as an absolute gift to all who send in $1.00 for The Progressive Thinker one year, and 10 cents in stamps to pay postage on the book.

Lyceums, Attention!

Help us to obtain a complete list of all lyceums before March 31. Since my former request many have complied and sent list and report, but am sure there are more to hear from. Those who have reported are as follows: Los Angeles, Cal.; Parkland, Pa.; Chesaning, Mich.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Decatur, Iowa; Portland, Me.; Portland, Ore.; Galveston, Tex.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Billings, Mont.; San Diego, Cal.; Hoboken, N. J.; St. Louis, Mo.; Seattle, Wash.; Rupert, Ark.; Washington, D. C. So you see the list is growing. Send in the name of your lyceum and the number of children or adults who are members. Address me during March and April, at 180 Calhoun street, Battle Creek, Mich.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Having been directed to carry on the work of Editor-at-Large in connection with the N. S. A., I am desirous of obtaining all press notices for or against Spiritualism, and reliable information with regard to attacks upon our movement that may be made by preachers. I respectfully request all Spiritualists to forward the same to me at their earliest convenience.

Blessings and Dangers of Psychism.

The Two Sides Presented.

Mr. E. W. Sprague, one of the foremost leaders in the ranks of Spiritualism, issues a "Clarion Call to the Spiritualists of America," in which the dark shades of Pessimism appear to a certain extent. While Spiritualism as an organized body may not be advancing as rapidly as many would like to have it, yet Spirit Return, one of the most important facts in existence, is increasing everywhere, and is receiving attention as never before in the history of the world. Of course Spiritualism has its Dark Side in connection with vicious or densely ignorant controls, as vividly portrayed by the well-known Dr. Wickland, and that should receive more attention on the part of prominent workers everywhere than it is at the present time.

A CLARION CALL.

To the Spiritualists of America.

At this time, when there is so much adverse criticism and general agitation going on inside and outside our movement, perhaps it would be well for Spiritualists to stop a moment to consider the situation.

The extreme fight that is being made against fraud in our ranks has driven many a worker into the silence. Not because the fraud was exposed, but because the worker did not feel strong enough to battle against our foes who are trying to make it appear that Spiritualism is nothing but fraud. Their efforts ought not to intimidate a single worker, but all true Spiritualists should assist in clearing our ranks of that class of people who do actually practice fraud in the name of Spiritualism. But much harm has been done to our honest and innocent mediums in the prosecution of this necessary work.

A great many who were not firmly grounded in the knowledge of the truth of Spiritualism have given up their investigation and postponed active work rather than continue to fight for the truth.

The vicious condemnation of mediumship by "our friends the enemy," notably the writer of "The Great Psychological Crime" and those of his class, have frightened not a few of our young and undeveloped mediums from continuing their development. Some of them have been frightened almost into believing that their dear spirit parents, other relatives, friends, and "spirit guides," would be transplanted by "demons," "devils," "evil spirits," "elementals," etc. These and other things of which I will not now speak, have injured the progress of our movement.

There is not the usual enthusiasm manifested in certain localities. The circulation of our Spiritualist newspapers has suffered. Some people have lost interest and have ceased to become subscribers to them, and one or two of these heralds of our beautiful philosophy have suspended or died, and there may be danger of others doing likewise if Spiritualists are not awakened to the true state of affairs.

Another great reason for this condition of our Spiritualist newspapers is that so many Spiritualists are taking some one or more of the large number of magazines that teach our philosophy under another name, such as "Mental Science," "Natural Science," "New Thought," etc., yet never giving credit to the source of their information which of course, is Spiritualism.

A short time ago I was called to a village where a nice little society flourishes. It was one of those that we organized and instructed to form reading classes, which they did, and through which they have abundantly proved that it is the proper way to make a success of a society that is not strong enough to employ a regular speaker. Here I found that a club of twenty-five subscribers (all Spiritualists) had been procured for one of the New Thought magazines at a nominal price. And when I asked the question, "How many of them take a Spiritualist paper?" I was told that three only were now taking them.

I asked several of the number if they were subscribers to our Spiritual papers and the replies were about as follows: "Well, no! I used to take The Progressive Thinker, the Sunflower, (or some other Spiritualist paper, naming it), but since taking the ——— (the new thought magazine referred to) my time of subscription has expired and I have neglected to subscribe for it."

These Spiritualists who do not have the Spiritualist papers to read, of course are not posted regarding the movements of our mediums and speakers, and the work of the National, state and local societies; some of them had not seen the report of the N. S. A. convention, and in fact they were cut off from contact with our great movement at large. If this state of things is continued, many are liable to lose interest in the great work of our organization, at least to a greater or lesser extent.

Spiritualists, arouse yourselves! Subscribe for the Spiritualist papers and magazines at once! Don't let them languish and die while you are giving your support to others who seldom mention the name of a medium of give credit to Spiritualism for one thing that they teach, though they know full well that much of it belongs to it, that it has been heralding these truths to the world for the last fifty-eight years.

Subscribe for the Spiritualist papers and magazines! Join a Spiritualist Society if you are not already a member of one, and show your hand! Stand up and be counted! The Spiritualist census is being taken now; will you be among those that help to swell the number? You will not unless you belong to a society. Join one now if you are not already a member, even though you have to go five hundred miles to do it. And when you have joined a society and subscribed for a Spiritualist paper, take hold and work for the best cause on earth, namely, Modern Spiritualism. Let the world know through your voice and pen, through every act and deed, that you are a Spiritualist and stand for it in its white-robed purity every hour of your life.

If you have children, or friends that you wish to have prepared for the grand work of Spiritualism, send them to the Morris Pratt Institute, at Whitewater, Wis. And if you have none to send, then send your contribution to help support the school.

Let us wake up to the needs of our cause and do what we ought to do to help it along. If all that can and should will do this, our cause will, in power, in numbers, and in good works, and its blessings, increase ten fold.

Spiritualists, please think this over, and act without delay and greater victories for our cause and its great truths will be your reward.

E. W. SPRAGUE.

Detroit, Mich.

Our good Brother Sprague takes a PESSIMISTIC view of the present status of Spiritualism in this country, and in so doing he is somewhat mistaken. He candidly deplores the existence of fraud in our ranks, but entertains the opinion, however, that the efforts to suppress the same have proved injurious to our Cause when exploited side by side with those on the outside who consider all alleged spirit manifestations to be spurious or the result of trickery or legerdemain; just as if the exposure of uncleanliness in any condition of life had a tendency to injure that condition; just as if to expose to the light of day wrongdoing would greatly injure that light; just as if to bring forth the fraud which has been in our ranks from time to time, would injure the influence of our Cause instead of making it more potent for good.

In fact, all exposures of uncleanliness have a tendency to benefit the Sect, the Club, the Municipality, the State or Nation with which it is connected. Letting rottenness, graft, etc., alone, would in the end result in most disastrous consequences. Their exposure always makes the way brighter for humanity, always makes the spiritual atmosphere clearer.

The Progressive Thinker office is the CENTRAL MAGNET of this Great Movement in connection with data in reference to exhibiting its actual status or condition.

Mr. Sprague deplores the condition of the Spiritual press, hinting at the untimely demise of the Banner of Light and the Religio-Philosophical Journal, and thinking that others might soon follow in the same direction. The fact is the Banner of Light's death was caused by business methods that bordered on actual stupidity and gross incompetency so closely that they seemed to become a part of the paper. Those acquainted with all the facts of the case said, "No wonder it died!" and in no sense was a waning Spiritualism responsible therefor.

As to the Philosophical Journal, for years it had been a mere pretense of a Spiritualist paper, amounting to almost absolutely nothing, its diminutive size preventing it from publishing one-twentieth of the current news in our ranks. Where business STUPIDITY or INCOMPETENCY are connected with any Spiritualist paper, sooner or later it will die in consequence, and our Cause is in no wise responsible therefor.

Now as to The Progressive Thinker. Never before in its entire history has it been more prosperous than at present. During the month of January the receipts for subscriptions (usually about $1,500) reached $2,000, a larger amount by about $500 than ever came to this office in the same length of time, and a larger amount BY FAR than any other Spiritualist paper ever received during one month.

Mr. Sprague says that "the vicious condemnation of mediumship by 'our friends, the enemy,' notably the writer of The Great Psychological Crime, and those of his class, have frightened not a few of our young and undeveloped mediums from continuing their development."

It is not our intention here to in any way defend The Great Psychological Crime, or "Obsession," by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the latter citing case after case where a PSYCHOLOGICAL CRIME was so plainly committed by the controlling spirit that any one with a modicum of brains could sense the facts of the case. In this city we have given advice to many who had vicious controls, and pointed out the way of cure. Many of the cases were most pitiable.

Only a few days ago a lady called at this office to describe a most deplorable obsession on the part of a friend. She had purchased an OUIJA BOARD, and at the first sitting it wrote for her; then followed automatic writing; then clairaudience, and then no end of annoyance for the woman—truly a case of demoniac possession.

"Ah! Dangers of Psychism!" Yes, for a person with the temperament and nervous system of this lady, and to hide that fact from the world would be criminal, would be an insult to common sense, to truth and the angel world. When the time arrives that we are compelled to hide truth from our readers, we will retire from business, and let some one else do that dirty, contemptible work, for which we are not in the least fitted.

Under certain conditions of health, or of extreme nervous tension, vicious controls may take possession and raise a literal h—ll for the medium in the process of development, constituting a Psychological Crime in the highest and broadest sense of those two remarkable words, and making a muddle of the darkest kind for Spiritualists to consider.

Dr. Peebles's voluminous work on "OBSESSION" contains evidence that is OVERWHELMING of demoniac control in certain cases in connection with mediumship. Dr. Wickland of this city, an educated physician, and many others, will corroborate Dr. Peebles in his assertions, and the lecturer who has never seen a case of vicious or demoniac control, his experience must have been extremely limited.

But this dark side to Spiritualism, as exploited by Dr. J. M. Peebles, known the world over, sinks into comparatively small dimensions when the intrinsic beauty and grandeur of our cause is portrayed by our Cora L. V. Richmond, Mrs. M. T. Longley, Hudson Tuttle, Dr. A. J. Davis, W. J. Colville, Dr. George Fuller, Mrs. Russegue, C. Dawbarn, Miss Elizabeth Harlow, H. D. Barrett, Dr. G. B. Warne, Mr. Wiggin, Mr. Edgerly, Mr. Brooks, Prof. Lockwood, Mr. Erwood, Mr. Grimshaw, E. W. Sprague, C. Fannie Allyn, Susie C. Clarke, Lyman C. Howe, Mr. Sprague and many others EQUALLY AS PROMINENT we might name if space permitted. Under the radiance of their names and the influence they exert, Spiritualism stands forth as a prominent LEADING LIGHT of the world, a light burning with divine radiance, notwithstanding the fraud and graft, and cases of demoniac possession in our ranks.

True it is that unless fraud is held in abeyance, as it is now in our ranks to a certain extent, the spurious coin would measurably take place of the genuine, and the TRUTH itself would be retarded in its growth, and sink finally into a corrupt condition.

Then again, observe the vile, defamatory, poisonous excerpts from the Light of Truth, editorials in that paper, voicing the sentiment of its proprietor and editor, J. B. Townsend, and Willard J. Hull. Read them carefully; ponder over them most critically and see the dirty flings cast at Spiritualism, as follows:

Question:—"What is the end and aim of mediumship as carried on at present?"

Answer:—"Its aim is Dollars, and its end is Death. Mediums who are really carrying the messages of the higher realms of spirit life to man the mortal can be counted on THE FINGERS OF A SINGLE HAND."

"The Light of Truth is testing the Spiritualists of North America specifically, and the Spiritualists of the world generally.

"This test will go on until the fiber of the goods is thoroughly known and understood.

"For the MOST PART THE STUFF SO FAR TESTED IS EXCEEDINGLY SHODDY. Some of the PACKAGES TIED WITH FANCY STRING AND BABY RIBBON offered for inspection WILL NOT BEAR IT AT ALL.

"A FEW SMALL PACKAGES tied with the ordinary binding cord contain big values. They are the kohinoors among the diamond fields of things Spiritualistic. On them the Light of Truth depends for courage to continue the test."

"Let it remembered that Spiritualists as they go, do not support mediums. If mediums had to depend upon the tender mercies of the average Spiritist and test-hunter, they would starve to death. Mediums are supported and patronized largely by Christian and Infidel alike, outside the ranks of THE WARRING, SNIVELING FACTIONS THAT NOW MAKE UP THE RANK AND FILE OF WHAT IS LEFT OF SPIRITUALISM."

There are no qualifications in the above. The charge that our ranks are composed of "Warring, SNIVELING Factions," stands forth prominently.

Again, in the Light of Truth of September 1, 1906, is the following complete sentence, voicing the opinion of its editor on Spiritualism at that date:

"A DYING MAKESHIFT from which the SOUL HAS GONE, is all we see of Spiritualism as steered."

Of course that declaration hits Mr. Sprague himself a most severe blow, for at that time he and his estimable wife were doing some most excellent "steering" work in the ranks of Spiritualism; not only Mr. and Mrs. Sprague but hundreds of others, were then in the ranks toiling with all their might to advance the cause, and while they were so "steering" they were grossly insulted by the above declaration, that "A dying makeshift from which the SOUL HAS GONE, is all we see of Spiritualism as steered."

The Light of Truth, from which the above excerpts have been made, has been a losing investment from the start, sinking thousands of dollars, and the crowning infamy of its career consists of its defense of every fraudulent, rotten medium The Progressive Thinker has exposed. Defending enthusiastically Mrs. Elsie Reynolds, who has been repeatedly exposed dressed in artificial toggery, posing as a materialized spirit, is it any wonder that it has proved a losing investment, sinking money with every issue of the paper?

True it is, there are thousands who believe in SPIRIT RETURN who take no Spiritualist paper, and are WHOLLY IGNORANT of what is going on in our ranks. As a scientific fact, SPIRIT RETURN is fully established in their minds, and they seek light on other lines of thought as voiced by leading literary magazines. They do not want to attach themselves in any way to Spiritualism as an organized cult, sect or body; they have THE TRUTH, which comes to all who diligently seek for it, and THEY ARE CONTENT. They recognize in SPIRIT RETURN a grand uplifting law of the universe, on a par with hundreds of other beneficent laws, to them all are of equal importance and significance. They separate it from religion, or organizations, just as they would the laws governing the generation of electricity, or the multifarious vibrations that come from the sun, producing results without which the world would be in impenetrable darkness. We have often wished they would join us in active work to render our Cause more prominent, but THEY WILL NOT, as they can not see any necessity in so doing, as all can, who desire, arrive at the truth just as they did.

This class numbers millions, and can be found in every sect, living out their respective lives as they see fit, and their number is constantly increasing. They make no effort to proselyte, but often freely express their opinion. If a firm, unqualified belief in Spirit Return constitutes a person a Spiritualist, then Spiritualism is on the increase the world over; there are millions of them. It may possibly prove true, that Spiritualism as an organized movement will gradually disappear as Spirit Return will permeate every religious sect, every cult, every club and every movement for the elevation of mankind morally and spiritually; yet look out! The Dangers of Psychism confront Spiritualists everywhere—to a certain extent confront every one seeking development unless care is manifested, and he who declares otherwise can have but a limited knowledge of what is going on in our ranks. Read carefully the following from Dr. Wickland, in the Chicago Inter Ocean; his wife is an excellent psychic. Calmly reflect on the statements made.

That Harry K. Thaw is, what he terms "a born psychic sensitive," and that he has shown evidence of it all his life, is the declaration of Dr. Carl A. Wickland, 616 Wells street, Chicago.

"Whatever else the mental condition of Harry K. Thaw, or whatever personal grievances he may have had when he killed Stanford White, he was undoubtedly obsessed by avenging spirits, who were seeking revenge for real or fancied injustice done to themselves or their kindred," said Dr. Wickland, who has long been an authority on psychic phenomena.

"Harry K. Thaw was largely only the psychic subject, the physical instrument, through whom a terrible drama was enacted, in which the invisible world took part, and ignorant, but revengeful spirits were the actors," continued the doctor.

"This assertion, I know, will seem startling to many, and the proposition that ignorant and obsessing (as well as good) spirits are active in human affairs will be met with frowns from others; but facts are stubborn things and not easily brushed aside by a sneer. Nor are these assertions founded on mere belief, theory, or speculative hypothesis, but on many years of study and personal experiences of a character and nature so convincing they cannot be successfully controverted or disproved, except perhaps, by such individuals as will deny truth at any cost.

"In order that my conclusions on the obsession hypothesis may be better understood, it will be necessary, before relating some experiences in connection with the Thaw case, to first state briefly the causes that have induced them—as well as hundreds of others.

"In an effort to ascertain the underlying and mystifying causes of the innumerable mental vagaries seen on every hand, more especially those of emotional, functional, and moral insanity, I met with indifferent success until I was induced to look into experimental psychology for a probable solution.

"My wife proved to be an excellent psychic sensitive and easily put into a coma or unconscious state, while discarnated intelligences, who gave every reasonable evidence of being whom they purported to be, came and temporarily used her physical body.

"These intelligences, among other things, persistently asserted that ignorant, earthly inclined spirits are frequently the prime movers in many diabolical acts, as well as innumerable queer doings, and unaccountable vagaries of conduct seen among mortals, including in this a great proportion of suicides, homicides, idiocy, emotional, functional, and moral insanity, dipsomania, kleptomania, bestiality, ad infinitum. They presented the following explanation as reasons for those conditions: First, the mind or intelligence is independent of and not a part of the physical body; second, death, so called, is only the freeing of the intelligence from the body; third, this change is so natural and simple, by reason of the fact that the spirit has a spiritual body, an exact counterpart of the physical body, and having had a wrong conception of death while in the body, that many spirits, after the transition from the mortal to the spiritual condition, remain in ignorance of the change for a longer or shorter period, or until enlightened.

"Then, also, habits, desires, and inclination, they said, are rooted in the mind, and therefore remain in or with the ego until eliminated by the will, as the spirit obtains better knowledge of spiritual laws, in this, no doubt, fulfilling the scriptural quotation: 'Blessed are those who take part in the first But, being in ignorance of this law, while in the body); 'over them the second death) 'the learning of this law after the change) 'hath no power.' But, being in ignorance of this law, and many spirits, they said, care little to know it, especially if weighted down with a guilty conscience or false beliefs, such desires and habits may keep the spirits in the earthly haunts for years. However, lacking a physical body through which to satisfy their cravings, such spirits may perhaps unconsciously drift into the magnetic aura of some mortal who, through the great nervous stress, cares, and worries of the present day, have become sensitive and easily susceptible to unseen influences, and, although the individual may remain oblivious of the unbidden intruder, he may thus be obsessed or possessed to carry out their often irresistible mandates.

"These intelligences further proposed that, if I would co-operate with them by taking care of and instructing these ignorant spirits, as they would allow them to take temporary but complete possession of my wife's body —without any harm to herself—they would prove to me that their every assertion was correct.

"Desirous of knowing the truth or falsity of such assertions, which, if true, would have so much bearing in revealing the cause of much that is otherwise baffling in criminology as well as in psycho pathology, I accepted what seemed a hazardous undertaking.

"Conditions have been revealed so startling that it seems incredible that people, though intelligent reasoners along other lines of thought, could so long have ignored or refused to recognize the simple facts, which can be so readily and easily verified by demonstrable proofs. Although the kind of research I am alluding to belongs to the domain of science, as it is positively dangerous—the same as many other sciences are dangerous when meddled in by those who are not familiar with the laws governing the subject—it is susceptible of proof by any one in their own home environments. By observing a few simple but absolutely necessary rules of precaution, the scientific investigator may make such research harmless to the psychic instruments as well as to himself.

"One peculiar feature in these revelations is that the most unexpected things will occur at times, thus excluding the 'expectant mood' hypothesis.

"The Thaw-White experiences alluded to, which occurred in the month of July last year, as well as those occurring within the last week, all come utterly unexpected and were briefly as follows: During an evening in the month referred to, when a few friends were visiting us, part of the evening, as is usual on such occasions, was given up to Mrs. Wickland's invisible friends to come and chat a while. 'Silver Star,' one of her regular attendants, came just long enough to say, 'How do you do,' when at once she seemed to lose control. Mrs. Wickland's head fell back in the chair. Noticing that something was the matter, but not expecting anything unusual to happen just then, I stepped up and touched her on the shoulder, when, to my surprise, she suddenly pitched forward and fell prostrate to the floor. I picked up her unconscious form and placed it in a chair and began questioning the controlling intelligence to ascertain who it might be and what it wanted. At first the stranger strenuously objected to being touched, and brusquely demanded that I should keep away and leave him alone.

"Then a moment later, requested that drinks be brought to him. Being refused, the spirit repeatedly said, 'Call the waiter, call the waiter.' To my question what kind of drink was wanted, the reply came, 'Bring me whisky and water.' I then asked where he thought he was, when the answer came, 'Where I am'; then indignantly added, 'In Madison Square Garden, of course.' To my request for his name, the spirit promptly retorted, 'That is none of your business.' On my insistence to know the name, the spirit at last, though much annoyed, said: 'Stanford White, if you want to know.' The spirit was in the meantime continually putting his hand to the head, as if in pain. Realizing, from my previous similar experiences, that this spirit was yet unconscious of being so-called dead, and the fact that he was controlling a mortal sensitive in Chicago, and was yet in a dazed condition, I began asking some guarded questions, in an effort to learn more particulars about his condition.

"When I had only asked a few questions the spirit's attention seemed attracted to something to us unseen, that greatly agitated the spirit, who, with fear and trembling, now jumped up from the chair and ran in an effort to escape, to the corner of the room, Suspecting the spirit was seeing the spirits that he had wronged in life, I asked him what had scared him. To this question there was at first no reply. I then asked if he was seeing dead people, to which the spirit, much agitated, nodded the head and said: 'Yes, yes,' and at the same time lost control and was gone.

"Immediately another strange spirit obtained possession of Mrs. Wickland's body, and, much agitated, began walking up and down the floor, and exultingly and repeatedly exclaimed, 'I killed the dog! I killed the dog!' and, pointing to the floor, said, 'There he lies—the dog. I have been seeking for a chance to kill him for four or five years, but I got him at last—the dog!'

"I forced the spirit to sit down, to which it strenuously objected, declaring I had no right to touch him. I replied that I had a right to touch my wife. The spirit angrily retorted, 'Your wife?' and then haughtily added, 'I am no woman, I want you to know, but a man.' After a considerable effort to obtain the name the spirit reluctantly said his name was Johnson.

"The spirit was pronounced in his denunciation of society, saying: 'They take the children from us poor people and put nice clothes on them, and put them on the stage, and poison their minds against their parents, whom they become ashamed of and disown. And the parents do not know what becomes of them.' Questioning the spirit whether he was aware of being so-called dead, he pooh-poohed the idea, and thought that was foolish talk, and said, 'How could a dead person talk?' Continuing, he said, 'The doctor said that I had consumption and would soon die, but I didn't die. (He evidently died without knowing it.) I never felt better in my life.'

"It required, as it always does with these intelligences, lengthy argument and reasoning to satisfy the perplexed spirit, as it critically examined itself when his attention had been called to the body and dress he was wearing. He demanded to now how he, a man, had become possessed of a woman's body? It has in some instances required more than two hours of most persistent argument to convince this class of spirits of their true condition. So also in this case, but finally the spirit, thoroughly penitent, departed.

"Instantly a third spirit came and controlled Mrs. Wickland's body. But this intelligence was aware that it was a spirit, and was in temporary possession of a borrowed body, and said, 'I am Harry Thaw's father,' and then cried out, 'Save my boy! Save my boy!' He is not guilty. He is sensitive to spirit influences, and has been all his life. I did not understand the cause of Harry's queer acts while I was in the physical life. But now from the spirit side of life I can see that Harry has been a tool in the hands of earth bound, ignorant, and selfish spirits most of his life, and was obsessed by revenging spirits when he killed Stanford White. He said: 'I have frantically sought every possible avenue to reach the external world to tell the people that Harry is not insane, but a sensitive.' And he repeatedly pleaded, 'Save my boy! Save my boy!'

"Inquiring what he would have us do, the spirit replied, 'Please write to Mrs. William Thaw, my wife, and Mr. Olcott, my attorney while in life (a fact of which I knew nothing at the time,) and tell them your experience and what I have said, and urge them to recognize and understand Harry's condition.' After some more conversation and a promise on our part to comply with the spirit's wish to write (a request I always carry out, regardless of the recipient's opinion in the matter, the spirit departed.

"The following evening another spirit came and controlled my wife. This one at first seemed to be looking for some one, and said: 'Where did the other fellows go to?' This spirit was also very pronounced in his criticism of society, particularly denouncing girls for being foolish. He said; 'They put fine clothes on them and then put them on the stage,' etc. They deserve licking,' the spirit declared, emphasizing his words with suitable gestures.

"Owing to the excessive mental agitation under which this spirit was laboring, and its unconsciousness that it was using a borrowed body, it suddenly lost control before I had a chance to ascertain particularly, leaving my wife standing, and like paralyzed from head to foot, with suspended respiration. This frequently happens, but respiration is readily restored or resumed by quickly compressing the chest a few times, when a regular controlling spirit usually steps in and restores her body to normal again.

"The spirit of Mr. Thaw came a second time last August, and again about a week ago, when he reiterated that Harry is a sensitive and has frequently been subjected to the suggestive influence of mischievous spirits.

He also urged upon humanity to hasten the inquiry into this subject, as a proper knowledge of it will prevent untold misery both to spirits and to their infortunate mortal victims. Science will ere long be compelled to recognize abnormal psychology and its causes, the greatest problem for scientific research of the age, and such research will revolutionize criminology, economics, and religious ethics. For here, indeed, physical and religious sciences meet on common ground, the two being interrelated.

"Subconsciousness or subliminal self-disassociation of personality, or multiple personality theories, are entirely inadequate to explain the phenomena occurring through Mrs. Wickland. That they are due to discarnated spirits is the only adequate explanation for them. The case of Miss Beauchamp's four personalities, as reported by Dr. Prince of Boston, and the dual personality reported by Dr. Janet of Paris, can both be better accounted for on the hypothesis of spirit control."

LEGERDEMAIN.

It Is Trying to Keep pace With Occult Phenomena, Imitating the Same, Often Deceiving the Very Elect.

Historical tradition records that at a feast given by King Belshazzar at Babylon in the sixth century, B. C., there appeared on the walls of the regal banquet hall some mysterious hieroglyphics traced by an unseen hand in flaming characters.

Daniel, the prophet read them as "Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," which he interpreted to mean that the king had been "weighed but found wanting." That same night Belshazzar, we are told, was assassinated by his frightened vassals and captains.

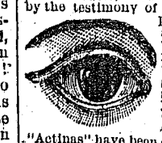
A startling reminder of this ancient tale is the mystifying creation which its producer, Mr. Berol-Konorah, has just imported from Europe and is the headliner with the Orpheum show. A large drawing board, similar to those used by draughtsmen but of huge size, is suspended by two thin cords, this hanging vertically; and it has no connection with any part of the stage, swinging like a pendulum freely from its two cords all the while.

It is turned around so that the public may assure itself that it is but a thin board and that no one is concealed behind it. Six or eight sheets of paper are fastened on the front of the board and a small ball, about as large as a base-ball which has been dipped in a glutinous and adhesive ink, is placed against the paper, where it is seen to adhere, though the board swings to and fro.

Suddenly, on word of command, the ball begins to move over the paper, leaving a trail of ink in its path, which forms itself stroke by stroke into letters and words. In large and perfectly legible, though somewhat wavering characters, the word "Menetekel" is traced before the eyes, yet one cannot detect or even surmise what agency makes that weird little ball glide over the smooth, perpendicular surface of the paper.

In the same manner other balls are placed against the paper and while the lady who introduces the illusion is standing as far from the board as possible, words appear, which have just been whispered in an undertone into the ear of Mr. Berol-Konorah, who passes among the audience for that purpose, and yet he cannot be detected in signaling the whispered word.

As one sheet is filled it is merely torn off, revealing a clean sheet beneath it, which is then used.



There have been many productions of the mystic kind before the public in recent years, but none more inexplicable than this latest creation, which its producers have aptly named "Menetekel."—Denver Post.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary.

Eye Sight can be Strengthened, and all forms of Diseased Eyes Cured without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in the great majority of cases, has been proven beyond a doubt, by the testimony of of hundreds people who publicly claim that they have been cured by that wonderful little instrument called "Actina." Actina also cures sore and granulated lids, Iritis, etc., also removes Cataracts and Pterygiums without cutting or drugging. Over 75 thousand of the "Actinas" have been sold; therefore it is not an experiment, but an absolute fact. The following letters are but samples of those that are received daily:

Mrs. M. E. Champney, 242 West 135th St. New York City, writes: The "Actina" cured me of Iritis, after the doctors said there was no cure outside an operation. I have been entirely well for over four months, can see to read and sew as well as before. I can honestly recommend "Actina" for all afflictions of the eye.

Alameda, Cal., March 27th, 1906.
New York & London Electric Ass'n,
Kansas City, Mo.

Gentlemen:—I am more than pleased with the "Actina." When I received it I had been wearing glasses for more than 8 years for Astigmatism. I immediately discontinued their use and have not had them on since. It is wonderful. I consider it worth its weight in gold. I have recommend it to many of my friends.

Very truly, (Miss) E. F. Tucker,
2041 San Antonio Ave.

E. R. Holdbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes: "Actina" has cured my eyes so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom have headache now, and can study up to eleven o'clock after a hard day's work at the office.

"Actina" can be used by old and young with perfect safety. Every member of a family can use the one Actina for any form of disease of the Eye, Ear, Throat or Head. One will last for years, and is always ready for use. "Actina" will be sent on trial postpaid.

If you will send your name and address to the Actina Appliance Company Company, Dept. 342N., 811-813 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive absolutely FREE a valuable book, Prof. Wilson's Treatise on.

FROM INDIA TO THE PLANET MARS.

A MOST REMARKABLE WORK.

Fascinating, Interesting and Instructive.

By Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva.

"This is an account of the experiments with the 'Geneva Medium,' Helene Smith. In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian princess and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price, $1.50.

THE BIBLE

New and Revised Edition.

Authenticity, Credibility, Morality.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25.

STARTLING FACTS, OR Deeds of Darkness Disclosed

This work devotes special attention to Auricular Confession and its relations to sacerdotal celibacy, convents, monasteries, morality and civil and religious liberty. It is intended to be an embodiment of facts and documentary evidence of the pernicious influence of the confessional; a trenchant showing up of Romanism, based upon standard Catholic authorities; an eye-opener concerning the methods and spirit, the moral turpitude and evil works of Romanism. Cloth, 75 cents.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE.

By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Clio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The Song Cards for sale at this office at $4 per hundred, by mail $4.50, are the help you need in society work.

Mattie E. Hull writes: "Persons wishing to order Moses Hull & Co.'s publications from Whitewater, Wis., should address Prof. A. J. Weaver, Morris Pratt Institute, who is authorized to respond to such orders until my return."

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale is engaged for the month of March at Galveston, Texas.

A. J. Brooks, of Monroe, La., has back numbers of The Progressive Thinker that he would like to give to some inquiring mind; also Spiritualistic books he would like to exchange.

Correspondent writes: "Mrs. Ella Johnson Bloom of Chicago, was with the Psychical Research Society of Rockford, Ill., on the evening of Feb. 24, and gave messages which were well received. She is one of Rockford's favorites. Addresses were made by President McDougal, and a paper was read by Dr. Booth. The society hopes to be entertained by Dr. Geo. B. Warne, president of the State Association, next Sunday evening. The large developing class, under the management of Dr. Hammond, is making splendid progress, and the society is again on the up-grade, with a fine prospect before it."

Miss Ada M. Came writes: "The Cambridge (Mass.) Spiritual Industrial Society held its regular meeting Friday evening, Feb. 22, in Cambridge Lower Hall. Mrs. Katie Ham, the speaker, gave an intensely interesting lecture, after which she gave a large number of messages which were fully recognized. Mrs. Ham will be with the society March 8 and 22."

Maria Hahn writes: "Reading an article in the San Francisco Examiner, stating that scientists are beginning to endorse Spiritualism, I remembered something I saw twelve or thirteen years ago. I had a vision. I saw a small church building, and above it a big shining light. The light moved down behind the building, undermined the foundation and came out in front, shining more brilliant than before. I was told the light meant Spiritualism. You can readily see the meaning. At the same time I prophesied that California would be like a beehive in fifty years. I wrote it down and took it to Mr. Newman, the owner of the Philosophical Journal. He put the paper on file in his office, but the Journal went out of business. Mr. Newman passed over, and the fire destroyed all. I have read Mr. Spangler's prophecy, and would say that something of a serious nature in the very near future will happen to New York."

Mrs. M. L. Randolph writes: "I very gratefully received your premium book, 'The Unknown Life of Christ,' and am much interested in reading it. I wonder how you can furnish so much valuable reading for so little money, and wonder how I have been so many years without the paper, The Progressive Thinker, when it can be obtained for $1 per year. The grand truths and beautiful philosophy therein contained should be read by all. I have been a Spiritualist for over 50 years."

Dorothy Deane writes to the Williamsport Sun, Pa., in reference to Mrs. Demorest, medium and lecturer: "Mrs. Demorest is a very interesting talker; she is a white-haired lady, and has a sweet, refined face. I told her that I knew nothing of her belief, and asked her to tell me a little, at least, about Spiritualism. Her ideas are much the same as ours in regard to God, although she does not believe in the Immaculate Conception. She believes that Christ was the son of God, just as we all are and had the world followed his teachings, there would have been no sin or strife. The difference in her belief being this, that all persons are the sons of God, and can do wonderful things if they only would give free access to the spirit, which is within them. She then referred to different inventions and said they were simply ideas as revealed by the spirit of the inventor. Sunday evening Mrs. Demorest held a service in the Spiritualists' hall, at which time she lectured on the "Signs of the Times," and among other things she claimed "Joan" was guided through spirits and said so herself. And even now she says it isn't going too far to say, she may be guiding the French now in their troubles."

Mrs. Emma Snow Hoyt writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "Frank T. Ripley has just closed a three months' engagement with our society. He has done a splendid work; his lectures were forceful and convincing, and his message work marvelous. He prophesied many things, some of which have already come true—such as the Kingston horror. He drew large audiences and was the means of adding new members to our society. He worked hard for our building fund and was the means of adding a neat sum to it. He donated two beautiful pillows to the society to be raffled, and was always doing something to advance the society in every way."

Hattie F. R. Peet writes: "The fourth of the series of the Illinois Sunflower Club dances was held Monday evening, Feb. 25, at Washington Hall, with good music and a fine lunch spread by the 'Sunflowers.' A most enjoyable evening was passed. The next dance of the Club will be given Monday evening, March 25. This will also be a birthday party, given in honor of the Club, it having attained the age of two years. On Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 26, the Club gave its monthly tea party at Lincoln Hall. This was one of the largest and most delightful parties ever held by the Club. The hall was filled to overflowing, and ten good mediums were kept constantly busy giving messages to earnest seekers. Mrs. Helen A. Musser, assisted by Mrs. Lawrence, presided at the urn. Business meetings every second Tuesday of each month; tea party every fourth Tuesday, from 2 till 5 p. m., at Lincoln Hall, 70 Adams street."

Louie Stanton writes from St. Joseph, Mo.: "Unity Church was well filled Tuesday evening with attentive listeners to hear the last of a series of lectures by Mr. John W. Ring, of Crystola, Colo., thus finishing a very successful engagement with the First Spiritualist Society of St. Joseph. Mr. Ring is a young man of wonderful talent. He was highly appreciated both by the society and public at large. Our society has never been in a more progressive condition than now, and we hope that it may always remain so, though we are soon to lose three of our most earnest workers and also mediums. Our president, Mr. W. C. Jessup, has been called to other fields of labor, as also Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Turner. They have labored long and faithfully for the cause here, and they go away taking with them the love and kindliest thoughts of many. Mr. Jessup will represent our society at the state convention, to be held in St. Louis, Feb. 27 and 28. We have again taken up our mid-week meetings, and they are proving quite a success. We devote the greater part of the evening to messages, and as we have several good message bearers, they are growing in interest. We have a few Sundays not taken, and if any of the workers coming our way would like to stop over, I would like to correspond with them. Address me at No. 607 N. 9th street, St. Joseph, Mo."

Abbie E. Culver writes: "With the renewal of subscription for The Progressive Thinker, I received the premium book, Gems of Thought. I have been very much interested in Mr. Leadbeater's lectures. I have all the premium books now, and am proud of my little library. You are doing a grand and noble work, sending light and spiritual knowledge to every enlightened nation on this earth."

Laura C. Morse writes: "The sunny days of April bring me my 80th birthday—not as young as fifty years ago, yet can read your paper, the light of my life, and the greatest exponent of our faith printed. My thanks are unlimited to you for the thirteenth premium book. Words are useless in sounding the praise due you in this great work of painting Spiritualism in its true light to mortal and spirit."

Just before the close of the Spiritualists' state mid-winter meeting, Dr. Julia M. Walton asked permission of the chair to make some remarks, and said: "I wish to bring to the attention and consideration of this audience the fact that there is what I consider a most unjust and obnoxious law upon the statute books of the state of Michigan, taken originally from a law compiled in the middle ages, necessary then, perhaps, but not a just law for this age. Obnoxious to us as Spiritualists because there is a clause in it that can be construed, or often is, into meaning that the practice of clairvoyance is an offense against the law. Now, we would like to get the sentiment of this audience and this representative body of people, and I would ask for a rising vote from those who are opposed to it and wish a revision of this law, and who believe in clairvoyance and wish to have it protected as manifested here to-night." Not a half score of people remained seated when the rising vote was taken.—Patriot.

H. W. Brookins writes from Wheaton, Ill., concerning the condition of Mr. G. H. Brooks: "Mr. Brooks is at his home, confined to his bed in a darkened room. His physician says that his illness is due to mental fatigue and la grippe, and cannot say how long he will be in this condition, but his recovery will probably take some time. He is not allowed to see any one at present, but hopes soon to be able to see his friends."

Mrs. J. A. Martin writes: "Spiritualists in this beautiful city of Toronto, Ontario, have been favored by our well known co-worker, Virginie Barrett, of Indiana. Mrs. Barrett's Sunday lectures have received the praise of the better thinking class of this city, as she is clear, logical and to the point, holding her audience in close attention throughout. In the reading of articles she is correct. I will cite one instance. A young man on his first visit to a spiritual meeting, gave her his watch. She told him it belonged to a British soldier who had been killed in battle, and described to him his mother. The test was so true and startling to him that he wept. We also have a Tuesday and Thursday evening circle devoted to tests, while on Wednesday afternoon is held a woman's meeting to discuss subjects on the promotion of happiness in home life. These meetings are proving a great success. Mrs. Barrett has held circles in homes of some of Toronto's most intelligent people. While in this city she is staying at my home,

Geo. W. Lewis, A. M., scientist and means to deal with the Great Psychic Problems. Address him at No. 550 West 173rd street, New York City, N. Y. Mr. Lewis's articles have often appeared in The Progressive Thinker, and they were always interesting and instructive.

On Sunday, February 24, Oscar A. Edgerly concluded a very successful engagement with the First Church of Spiritualists, at Pittsburg, Pa. On Sunday, March 3, he will begin a month's engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C.

Correspondent writes: "A destructive fire visited Sandusky, Ohio, destroying four buildings, and damaging several others, Spiritual Science Hall, the home of the Psychic Research Society, with all its contents, was completely wiped out of existence. A remarkable feature in connection with this fire was the prediction made by Mrs. Charlotte Exton, of Lorain, at the Sunday night meeting of the society. She said that she saw before her a large fire, which would soon occur in the business district of the city, very close to the place she then was, which would cause great excitement. In just twelve hours, the platform from which she spoke, was in flames, and the prediction was verified, almost to the letter. This was Mrs. Exton's first appearance in public, and indicates wonderful ability of mediumship. Meetings of the society will be held temporarily in the Chamber of Commerce rooms in the Masonic Temple, but subscription lists have been started, looking to the erection of a Spiritual Temple, and it is hoped that the plans of the enthusiastic members of the society may be fulfilled."

Boston Meetings.

The First Spiritualist Ladies' Aid Society meets in Appleton Hall, 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass., every Friday.

The Ladies' Lyceum Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, Boston, Mass., every Wednesday.

The Ladies' Industrial Union meets in Dwight Hall, 514 Tremont street, every Thursday.

Mr. and Mrs. Bledsoe of Topeka, Kansas, passed through the city last week, on their way to lecture in Kansas City, Mo. They had been filling successful engagements in Philadelphia and other places in the East.

W. J. Colville is at present at San Diego, Cal. He can be addressed there for engagements in care of Box 1035.

Ferd. C. Suhrer writes: "The services of the Fraternal Order of Spiritualists are becoming more popular with each Sunday, and on February 24, we were pleased to note the presence of prominent workers in other Fraternal societies who approved of our Order and congratulated us on the splendid progress made in so short a time. Brother Warner addressed us in the afternoon, and gave us many helpful thoughts. Our circles which are free, are being taken advantage of at 4 o'clock, and every medium is kept busy transmitting messages from the other world to this. We have accommodations for 60 people at supper at one time, and the demand for more room and utensils is constantly increasing. Our song service at 6:30 is being improved by the addition of new voices. Miss Fannie Thompson is our pianist and another recent valuable acquisition. At 7, our concert takes place (and is also free) and we furnish an entertainment that is appreciated. Mr. Robert Fessler, as bass soloist, renders difficult selections with ease, displaying rare ability. Miss Marian Gordon presides at the piano and her encores are sufficient evidence of her remarkable skill. Miss Smith rendered a beautiful solo which called for applause, and the readings by Mrs. Lichtig and Miss Caroline R. Mills, gave evidence of natural ability. Geo. B. Warne, M. D., spoke for us in the evening on a subject close to his heart, and many in the congregation felt as he did. The doctor is an earnest advocate of Spiritualism, and his remarks always find a welcome reception. On Sunday, March 10, our platform mediums will be Mrs. Alice Sexsmith, Mrs. A. W. Bloom, and Mrs. Lichtig. Brother Thomas Seeley Warner will address us in the evening. Brother Warner's remarks are brief, wholesome and practical, and well liked. Our hall is becoming the leading center of attention for Spiritualists and others of advanced liberal thought, and if one wishes to meet a friend, they just go up to the Fraternal Order and they find them. Many come to hear the lectures, while a large number come to get messages. As announced from the platform, the Sunday previous, our platform mediums read sealed letters written by the congregation, which demonstration was attended with success. This feature is somewhat new in Chicago, but will become popular. It is the same method employed by Mrs. Pepper, of New York. The response was so marked that until further notice sealed letters will be read at each Sunday afternoon meeting. We would like to state that if anyone has a surplus of dishes, knives, forks, spoons, etc., and would like to help a worthy cause, we will gladly accept a donation of such articles, as our present supply falls far short of supplying the demand. We will gladly send for same and be grateful for your kindness. Be with us next Sunday and join the merry throng. Fraternity is our watchword, and all Frats. know what that means."

Correspondent writes: "On Sunday evening, Feb. 17, the Golden Rule Spiritualist Society held their usual services at O'Donnell's College Hall, Paulina street, between Washington Blvd and Park avenue. There were short talks by the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, after which a circle was formed and Madam Harper gave messages. In the evening the hall was crowded, and Mr. B. C. Peterson delivered an interesting and instructive lecture on 'Earth-bound Spirits,' which was greatly appreciated. We hope to have Mr. Peterson lecture again soon. After the lecture, Dr. Burgess, Mrs. Nora E. Hill and Mrs. Susie Thompson gave messages. Owing to the illness of the Hon. Charles Hughes, Feb. 24, Mrs. Kusserow presided as speaker, and her lecture on 'Soul Development' was greatly appreciated. The message bearers were Mrs. Treaver, Mrs. Kusserow, Mrs. N. E. Hill, and our well-known medium, Mrs. Clybourne, who has been ill for the past few weeks. The speaker for March 3 will be Mrs. Nora E. Hill."

Hattie G. Webster writes from Columbus, Ohio, of the great success of the West Side Spiritualist Church: "On Friday evening, Feb. 22, we celebrated Washington's birthday with a social and entertainment, and those who attended (and the number who came found the church incapacitated to hold them) witnessed the marriage of Elizabeth Oakley and John M. Rakestraw, according to the beautiful spiritual ritual, performed by our worthy president, Rev. H. E. Boerstler. The ceremony made a deep impression on those fortunate to hear it, and what made it more impressive was the fact that the bride and groom were both of the Catholic faith up to a few weeks ago. They departed in high glee in their automobile with the best wishes of all present. Our society is doing wonderful work since our reopening in September last. We have purchased a lot adjoining our church and have been able to make two payments on the same, and have enough in our treasury to make the third payment, each payment lifting a hundred dollar note. Our last social netted us seventy-seven dollars, and the way the mass of people were handled and fed without a single discord or jar was most remarkable. We gave them all a sumptuous supper. We had very large audiences all through February, with Dr. Beverly as speaker, and Mrs. Harris as test medium. We will be favored by home talent through March, with appropriate anniversary services, March 31."

D. G. Hill, president, writes: "The Golden Rule Spiritualist Society has engaged the Wattles Family, known as the "Spiritualist Evangelist Quartette," for a series of meetings to be held in O'Donnell College Hall, South Paulina street, between Washington and Park avenue, beginning March 19 to 26, inclusive. Afternoons at 3, March 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26; evenings at 8, March 21, 22, at 705 W. Madison street. Come and hear these gifted artists. A treat that has never been given the people of Chicago."

Samuel A. Huntington of Malden, Mass., writes of The Malden Progressive Spiritual Society, Louise Hall, No. 139 Pleasant street: "The Rev. P. A. Wiggin of Boston commenced his series of meetings on the 21st ult., and the hall was well filled with an appreciative audience." His theme was that ever interesting subject, 'Spiritualism,' and his rendition was able, instructive and interesting. He always has something to say. We hope ere his series are through that Spiritualism will be better and more intelligently understood in this vicinity than it is now. After the able address, Mr. Wiggin gave many fine messages, reading from ballots. Sunday services, Feb. 24, were interesting. At 7:30 p. m., Dr. C. L. Willis of Boston, occupied the platform. He chose for his theme, 'Walking after the spirit and not after the flesh,' giving a very instructive address, after which he read an original poem entitled, 'There Are Angels I Know.' He then devoted nearly an hour to giving many beautiful messages. Mr. Wiggin will serve our society the 28th inst., and the first three Thursday evenings in March; March 3, Mrs. W. S. Butler of Boston; March 10, Mrs. B. W. Belcher of Marlboro, Mass."

Dr. J. Russell Price, a gifted speaker, has been engaged by the Alliance Society to lecture during the month of March. He comes as one of the best speakers on spirit return, and will give many valuable lessons. His subject is, "The Seven Keys to the Universe." Mrs. May Elmo will give tests and messages at each session. Service begins at 3 and 8 p. m., each Sunday, at Vincennes hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue. Take 35th street and Cottage Grove avenue car.

Mrs. Carrie L. Hatch writes: "The Massachusetts State Association will commemorate the anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, in Berkeley Hall, Boston, on Tuesday, March 26, all day and evening. Admission free. Full list of speakers and mediums later."

Mrs. Sarah E. Bromwell will give an informal reception, Mar. 12, at 8 p. m., ratifying the sixth annual election of the National Sunlight Center Club, at her home, 3310½ Rhodes avenue. Colonial gowns will be worn.

Rev. G. C. Love writes from Lents, Oregon: "Mrs. C. C. Chambers, better known as Dr. Chambers, formerly of Portland, Oregon, now of Spokane, Wash., wishes me to announce through the columns of your paper that she has had a stroke of paralysis. Let all good friends send to her strong health vibrations for her recovery."

Georgia Gladys Cooley will serve the Psychic Research Society of Rockford, Ill., Sundays, March 10 and 17; the Genoa society, 12th and 13th; the Sycamore the 14th. She will be the message bearer at the anniversary services at Brother Grimshaw's church in St. Louis, March 31, and at the state convention to be held in Milwaukee, Wis., April 16 to 18.

C. L. Hatch writes from 9 Appleton street, Boston, Mass.: "The First Spiritualist Ladies Aid Society met as usual, with the president, Mrs. Mattie E. A. Allbe in the chair. Business meeting held at 5 p. m.; supper at 6:15; social hour from 7 to 8. This hour is much enjoyed by all. The evening was given over entirely to Mrs. Kate R. Stiles of Boston. After singing by Mrs. Haydee, Mrs. Stiles read two original poems, 'The Old and New,' and 'Are We Happy?' They were both very beautiful, and much appreciated by all. Mrs. Stiles answered many questions asked by the audience, to the gratification of all, and Mrs. Barker sang a beautiful selection. Mrs. Stiles was then entranced by Mr. Moses Hull, who gave a short message in his strong personality, after which she gave many descriptions and messages from spirits to their friends; it was a very profitable and enjoyable evening, and a vote of thanks was extended to this gifted speaker for her kindness to the society. Next Friday we will hold meeting as usual. Friday, March 29, this society will hold anniversary services."

On March 15 the Light of Truth Church, Mrs. Burland, pastor, will hold a social and dance at Vincennes Hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue. All are invited. Tell your friends to come and have a good, social time; and bring their brightest smiles, etc.

Among the Meetings.

Your correspondent has been visiting a few of the meetings, and will visit others soon as time will permit, just to see what is doing among the Spiritualists of the city, the sociality, the enthusiasm and the success with which they are blessed, as well as their importance in this great move of Spiritualism.

On Saturday evening, as per previous announcement, Mr. J. E. Coe gave a 75th Anniversary party, or entertainment at Star Lodge Hall, 376 So. Western avenue, and a large and enthusiastic audience greeted him, shook and congratulated him, and wished him continued good health and prosperity. The entertainment consisted of good old songs, recitations, short speeches, piano music, a poem by your correspondent, the glad hand all around, cake and coffee, and a raffle of two large cakes. The evening was well and agreeably spent by everyone. The friends of "Old 77" presented Brother Coe with a beautiful bouquet, through their eloquent representative, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, who did the subject justice and herself credit. A loved farewell wish was extended to the brother, who is one of the oldest and most faithful workers in the Chicago field.

On Sunday afternoon the services being held by the First Society Fraternal order was visited, just as Mrs. J. Staner-Adams was in the midst of her test-giving, following whom was Mrs. Hilbert, and others whose names we have forgotten at present. The readings were from sealed letters, and were very good. At the regulation hour the audience, a large one, formed into many circles throughout the hall, and the various mediums began their circle readings, producing a sound like unto the old-fashioned Sunday school, but very differently designed and decidedly different lessons taught. After about an hour of this proceeding the grand rush for supper was made, and the hungry crowd filled the table and fed the inner man and woman to their repleteness with the good things, including beans, of course. Dr. and Mrs. Caird seem to be very much at home among their fraternal family.

In the evening of Sunday, the meeting at O'Donnell's Hall, Mrs. Nora Hill, pastor, was visited to listen to the eloquent lecture delivered by Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, followed by a few perfectly pleasing and wholly recognized tests by her guide, Mayflower. The meeting was quite well attended and the lecture listened to with interested attention. The collections were unusually large, through the extra effort for these people by the speaker. No admission fee is charged at the door of these meetings, and all are welcomed; the receipts depending upon the contributions.

DIRE DISASTER.

Astrologers and Clairvoyants Declare It is Impending Over New York City.

Something terrible in the form of a cataclysm is to affect New York and vicinity in the coming months.

I feel that it is my duty to add my voice and influence to the word of warning that is now sounding through the mental realms. It is predicted by astrologers and clairvoyants, but all are indefinite as to the cause of the trouble. A tidal wave over New York and Brooklyn caused by an earthquake in that region is the sum of of the predictions.

My teachers who come to me from the celestial state of existence, tell me that there will be a disaster, but they are not close enough in touch with earthly time and conditions to predict the time or the exact material aspect of the disaster. I know that if I lived in New York or Brooklyn I should be guided by the Spirit to move myself and belongings into a region over which there is no cloud of impending trouble.

Predictions, whether astrological or clairvoyant, must always be affected by the personal element to a greater or less degree, and hence they can only approximate truth, but when a number agree that a certain region is to suffer from an overabundance of the liquid element it is well for anyone involved to go into the silence and ask to be protected from Nature's disturbances or led away from them if it is necessary.

WALTER DE VOE.

Letter From Nellie S. Baade.

To the Editor:—I have just concluded a successful engagement with the First National Society of this city, with good audiences. Mr. Goucher, the president, is doing all he can to make the meetings a success.

Since last October Mr. Baade has been severely ill, but I am happy to say that at the present writing, he is decidedly better, and that hereafter I will be able to answer calls for funerals, also for lectures and message work not too far from Detroit, and a few campmeeting engagements for the coming season. Anyone desiring my services please write to me at once, so I can arrange dates accordingly.

I have been kept busy during the entire season with the exception of three weeks when I was confined to bed with La Grippe.

Of course, we never fail to introduce The Progressive Thinker with its array of talent and premium books. They are simply grand. Every Spiritualist should not fail to have the whole set of premium books

After reading the account of the transition of Brother Moses Hull, I again read his debate with W. F. Jamieson, and it seemed doubly dear to me. In to-day's paper I read in Mr. Jamieson's article as follows:

"Shall I tell you what wrecked my Spirituality? Materialization!" What a pity that such an intelligent man, one who was able at one time to convert Moses Hull from Adventism to the higher Spiritualism, should permit anyone to wreck his spirituality. At least every honest medium and Spiritualist should return thanks to him for bringing Moses out of the darkness into the light of Spiritualism; also that at sometime in the future the desire of his heart shall be granted him—proof positive of the immortality of the soul and the return of spirits

Yes, with the transition of Jennie Hagan Brown we have lost one of our best workers, but perhaps our loss is her spiritual gain, and she will pass on to perfect life with all truth. All workers should do all in their power to roll on the Car of Spiritual Progress, sowing the seeds of truth and love, that the harvest may be a happy one.

MRS. NELLIE S. BAADE.
Detroit, Michigan.

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY.

Of the Birth of Brother J. E. Coe, an Old-Time West Side Spiritualist Wheel-Horse.

When one mingles in life's battles on beyond his 50 years,
With the wolf that ever lingers till the spirit disappears,
He profoundly sees the turning in the highway out before,
And just cannot help reflecting as he joggles on once more.

To grow old in this earth-body is Dame Nature's firm decree,
But 'tis left to man's own pleasure to do it gracefully,
And we each should hold our beauty tho' we struggle, push and drive,
'Till we reach the earth's great drawbridge, at No. 75.

Never mind the growing baldness and the wrinkles now galore;
Never mind the silver'd ringlets that bespread the temple o'er;
Where there's kindness there are diamonds in the firmament on high,
And in goodness lies soul beauty in the now and by-and-bye.

There are mile-posts for our resting, and recuperating health,
There is little inspiration in the rushing after wealth;
There is pleasure in pure friendship as we pass along the line;
There is love for fellow-beings, and a sympathy divine.

We have gathered here this evening to commemorate the day
When a spirit entered earth-life and concluded there to stay.
We have learned, somehow, to love him, and are loth to let him go;
We have met to warmly greet him—our beloved Brother Coe.

Let us rally round our brother with a feeling ever dear,
And enthuse him with a spirit of devotion and good cheer;
Let us make his pathway brighter as advancing years creep on,
For the way will be so dreary when our loving friend is gone.

May he live as long as living is a pleasure to his heart,
And throughout his earthly journey from these mem'ries never part;
May his mind be filled with wisdom and his voice attuned to speak
Words consoling those in sorrow, and uplifting to the weak.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Adolph Frye: Agate is a variety of chalcedony, and is almost pure quartz except the coloring matter. The material is arranged in different colored layers, usually concentrically around a nucleus. The various arrangements of these various layers and shadings give rise to the different names of moss, ribbon, clouded agate, etc. When polished these markings are beautifully brought out, often presenting an exquisite appearance, yet this is one of the least valuable of precious stones. On portions of the north shore of Lake Superior, the pebbles on the beach are agates, often exceedingly fine specimens.

A pentagram, the magic pentacle, is a five raye dstar formed of two interlacing triangles. If a circle be divided into five equal parts by five points, and straight lines drawn connecting alternate points, the resulting figure will be the pentagram—a pentagon with five equal triangles on its sides. If the points of the star be connected by straight lines, there will result an inclosing pentagon. To the ancients, children as they were, there was mystery in these properties, and superstition was awakened. It became the seal of the Pythagorians, and was believed to possess occult powers, and invulnerable defense against the devil. It has also been conjectured that this wondrously formed figure was the symbol on the seal of Solomon. Of course, like the triangle which was taken to symbolize the Trinity, and with an eye in the center, represented God, this belief, has only the fancy of the child-man, and is simply rubbish. Yet, it is a lamentable fact, this belief lingers in the present, and there are those who believe in the mysticism of symbols and numbers.

Beryl is a silicate of aluminum and berillium. It crystallizes in hexagonal prisms. The emerald is a typical form.

A scimitar is a curved sword, especially applied to the Oriental form of that weapon. Our correspondent is confused by the various spellings of the word.

Schoolboy: Q. My teacher gave me this question to study out: How and when did the Democratic party get the name "Locofoco"?

A. In Hammond's Political History of New York, Vol. II, page 491, the origin of this term is traced to a Mr. Marck, who to advertise his store in Park Row, in 1834, offered the novelty of a self-lighting cigar. The locomotive was then a new thing and the notion prevailed that this word meant "self-moving," hence the idea of "self-firing," and the coining of the word Locofoco. The next year there was a Tammany Hall meeting, and as a "rough house" was expected, members of the Equal Rights party provided themselves with locofoco matches and candles, and when opposition turned out the gas lights, and confusion reigned, the hall was blazing with the matches and candles. The "Courier and Enquirer" at once gave the anti-monopolists the name "Locofoco," which like all such catch-words continued long after the occasions which called them forth are forgotten.

E. R. G. and many others: Of all questions which come to this department that for advice on this or that advertised mining scheme are the most frequent. Several times special answers have been given, and some correspondents have sent letters of thanks for the advice given which saved them hard-earned money they were almost persuaded to invest. Now it is impractical to investigate the claims of every mining scheme, and injustice to some honest enterprises may be done by a sweeping condemnation, yet all such schemes, even when most honestly conducted, are subject to an element of uncertainty. A claim is located and stock sold. If the object is honest work, and not stock selling, the money raised will go to sinking the shaft. If gold is found in paying quantities the stock will be valuable in proportion. If none is found, the stock will be worthless. Probably one mine in ten pays expenses, one in twenty, dividends. Of one honest company, organized for practically testing its claim, there is an indefinite number, whose claim is the pocket-book of the gullible purchaser.

If you have money you have no use for and do not wish to be ever troubled with again, buy stock in one of these concerns.

Their certificates are beautifully printed, and you can have them framed and hung on the wall, as a diploma of your graduation from the school of sharks. I have a letter from a lady who invested in a lauded "spiritual directed" mining scheme. She had under the persuasion of alluring prospects invested all she had, left by her husband on his departure from this life, and she bemoaned the sad fortune that the dividend she at first received came not. "Will it ever come?" was her pathetic cry. It came at first, not because of the nuggets of gold taken from that mine but from the money other dupes paid in. It stopped because this source of revenue began to fail. "Will it ever come?" When grapes are gathered from a dead vine. You need not delude yourself with the belief that the villains who concoct these schemes will ever have remorse of conscience, and refund a dollar to the most needy.

And more. Not only mines, but all and every scheme which promises greatly more than ordinary interest on the investment, is hazardous, certainly, and probably a fraud. Any enterprise assuring more than ordinary returns, need not go begging, selling stocks for ten cents on the dollar, for all such can have money for the asking.

This department makes no claim to being a business adviser, and the "business medium" has no corner in it, yet to these urgent requests for answers, we give equally urgent reply. It is not exactly business, but to keep out of the business. You will save a lot of worry, disappointment and regret, and the satisfaction of knowing you have not contributed to the support of a clan of conscienceless rascals.

Chas. Fields: Q. In a lecture by Miss Elizabeth Harlow, on "The Dangers of Psychism," she says that Mrs. Eddy has given to her followers stolen truths that she filched from old Dr. Quimby. Is that true? And who is Dr. Quimby, and where can I get any of his writings?

A. There can be little doubt that Miss Harlow is correct in her statement. Mrs. Eddy started out as a spiritual medium, and finding this new field paid better, renounced her belief and became identified with her new views.

Dr. Quimby would not have been heralded to fame had not Mrs. Eddy seized his writings. Ordinarily, these would have brought no name or publicity, and if published would have fallen flat from the press. Like the Mormon Bible, the mystery creates curiosity. The pretense is an advertisement. The ignorant, incorrect, often ludicrous pages of the old doctor, are eagerly read, when a divine origin is claimed for them.

Some of the best parts of Christian Science were stolen from the writings of A. J. Davis. It is a remarkable book, because of its arrogant style, its incorrect statements, and audacious claims. The world has never seen a smoother graft, or more conscienceless scheme to get money and control the minds of those who accept it.

IT WAS A GRAND SUCCESS.

The Mid-Winter Mass-Meeting Held Under the Auspices of the State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota, in I. O. O. F. Hall, in the City of St. Paul, Feb. 22, 23, 24, 1907.

It was said the audiences were the largest they ever had in the history of the state association, a number of visitors being present from Iowa, Wisconsin, as well as Dakota, and a number of the towns within the state.

The speakers and message bearers were, for the most part, their home workers from the Twin Cities, with the exception of Mrs. McFarlin, vice-president of the Wisconsin Association. Two of the speakers, Mrs. S. M. Lowell and Mrs. Carrie Tryon, old and tried workers, are an honor to the cause. As they stand upon the platform they seem to be surrounded by a halo of light that illumines their countenances until they seem to be mirrors of the divine light. And also Mrs. J. P. Whitwell, the wife of Mr. Joseph P. Whitwell, president of the St. Paul Alliance, who is indeed a staff to his wife in her work, and his presence would grace any pulpit in the land, if he could only be added to our coterie of spiritual ministers; but Mrs. Whitwell is a reflector of love and seems to harmonize the forces as well as to assist in other ways in the meetings.

Mr. H. Hegdahl is a young worker in the cause, and he gave an enthusiastic talk on Friday afternoon. The earnestness, purity and spiritual devotion of this man is commendable; as he, too, is striving for intellectual cultivation his future success is prophetic.

Miss Alice Wickstrom gave a thirty minutes' talk on Saturday, under the inspiration of her spiritual leaders, and in time, no doubt, with her earnest desire to advance, will be a great help to the cause, as she is a noble, high-minded young woman, and her purity of character shines out, and as she perfects her intellect to unite in sympathy with her inspirers, she will succeed.

Another young speaker is H. E. Wheeler, who is a law student of the University of Minnesota. He is neither trance nor inspirational in his addresses, but in his fine presentation of Spiritualism made a deep impression upon an intellectual audience, on account of his ability to clothe his thoughts in polished language and elucidate his points logically. He has a fine accompaniment in his mother, Mrs. F. D. Wheeler, as a message bearer, as all know who have seen her upon the platform. Mrs. Wheeler is not only liked and admired for her pleasant, agreeable manner upon the platform, but also for her kindness in giving her musical talent for the benefit of the meeting. On short notice she filled a vacancy in the program Saturday evening, with the beautiful "Holy City," and gave great pleasure to her many friends.

There were a number of mediums upon the program whom I have not time nor space to speak of separately, but all did their part nobly, and as their manner of giving messages was distinctly individualized, it made quite a variety in the message-bearing part of the program. They were as follows: Mrs. E. M. Sauer of St. Paul, Mrs. P. Beuhler, Mrs. E. Courtney, Mrs. E. D. Lea, Mrs. E. Peake, Mrs. L. M. Lutz, Mrs. Mamie White and Mrs. Frank Shaft of Minneapolis.

Our good Brothers, E. C. Edwards of St. Paul, and J. H. McDonald of Minneapolis, spoke upon several occasions and are always an honor to the cause, and are both influential business men.

On Sunday afternoon we were favored with a most pleasing and entertaining program by the united lyceum workers of the Twin Cities. These little children showed good and careful training; their recitations, the essays of the older ones, the solos, both vocal and instrumental, were charming and their parents have reason to be proud of their progress, and these mothers and fathers can rest in the consciousness that they have done their duty to their children.

The only speaker outside of the state was Mrs. C. McFarlin, vice-president of the Wisconsin Association, who is here for the months of February and March. She gave addresses on Friday and Sunday evenings. On Sunday evening she spoke from the text, "I will not leave you comfortless," and in its application to Spiritualism—and Spiritualism to life—was a revelation to many in her audience, and from the hearty and repeated applause, she will know that her effort was appreciated. Mrs. McFarlin will do missionary work under the State Association of Minnesota and whoever desires her services, arrangements can be made through the president of the State Association, J. S. Maxwell, 83 N. 17th street, Minneapolis, Minn.

We wish to make mention of the musical talent at the mass-meeting. Mrs. B. Smith, Miss Grace Davis, Mrs. F. D. Wheeler and Mr. Ed Hottinger favored us with vocal and piano solos, and Misses Grace and Myrtle Porsch with violin duets. The sextette of the North Side Spiritual Society gave pleasure to their friends by their singing on Sunday evening. With the exception of Mrs. Wheeler they are all young workers in the ranks of Spiritualists, and for the first time in the history of the mass-meetings the music was contributed free of charge, for which our sincere thanks are given. At the Sunday morning meeting, Mr. S. Grant Harris of St. Paul, sang "Whisper and I Shall Hear," with violin obligato. His singing was greatly enjoyed by all present.

It has been said "The first shall be last and the last shall be first," and while Brother J. S. Maxwell comes last in this letter, he was the first president of the State Association of Minnesota, and he is still retained. He is a glowing ember of spiritual zeal, which united with his electrical charges of healing magnetism diffused through the audience, made them forget both time and fatigue; caused them to be swallowed up in the grand potency of his spiritual enthusiasm and were reconverted to the cause. But he has a grand and noble staff in his coterie of able assistants upon the board—Mr. J. P. Whitwell, vice-president; Mr. F. E. Irvine, secretary; Mr. H. Hegdahl, treasurer; Geo. W. Bush and P. J. Samson, trustees, all of whom were kept quite busy at the close of the meeting counting over the large sum of money raised to carry on the work of spreading the truth of Spiritualism throughout the state.

I will close this already too long letter by saying the mass-meeting was a "grand success," as Brother Maxwell declared it would be. COR.

"How to Train Children and Parents." Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents could not be better spent than in buying this little book. Anyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

WHERE IS STANFORD WHITE?

The One Who Was Murdered by Harry Thaw.

The world says that Harry Kendall Thaw killed Stanford White; but Harry Thaw only cut him loose from this ever-changing expression of the soul—his physical make-up. If anyone killed Stanford White it was Stanford White himself who killed him.

What does the bible say? "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

If half the reports on White's life are true, then he was one of the most dangerous men walking the earth. He was wealthy and lavish in his expenditures for himself and friends, luxurious and artistic in his tastes, personally magnetic, particularly when conversing, for it is said that at such times those around him forgot his ugliness—forgot the total depravity of the man.

Again he had the gift of architectural designing wonderfully developed; and yet, with everything in his favor, he went to the dogs; he was but a weakling and one of the very worst of weaklings; for the men and women who cannot by grace and will-power subdue the animal in them are weakest among the weak, no matter how many-sided gifts and graces they may otherwise possess. They are degenerates of the very lowest type.

Taking the physical life of another with a revolver, if it is a crime, it is at least a clean and wholesome crime, but wrecking the life of both body and soul, as was White's pastime, is horribly revolting.

The basest part of White's make-up was in that he made little girls his prey—little poverty-stricken girls; little girls who knew nothing whatever of the solemnity of life; and then he taught them that all men and women were alike—bad; that the only danger lay in being found out. "Be sure your sins will find you out."

Stanford White's sins have found him out; the shocking depravity of the man is laid bare for the whole world to probe, and if he sees, hears, and knows how his soul must shrivel up.

Paul said: "The natural man will constantly war with the spiritual man," and let none of us dare call ourselves strong who cannot hold the demands of the natural man in check.

But the question arises, where is White today, and how fares it with him? Is he in a position to watch the trial of Harry Thaw? Is he striving through Jerome to reduce his viciousness to a minimum by impeaching Evelyn Thaw's testimony? Is he revengeful toward Thaw and would he have him punished?

The Catholic church teaches that there are three places for the departing souls to go: One is heaven, but the church says that "Nothing defiled can enter the kingdom of heaven." So, really, this limits the soul to two places or conditions—purgatory or hell.

Purgatory is a state of probation and progression and beautifully in touch with the teachings of Spiritualism.

According to the teachings of the church Stanford White, dying in a state of mortal sin, was not fitted to enter purgatory, and therefore he would be consigned to hell, a place of eternal torment, for the church teaches that "Out of hell there is no redemption."

The Protestant church claims but two places for departing souls—a heaven or a hell, and of course this church would put White in hell; but modern thought is revolting against this theory of a hell of burning brimstone, a lake of fire and eternal torments. We must find some suitable punishment for White outside of hell.

Christ said, "Ye must be born again." Did the holy one of Nazareth mean just what he said, or are we going to twist and turn the words of the Master into something more pleasing to ourselves? Let us take him at his word.

Christ said, "As ye sow, so shall ye reap." And again, "If ye sow the wind ye shall reap the whirlwind." Stanford White sowed the whirlwind—what will the harvest be?

White's sins were committed in the flesh; his sins were the sins of the flesh, the sensual desires which cursed him physically and spiritually, sapping the life-forces of his physical vitality, and dwarfing and crippling all spiritual growth, therefore he must pay the penalty in the flesh; must be born again. Whatever his condition may be at his re-birth, it will be nothing more nor less than he has made it. Through great suffering he will finally learn that it pays to reach out after the highest intellectually and spiritually, and that nothing short of this does pay.

A Noted Woman Passed to Spirit Life.

The closed record of a human life governed by noble purpose and expressing a spirit of love through useful and philanthropic activities is a valuable legacy to mortals. Though the person may not stand high on the scroll of great names as connected with great events of world-wide interest, every such life adds to human value, and the enrichment spiritually of all who truly appreciate a worthy manifestation of a human soul.

The record left by Mary Irene Dye, who joined the arisen souls of the choir invisible on February 22, 1907, is one to be cherished for the beauty of its beneficent spirit, and its stimulus to high purpose and helpful activities.

Because for several of her later years circumstances made it necessary for her to remain on her farm in Kansas, her work in Chicago and her name has not appeared to remind of her value. During nearly twenty years she was earnestly active in progressive and uplifting movements. As a devout Spiritualist she realized the importance of a pure life devoted to high attainments.

She was an earnest worker and served as secretary in the Moral Educational Society ten years. The object of the society was to promote an intelligent parenthood of higher grade in purity and sense of responsibility to the child. She assisted in establishing the Protective Agency for Women and Children and served as secretary for three years. She aided in the movement for installing matrons in police stations, as well as for obtaining Saturday half holidays and seats for clerks in stores. She was a charter member of the Illinois Woman's Press Association, and a woman suffragist. Womanhood and motherhood were honored in this noble, large-hearted woman who made human welfare and the betterment of life conditions the chief object of her activities.

Such examples strengthen courage, quicken aspiration and remind us we, too, can make our lives an added blessing to humanity.

TWO REINCARNATION THEORIES.

They Are Diametrically Opposed to Each Other, Though Both Are Communicated by Spirits.

To the Editor:—A few weeks ago you kindly printed my communication, entitled "An Important Question," in which I mentioned some objections to the theory of reincarnation. I then said: "Reincarnationists are not clear in their teachings as to the exact time the disembodied soul attaches itself to the unborn child. I would be glad if their theory were not so hazy on this point."

Several parties have written me personal letters, each claiming he or she has positive proof that reincarnation is true. Such proof being based on spirit communication, and each seems anxious to clear away the fog enveloping my brain. I will give quotations from two of my correspondents, each of whom is an author and an authority on the subject of reincarnation. The first one (Mrs. J. S. Pettit Flint) says:

"First the tiny bud of matter nourished by the mother is composed of two distinct elements, physical and spiritual matter, and the principles of life. That tiny bud has yet no life or soul of its own. It is entirely dependent upon the mother for food and circulation." But there is a soul outside of physical matter drawn by that growing bud, living in the mother's outer magnetism, overshadowing her, waiting for the growth of that bud to a point where it can safely be removed from the mother-bed, and retain still its component principles, if taken immediate possession by a soul."

According to this school of reincarnationists the soul wishing to be born again in the physical body, has nothing to do with the father of a child. He just hovers about until the babe has grown to proper size, then steps in and takes possession of the little body. This authority alludes to the "tiny bud" as possessing no life, but in the next sentence refers to the bud as a "growing bud." Now I cannot understand how anything having no life can grow. Now is the "bud" a dead or a live bud, before Moses or Elijah takes possession of it? If alive, then it follows that a personality, an individual, an intelligent soul had been started up the ladder by the law of evolution. If that is true, then Moses is a trespasser, a robber, to step in and eject that spirit from its body.

I will now quote another authority, author of "Fate and Justice" (E. U. Weisendanger). He writes me that he is in direct communication with sages living in the highest spheres of the spirit world, and they tell him reincarnation is true, and here is how it is done:

"The to-be-reincarnated-soul enters the father of the child, and is the life of his seed. Under proper conditions, the life—seed, like an arrow, pierces the egg of the mother. It is already life. It attracts at once, nourishment for growth and unfoldment."

Now, here are two authorities, both of whom have written voluminously on the subject. The teaching of one is directly opposite to that of the other. Both claim to receive their instruction from exalted spirits. Each is sending me his and her writings to enable me to get out of "fog-land," and to know the truth about reincarnation. One tells me that Moses, when he wishes to be reborn on earth, has nothing to do with the father of the child he takes possession of. He waits till the infant grows to a certain age, then steps into that body. The other says: "Not so. Moses must get into the father first."

Now, how can a layman get out of fog-land when there is such a contradiction in the teachings of high authorities?

It seems to me that after I go "over there," I would not like to adopt either method of coming back into a physical body. I would not like to turn robber and eject from its body some other soul, getting a start towards immortality, neither would I enjoy shrinking myself down to an invisible atom and getting into the blood, or other fluids, of a Flat-head Indian, or Guinea Negro, or white-skinned thief, and take one chance in a million of getting again into a physical body.

I do not know how it is, neither do I think our reincarnation friends have solved all the problems of life. I know that the oak sheds millions of acorns. A million go back to the elements. One acorn meets proper environments, and from it, comes a gigantic tree. It is possible that the million abortive acorns may again be born on the "acorn plane," but the one acorn that produced the tree, has left the "acorn zone," and ascended to the "tree zone." The tree, having form and beauty, and a fuller manifestation of life than an acorn, can never under the law of evolution, be shrunken down to an infinitesimal size, and again become an acorn. Nature does not work on the "crawfish plan."

I can believe that Infinite Intelligence infinite life—fills the boundless universe; that a spark of that infinite life is embodied in matter and builds for itself a physical body in which, for a time it expands and unfolds, and becomes a Moses or a Socrates, and when the mortal body is no longer useful, it is laid aside, and the now conscious partially unfolded Socrates, goes to a higher zone, where he will continue to progress and unfold.

Having left the elementary state and gotten up into the conscious sphere, or on the first rung of the ladder, (the physical body), and at so-called death going to the second rung, I cannot believe he will ever again be "boiled down" to an invisible atom and be forced back into the elementary state.

As my reincarnationist friends are, in their kindness, sending me printed matter which they advise me to read, I will venture to recommend them to procure and carefully peruse Dr. J. M. Peebles's new book on "Reincarnation." The Doctor has studied the subject long and earnestly, and states his conclusion in the following words:

"Reincarnation does not appear to have one scrap of evidence to support it; it is merely a theory which we are asked to accept without proof."

Your correspondent, Mr. Editor, is still in fog-land, and he asks the pardon of his reincarnationist friends for expressing the opinion that they have waded out into such deep water that they are in danger of being drowned.

Secretary's Report

Of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, Read at Their Recent Annual Meeting.

[As a prelude to this report, it is eminently proper to state that according to instructions by the convention it has been greatly curtailed, as much so as could well be done and not leave out some very important, as well as interesting statements. It has been no easy task and we hope it may meet the approbation of the members of the convention, as well as other readers.

Respectfully submitted,
DR. T. WILKINS.
Chairman Committee on Secretary's Report.]

To the Officers and Members of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, in Convention:

The time of your secretary has been taken up to some extent by being called upon to answer questions, the real meaning of which were as to how can a society became associated with the State Association and reap all the benefits that would accrue from such affiliation without being held to the payment of the per capita tax dues of 25 cents for each member per year.

Think of the narrowness of souls whose love for our glorious cause is measured by that little measure of 25 cents for an entire year of time, and yet we hear the question oft repeated, "What is the State Association doing?" What would be the answer, think you, if the same question were put to these questioners? "The field is white unto the harvest even here in the State of Illinois. The heathen of our own state are still bowing down to the image of an imaginary God.

An instance has come to the notice of your secretary in which, in one of the states in which a state association exists, a medium very persistently and forcibly importuned the individual members of the official board for a certificate of ordination, thus indicating the value and advantage that such ordination would bring, and when it was finally granted, said medium or ordained minister of the gospel of Spiritualism, who had gathered together a few friends and formed a society and conducted Sunday metings, and repeatedly solicited the president of said state association to speak before said society, which solicitation always met with ready compliance, when not previously engaged, when it came about that said society desired a charter of some sort, instead of seeking affiliation with the state association which had ordained its pastor, this society procured a legal charter from the ordinary officials of the state, and entirely ignored the State SpirituaHsts' Association. This leads me to inquire as to the motive which prompts mediums in many instances, to ask for a certificate of ordination. My observation leads me to the conclusion that in at least nine cases out of ten it is for self-aggrandizement and to enable them to procure railway fare at half rates, rather than thoughts of the advancement of the cause they profess to love.

High and noble motives are inspirations to high and noble achievements; selfish motives lead to selfish ends only.

The missionary field of our state; what of it?

Having already referred to it as being in the possession largely of those who are still bowing down to idols, let us pass on and inquire what of the missionary work in our state? Missionary work per se, in distinction from that other branch of work which comes under the head of strengthening societies. What is being done? What has been done along the line of missionary labor in our State?

This should be a popular topic, since the question is so oft repeated, "What is the State Association doing along the line of missionary work, I'd like to know?" Let us briefly consider it.

In the first place, few are at all calculated for such labor. Going out among the "heathen" and commanding the attention, the respect, and carrying conviction to the hearts of the people who know nothing of the truth as revealed by the spirit-world, is a task far beyond most of the would-be workers. Your president and your secretary know of but very, very few who are at all adapted to such work. The few who possess the gifts, the talent for such aggressive work, command such salary as would in two or three short months entirely deplete our treasury, leaving us empty-handed and entirely helpless to follow up the work begun. It matters not, as a rule, how well such work may be begun, if there are none to follow up the inaugural work to keep alive the interest that is awakened, the time, the talent, the money expended goes to naught. Much is needed in addition to the planting of the seed. It must be watered, and cultivated, and watched over, and cared for in order to bring it to fruitage.

An official board with more zeal than good judgment, might easily rush on to the missionary field and deplete our tressury, leaving nothing with which to follow up the work begun.

Your official board has given much earnest consideration to this subject of missionary work in our state, but the few hundred dollars in the treasury would not justify the undertaking of anything along this line worthy the name.

If the same self-sacrificing spirit, which our president, Dr. Warne, has manifested, would take possession of us all, greater results would follow. My own excuse for not following his example has been that I am not fitted for the work. This may be a species of selfishness on my part which prompts me to enjoy my Sunday evenings in my own sweet way, while our president is in the harness every Sunday evening, working for the upbuilding of one society or another, without regard to its affiliation with our state association or otherwise, thus manifesting a devotion to the cause seldom if ever witnessed in others. One of the striking features in connection with the unselfish devotion of our president being the fact that he labors without remuneration, not even car fare is given him at all times. It being a case of "work for nothing and board yourself."

While we have witnessed a painful lack of self-sacrificing spirit on the part of Spiritualists in the past, nevertheless, the cause of Spiritualism is steadily advancing all over the length and breadth of our land, and I think I may safely add that it is not so much on account of Spiritualists themselves, but in spite of them.

During the association year just drawing to a close, your official board has watched for the welfare of the association, and performed the duties that have devolved upon it in accordance with its best judgment.

One ordination service has been conducted, ordaining Mrs Henrietta L. Lichty of Chicago, one new ordination certificate has been issued in exchange for an old one, to Mrs. Nora E. Hill of Chicago, One ordination has been voluntarily surrendered back to the official board, by F. Emanuel Lofgreen of Iowa.

Ordination, that of the so-called Prof. Ray of this city, has been revoked for cause so shameful in its nature that it could not be named here.

Following is a list of the societies chartered by your official board during the past association year:

April 2, 1906, The Spiritual Truth Association, of Decatur.

April 27, The Munger Spiritualist Church, of Macomb.

May 12, the First Spiritualist Society, of Beardstown.

May 21, Psychic Research Society, of Sycamore.

June 6, Progressive Research Society, of Elgin.

There have been, all told, 25 societies chartered by the State Association, 15 of which are in good standing, though few are represented by delegate here to-day.

The following is a list of the auxiliary societies that are in good standing:

1. Progressive Spiritual Society of Chicago.
2. The Spiritualist Society of Leroy.
3. The Free Progressive Church, of Farmer City.
4. The Spiritual Truth Association, of Decatur.
5. The Munger Spiritual Church, of Macomb.
6. The Spiritual Science Society, of Decatur.
7. The Progressive Research Society, of Elgin.
8. The First Spiritualist Society, of Beardstown.
9. Psychic Research Society, of Sycamore.
10. Psychic Research Society, of Rockford.
11. Hyde Park Occult Society, of Chicago.
12. The First Spiritualist Investigating Society, of Genoa.
13. The Dana Spiritualist Association, of Dana.
14. The Illinois Sunflower Club, of Chicago,
15. Wheaton Spiritualists' Unity Society, of Wheaton.

I cannot bring my report to a close without referring to the remarkable, though youthful helpmate of the State Association—The Illinois Sunflower Club, of Chicago. The assistance that this youthful spouse has rendered to her more aged partner in life need not be recounted in detail on this occasion. She possesses such persistent and aggressive energy as can result only in achievement. Labors begun by her are always carried to successful issue. You are all familiar with the very effective assistance rendered the State Association on the occasion of our last convention, and a work of like nature is being conducted by our youthful spouse on this annual occasion.

Another instance of her effective work is that when the official board, feeling in bounden duty to do something worthy the name of the association at the time when arrangements were being made for convening the National Association here in Chicago, in October last, donated $50.00 for the music furnished for that convention, and the Sunflower Club took in hand the matter of decorating the hall, and it not only did that self-imposed work successfully, but in the sweetest and most confiding manner possible, and with a smile of love upon her lips, slipped a check for $50.00 into the hands of the State Association through your secretary, thus restoring the balance in our treasury to its former status.

In conclusion, I bespeak for the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, and its "spouse," the Illinois Sunflower Club, a bright and prosperous future, and that as Spiritualists learn to understand and appreciate the value of concerted effort in organization there will be a great rallying to the support of each. If I may be permitted to refer to these two organizations so happily united, as "The Fleet of State," I will close with the following words:

Sail on! oh, Fleet of State,
Unfurl your banners wide,
Proclaim the truth, accept the right
'Till mortals, prone to hesitate,
Shall not oppose, shall cease to fight
For error, and the truth to hide.

Thy path, oh Fleet of State,
Shall be illumed by angel bands,
The fraud, the fake, the counterfeit,
Shall learn thy might, shall learn to quake,
When guns of state are trained to hit
Deception's work on every hand.

Sail on! oh, Fleet of State,
Fear not, fear naught save wrong
And evil deeds in thine own ships performed,
With love and purity, and naught of hate
Shall walls of foes be shot and stormed
'Till falling, when foes shall join our song.

And thus, when war and strife shall cease,
Our Fleet of State shall change its course,
With cannon hushed, though armor bright,
Into the harbor of love and peace
Shall sail our fleet with motto right,
With all on board, whate'er their source.

LIFE'S PROGRESSION.

"There is no death; there are no dead."

These words stand out on the cover of Edward C. Randall's new book. They are a challenge to the orthodox world, and through all of its pages runs this challenge to those whose ideas of God, of heaven, of hell, of a future life are based strictly upon the Bible. Yet Mr. Randall believes in life hereafter, based on positive knowledge given him from the living friends passed to the life beyond. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

THE PATHWAY OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT.

Or, the Pathway of the Spirit Traced.

By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A.

Did it pre-exist and does it reincarnate again into mortal life? When did it enter the body? What is its form—how does it relate to the soul body? Can it leave the human body and return again? Can it live in and control another mortal body? These questions and many others are asked and answered by the Doctor in this, his latest book, of two hundred pages. Price 75 cents; postage 13 cents.

RACE THOUGHT.

Viewed as an Obstruction to Human Progress.

The race thought has always been the great stumbling-block to the onward march of man, and the strong optimistic souls who moved along in spite of this awful barrier were termed heretics of the worst type. History records many of those who were subjected to the persecutions, and in many cases death by the hands of this mighty majority.

Socrates, the great thinker and philosopher, who lived several hundred years before Christ, was put to death by being compelled to drink the poison hemlock, because his bold and intrepid spirit had led him out into strange pathways in search of truth, and thus separated him in thought from the mass of the early Greeks. Plato, the favorite pupil of Socrates, whose name has gone down in history as one of the bright stars in the intellectual firmament of Greece, was persecuted, thrown into prison, and sold as a slave, because he dared to think and honestly respond to his ever-growing spirit.

But the names of Socrates and Plato have become immortal, while those who were instrumental in their persecution have long been forgotten. Johann Kepler, the keen thinker and astronomer of the sixteenth century, realized the baneful influence of Race Thought, and the hard hand of inquisition, but in spite of it all he pushed forth in the studies and gave expression to his growing spirit, as the following quotations will show:

"Nothing holds me; I will indulge in my sacred fury; I will triumph over mankind by the honest confession that I have stolen the golden vases of the Egyptians to build up a tabernacle for my God, far away from the confines of Egypt." "If you forgive me, I rejoice; if you are angry, I can bear it. The die is cast, the book is written to be read, either now or by posterity, I care not which. It may well wait a century for a reader, as God has waited 6,000 years for an answer."

You see, in that early day, Kepler knew what it meant to think in advance of the mass, but to-day the world of science and education look upon Kepler as an important link in the chain of astronomical science.

Galileo, a professor in the University of Padua, was another of the world's educators and leaders in thought, who felt the pressure of the hard hand of inquisition. Why? Because through his fertile mind he was able to transform the thought of the world to the sun as the center of the solar system, rather than the earth, which was in opposition to the Race Thought of his day. Through his primitive telescope, made from an old organ pipe, with a glass at each end, he was able to magnify the heavens to the extent that he discovered the milky way to be made up of countless stars. He also discovered the four moons of Jupiter, and the spots upon the sun.

The Aristotelian followers were determined to have revenge upon this pestilent heretic. He was compelled to recant in order to save himself the painful ordeal of being burned at the stake. Many of his manuscripts were destroyed, when, at the age of 78, his spirit took its flight to that world immortal, the real world, the spiritual world. The body of this old philosopher was laid to rest in unconsecrated ground, and his friends were not permitted to raise a monument in his honor, but in the face of all this the name has lived through these years, and will continue to live. Joan of Arc, the French peasant girl, through whose psychic powers (which was contrary to Race Thought) the French crown was saved, was pronounced a heretic and burned at the stake.

We might cull many other illustrations names from the pages of history who were under the hard hand of inquisition, but this will suffice to show that if we want to get into the vanguard of progress we must separate ourselves from the Race Thought of the age; we must become unconventional; we must travel in the unbeaten paths in search for truth. We must live, seemingly, a strange life in the eyes of the masses; we must love to be on the unpopular side of every great question, as there is where truth first makes its appearance, and thus expect to receive condemnation from the mass, the unthinking world. The great majority of the race to-day do not think, they do not realize that thought is the most potent power in the world, and essential in the development of a more perfect man, and thus a more perfect civilization. They are contented to continue in the old Race Thought, and thus remain as nature's unfinished product.

It is a science to think, and we can drift into this all-important science by forming the habit of thinking. Some one has said, "Go to work and learn how to think, take some subject and examine it mentally on all sides, and form conclusions of your own about it. This will be the beginning of the growth of your reasoning powers."

In proportion as man thinks, just in that proportion will he get from under the influence of this race thought in question, which means an intellectual man, a spiritual man, a Christ man.

We of this twentieth century, while still under the influence of race thought have the advantage of the erratic and progressive thinkers of the past centuries, in the fact that there is no law of inquisition, compelling a man to think along particular lines in accordance with church doctrines. Let us rejoice that we live in an age of more freedom than in the past, and yet we are not wholly free, and will not be until we become individualized sufficiently to do our own thinking, stand upon our own platform, a strong intellectual and spiritual representative of God or good under the influence of the eternal law of progress, continually arriving at truth, and thus working out our own destiny, as God or Nature intends we should.

"ALL'S WELL."

Brother Moses Hull Visits the Seattle Psychic Society.

At the regular services held by this society to-day at 3 p. m., Brother Moses Hull made himself felt and heard in a manner characteristic, and to all appearances, unmistakable.

While usually somewhat critical in relation to such occurrences, this is one that swept my skepticism away by sheer force of evidence. I had just concluded our opening exercises by reading that immortal poem by Andrew Norton, entitled "All's Well," and Mrs. Burleigh, (Miss Rice) had spoken under the usual control for about five minutes, when quite suddenly the control halted, turned partially around, and with a smile, impressed upon the face of the medium, stated that "we will now give way for a few moments to an old-time worker, one whom you all know and have heard many times, while in the form, and who would like to speak to you;" with a few more sentences of like character, and then the audience received conclusive evidence that Brother Hull was really at the helm. The medium's form straightened, in effort evidently made to square the shoulders and obtain speaking room, and a volume of inspiration was poured forth, mild and pleasing at first, but increasing in strength and fervor, until I, who was sitting but a few feet away, began to feel that Brother Moses was liable at any moment to step out, in the old form that we loved so well to look upon. The talk was not exclusively to those who were his former associates and friends, but to all the good people of Seattle.

He spoke of his many visits to this city, the warm greeting that was always given him, and the large hearted kindness and co-operation accorded him, and especially in that feature of his work which lay so near his heart, the Morris Pratt Institute.

This was particularly true, for I believe Brother Hull always felt while with us that in some way the "freedom of the city" had been accorded him.

But the real burden of his thought and appeal, as he stood before us, was to give expression to the great love of his own great soul for the cause that held so much for humanity and to which his own life had been given. "Love" to all mankind and to every sentient creature, was the meaning of the message, and his direct appeal to all to "dwell more upon love," "deal kindly and tenderly," "censure pone," "criticise less," "yes, love more as I have learned and do since the greater glory has been revealed," were a few of the golden sentiments that fell from the inspired lips of the speaker. I wish I could give in detail all that he said, but only a suggestive selection can be given.

As the lecture progressed the evidence accumulated that Brother Moses was indeed with us. No one could be near, or long in the presence of the living Moses, without feeling that peculiar charm that belonged to him alone. Others possessed the quality, but disguise the voice and close the eyes and if Moses were speaking we would know him from all others, and in this striking way it appealed to us who listened.

The effect upon the medium was very marked indeed. I have been familiar with the work of this medium for nearly or quite six years. She always speaks in a tone clear, but never strong or masculine. In the customary public address, the scriptural pronoun, "Thou," "Thee," and "Thine," are often used. In all my observation of her work, I have known these peculiarities of tone and speech to entirely disappear. This time they were entirely swept away. A masculine vocabulary and a masculine voice were heard, the expression vigorous and impressive.

Our chosen subject had been, "Why I am a Spiritualist." This was changed to "What is Spiritualism?" and as before suggested, it was defined as a "Message of Love" to all.

But this account must necessarily be brief. Whatever we may think of this occurrence, this we KNOW, viz: The loving side of Spiritualism was there, the same old "text-book"—with its recently added glories was alluded to; the same psychic conditions when he, Our Moses, stood upon the rostrum in mortal form, the same loving inspiration was breathed upon us as in times past; and I for one believe beyond question, that the man, the REAL Moses, thrilling as of yore with that great love for all that is good, again became an embassador of "Peace on Earth and good will to men."

DIVORCE AND LABOR.

Some Trenchant Thoughts Along Those Lines.

In a recent issue a spirit through Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss, in discussing the divorce evil, suggests various ways to alleviate the same.

The chief panacea suggested to do away with this wide-spread curse of the present day, is to harmonize the individuals, but is it a theory or a condition that confronts us? Harmony is a beautiful word, but in this age of greedy commercialism, we find the cotton mills of the South, silk mills, glass factories, sweatshops and other infernos throughout our fair land, according to the daily press, swallowing three millions of our children under 15 years of age.

Just consider for a moment the helpless waifs dragged from their homes to be ground into profits for a conscienceless class of money-grabbers.

Congress has been moved to take action along this line; so surely, it can be no anarchist dream.

How can harmony be brought into the lives of individuals who are forced into a veritable hell, and in sheer desperation plunge into another state (that of wedlock) without the privilege or opportunity to harmonize their lives, as typical of child labor throughout the country in various vocations? Supposing the one to be a clerk in a department store, getting a salary of from $3.50 to $5.00 a week, could she pay her room rent, board and clothe herself? And yet anyone knows that such are the wages paid in these establishments.

A condition akin to barbarism must obtain in any country where its children are held in such bondage. The object of this article is to show how modern business methods, combined with improved machinery, have shelved millions of the adults of both sexes and forced the youth of the nation, to sacrifice their bodies on the Altar of Mammon, and the choice many times lay between accepting such wages as must be augmented by a life of shame or rushing madly into wedlock, in which there can be no congeniality or harmony, and the only release being a little later in the divorce court, and then to sink nine times out of ten to a life of shame, and finally into a suicide's grave.

IMPORTANT DECISION.

Spiritualistic Seance Not in Amusement Class.

It is not unlawful under the ordinances of the city to charge an admission fee at the door of a Spiritualistic meeting Sunday night in Lincoln, even though that meeting be held in a theatre. That is the conclusion reached by Deputy City Attorney Flaherty this morning in police court.

The decision did not exactly conform to the ideas of Chief Cooper in the matter, who had imbibed the conviction that even a church organization had no right to charge a fee at the door for any entertainment or service given on Sunday.

The case arose out of the arrest of G. S. Klock and Mrs. Bell, Spiritualistic mediums and officers of the State League of Spiritualists, last evening. These two were conducting a spirit demonstration in the Bijou theatre, and an admission fee of 10 cents was being charged at the door. Just before time for the services, or as some consider it, the entertainment, to begin, policemen visited the place and placed Mr. Klock and Mrs. Bell under arrest. They insisted that the wagon be called, if they had to go to the station, and this was accordingly done. The patrol wagon dashed down the alley near the theatre and the two accused were loaded into it. Upon going Mr. Klock put a man at the door with instructions to collect 10 cents a head for all who entered, pending their visit to the station.

When they arrived at the police station they were registered, and were permitted to enter into personal recognizance for their appearance this morning. Then they were at liberty to walk back to the theater, but Mrs. Bell insisted that she was in something of a hurry, and as the wagon had brought them to the station, it should take them back again. This was somewhat contrary to custom and precedent at the station, but in this instance the police concluded to waive a point and they were hauled back to the theatre, where in the meantime the audience had been growing amain. Then the convocation of the departed proceeded, most of those in the house not having realized that any interruption had been sustained.

This morning the case was dismissed as the deputy city attorney reached the conclusion that there is nothing in the ordinances forbidding religious gatherings Sunday evenings, whether a fee be charged for admission or not, the district court having held in a former case that Spiritualism is a religion.

The ordinance under which the arrest was made is the one for the regulation of Sunday observance, which prohibits any show, play, opera, theatre or public amusement, except sacred concert from being held on Sunday. The attorney evidently was not prepared to classify a Spiritualistic meeting under any of the forbidden heads and the case was dismissed without complaint having been filed.

Mrs. Bell, the woman in the case, is the president of the Nebraska State League of Spiritualists, and lives at Crete, Coming to Lincoln every Sunday to conduct meetings. G. S. Klock says that she was formerly a well-known evangelist, connected with the orthodox churches, but recently "come into Spiritualism." For that reason she was made the head of the State League.—Lincoln (Neb.) News.

Excellent Results With Charles J. Barnes, at Canton, Ohio.

A glorious victory gained in this rock-ribbed hot-bed of orthodoxy. The trumpet medium, Charles Barnes of Warsaw, Ind., has been holding seances for us eleven consecutive nights, and wonderful results were produced through the trumpet. We had Irish, German, French, Hindoo, and English languages used in our seances. The light seances were grand also, such phenomena as tying knots, loops and French bows, using kerchiefs for the same; passing flowers out over the cabinet to anxious friends in the circle, writing messages on paper in German, Hindu and English, and passing them out in the same way; playing of the Zither in cabinet, the grasping of hands of our spirit friends, and the grandest of all, passing of a gold watch and chain through the solid curtain of the cabinet, all performed in the light, said light being turned up almost to its full capacity.

What Brother Barnes most desires is a brotherly and sisterly crowd, good conditions, and good results will invariably follow.

Brother Barnes deserves the good will and patronage of all honest and upright Spiritualists, as he caters only to that class.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. Sarah Ladd of Toledo, Ohio, a lover of Spiritualism and The Progressive Thinker, and a medium of excellent qualities, passed peacefully to the higher life, Feb. 14. The services were conducted by the writer in accord with the wishes of the deceased. Mrs. Ladd often said to me that The Progressive Thinker came as a dear friend and counsellor every week, and by her special request a copy of it was laid in the casket with her remains.

ELIZABETH SCHAUSS.
Toledo, Ohio.

Passed to spirit life, (Mrs. Martha Winchester of Grand Rapids, Mich., at the ripe old age of 87. It was a rare occurrence for a murmur, a complaint or an unkind word to fall from her lips. ARZELIA C. CLAY.
Grand Rapids, Mich.

Bentley Sabin of Fowlerville, Mich., passed to the higher life on Feb. 13. He would have been 97 years old in a few days; a Spiritualist of half a century, and a resident of Livingston county for sixty-one years. Julia M. Walton officiated.

Mrs. Nancy Dart of Swartz Creek, Mich., one of the early Spiritualists of that state, passed to spirit life and to join her companion, both of whom had reached a ripe old age. Mrs. Sarah Allen officiated at the funeral of Mrs. Dart. COR.

Gabriel Reed of Ashtabula, Ohio, passed to spirit life from his home, No. 5 Camp street, on Feb. 18, at the age of 68 years. He was a pronounced Spiritualist, an active member of our society, and always ready and willing to work in behalf of the grandest truth that ever blessed mankind. A beautiful spiritual service was conducted by Mr. Geo. Kates, assisted by Mrs. Wallace. The quartette sang sweetly appropriate selections. Bouquets, blossoms, garlands of beautiful flowers all combined to make the occasion one long to be remembered.

JOHN WALLACE.

Passed to spirit life, at Flint Mich., Feb. 18, Samuel C. Allen. He was a veteran Spiritualist, and it was in accordance with a promise he had exacted at least twelve years ago, from Mrs. A. E. Sheets, of Grand Ledge, Mich., that she would when called on to do so, hold the last services over his mortal body. Sunday, in the presence of his beloved companion, Dr. Sarah Allen, his three children, grandchildren and a large assembly of relatives and friends, the consolation of Spiritualism was given by Mrs. Sheets. His form was placed in a vault in Avondale cemetery. COR.

Passed to spirit life, from his home in Elkhart, Ind., Mr. Allen Muir, aged 67 years. Brother Muir had been ill over a year, and his passing away was due to paralysis. He was a thorough Spiritualist, having long been satisfied that the continuity of life was a certainty. Services were held in the home in Elkhart. The remains were taken to South Bend for interment, short services being held there. Many friends accompanied the remains in memory of the kindly soul who had so long occupied the mortal form. Services were conducted by Will J. Erwood.

Passed to the higher life, from his home in Kokomo, Ind., Nelson Todd, aged 55 years, after an illness of seven months. Brother Todd was a firm believer in the progressive philosophy of Spiritualism, and passed away with the full consciousness of a life beyond the grave. The services were held in the First Baptist Church, after which the Knights and Ladies of Honor held short services at the grave. Services by Will J. Erwood.

Our Brother, Burt Hogue, passed to to spirit life at Sherman, Texas, Feb. 10, 1907, to meet the magnificent record he had placed with the immortals. How pleasant must be his memory now of an honorable, upright life.

C. C. BRYAN.

Mrs. Eliza Davidson, of No. 40 So. Mill street, Columbus, Ohio, aged 86 years, passed to the higher life, Feb. 9. She was a charter member of the West Side Spiritual Church, and the funeral obsequies were conducted in the church under spiritual rites by Dr. C. S. Carr, assisted by the Rev. H. E. Boerstler, Mrs. Hattie G. Webster and Mrs. Harris. She lived the spiritual life, and was attended by the angels, communing with them for several days prior to her transition.

BURNS BARRELS OF AIR NOTHING ELSE LIKE IT.
THE MOST WONDERFUL STOVE EVER INVENTED! Causing great excitement wherever exhibited. Fuel drawn principally from atmosphere. Uses 895 barrels of air, while consuming one gallon of oil. Wood, coal and oil cost money. ONLY FREE FUEL IS AIR. Supply unlimited. No trust in control. Air belongs to rich and poor alike.
HARRISON'S VALVELESS OIL-GAS AND AIR BURNER STOVE
WICKLESS, AUTOMATIC
Automatically generates gas from kerosene oil, mixing it with air. Burns like gas. Intense hot fire. Combustion perfect. To operate—turn knob—oil runs into burner—touch a match, it generates gas which passes through air mixer, drawing in about a barrel of air, to every large spoonful of oil consumed. That's all. It is self-regulating, no more attention. Same heat all day, or all night. For more or less heat, simply turn knob. There it remains until you come again. To put fire out, turn knob, raising burner, oil runs back into can, fire's out. As near perfection as anything in this world. No dirt, soot, or ashes. No leaks—nothing to clog or close up. No wick—not even a valve, yet heat is under proper control.
SECTIONAL CUT OF GENERATOR
D. E. CARN, IND., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stoves are worth more than twice as much as they cost. It costs me only 4½ cents a day for fuel." L. S. NORRIS, VT., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel, at least 50% to 75% over wood and coal." E. D. ARNOLD, NEB., writes: "Saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. My range cost me $5.50 per month, and the Harrison only $1.25 per month." Objectionable features of all other stores wiped out. Not like those sold in stores. Ideal for cooking, roasting, baking, ironing, canning fruit, picnics, cottages, camping, also for heating houses, stores, rooms, etc., with radiating attachment. No more carrying coal, kindling, ashes, soot and dirt. No hot fiery kitchens. Absolutely safe from explosion. Not dangerous like gasoline. Simple, durable—last for years. Saves expense, drudgery and fuel bills.

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 35 CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 16, 1907 NO. 903

FOLLOWING NATURE.

Nature Is a Word of Large But Somewhat Indefinite Meaning. With Some Persons It Includes Everything That Exists. With Others, It Includes the Physical World, All the Animals Below Man, and His Physical Frame, Leaving the Psychical and Spiritual Man as Belonging to Another Order of Being.

The ancient Greeks, beyond any other people that ever lived, cultivated the love of Nature. They celebrated the beauties of the natural world in song and story, and embodied them in art and sculpture. Nature furnished their models, and they could use no language too strong to express their delight in whatever appealed to the eye and ear of man.

In later centuries, a new mood came over the mind of man. He conceived the idea that Nature was corrupt and depraved, and that the highest duty consists in crushing and subjugating it. To forsake the pleasures of life and repair to the desert; to extinguish natural desires and to overcome natural appetites; to learn to despise the body and whatever sustains it—this was considered the highest object of life and necessary to prepare man for the solemn realities which awaited him beyond the grave. Gibbon and Lecky, in eloquent passages, have described the results of this distorted conception of life and duty. It converted men into hermits and anchorites, and unfitted them for the secular pursuits of life, without any valuable intellectual or moral results.

Rousseau's teaching that Nature is perfect and to be followed implicitly, was a natural reaction from the asceticism of previous centuries. He went so far as to teach that men should return to a state of Nature, giving up all artificialities, all luxuries, and simply follow the methods of Nature in all her simplicity.

In these days, we avoid both these extremes, and take the ground that Nature, in her entirety, is wholesome and sound; that her methods are not to be despised, nor her mandates disregarded. At the same time, experience has taught us that Nature, far from being absolutely perfect, may be improved even by our own efforts; that we may change our environment to correspond with our own higher ideal conditions. By art and science we have improved our grain and fruits, our poultry, horses, cattle and swine, adapting them to our needs by making use of nature's own methods, without the violation of any of Nature's laws. We stock our water with species and varieties of fish brought from afar. In short, we change our surroundings at will, so far as our knowledge will permit. Our luscious fruits, such as the apple and the peach, have been developed from natural products that were scarcely fit to eat, and hundreds of our vegetable and animal products have been so transformed by the art of man that they bear only the slightest resemblance to their progenitors.

It is, indeed, the work of man today to change the face of the earth, and everything with which he has to do, in order to increase their usefulness and suitability to his wants.

Whether Nature is so defined as to comprehend the mental and spiritual part of man or not, is unimportant. We at least can improve it by education, by discipline, by self-restraint, as well and as certainly as we can improve our physical constitution by observance of the laws of physical health.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

THE NEW RELIGION.

Atheism and Religion Do Not Harmonize, Says the Dictionary.

According to the dictionary's definition of Atheist and Religion, the two names do not harmonize. Webster's New Counting-House and Family Dictionary says: Atheist, One who denies the existence of God." Religion, Recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience."

The same dictionary records: "Freethinker; Deist; Atheist; Skeptic; Unbeliever—some have endeavored to widen the sense of Infidel so as to embrace Atheist and every ism of unbelief, but this has failed. A Freethinker is now only another name for Infidel."

A. H. Nicholes, the author of this new religion, in The Progressive Thinker of November 24, describes right living, which belongs to everybody, and calls it Atheist's religion. He tells us that it inclines and leads us to the cultivation of things that are good, useful and beautiful, and requires the friction of use to prove its value. Then enumerates the humanitarian words which describe right living, or real Spiritualism. Just what its votaries demand of its adherents.

Why call it a religion? Right living, like Spiritualism, belongs to humanity. No more to the Atheist than to the Hottentot. Free to all.

There have been so many crimes committed in the name of religion, that the word means to many something far different from right living. A dear good woman was heard to say, "I have no particular religion, but try to do the best I can for myself and others." Another woman when solicited to attend religious services where numbers were being converted and getting religion, thus being prepared for heaven, modestly replied, "If taking care of my little ones and doing the best I can for my family won't take me to heaven. I'll stay!" These women cared more for right living than they did for religion, and no doubt were at the same time in the enjoyment of real heaven by doing what they deemed best.

T. J. Shelton says religion and politics are twins

Real Spiritualists have little in common with either, which is one reason why they have been so much at the mercy of politicians and religionists. If religion meant following the teachings of Christ, it would not be odious.

A good man will be a good man with his religion, while a bad man will use it for a cloak to cover his villainy.

Spiritualists do not commit murder, nor are they found in jails or penitentiaries. Being called Atheist or Infidel does not make them so. As a liberal-minded orthodox minister once said to me: "I might be arrested and put in jail, but that would not make me a thief."

SCINTILLATIONS

As They Emanate from the California Philosopher—His Views in Regard to "Our Own Future."

In the following article Mr. Dawbarn gives much excellent material for reflection, and it would be well for each one to carefully and thoughtfully consider the same. The limitations of Spirit Control and the lack of harmony in the teachings of spirits will ever be a fruitful theme for Spiritualists to consider. Read and re-read what the California Philosopher has to say.

"THE ONE POINT I WANT THE READER TO NOTE IS THAT EVERY PEOPLE, NO MATTER WHAT FORM ITS RELIGION HAS TAKEN, HAS ALWAYS HAD ITS SENSITIVES AND MEDIUMS TO VOICE MESSAGES FROM THE SPIRIT SIDE OF LIFE. LET US KEEP THAT IN MIND AS THE MOST IMPORTANT FACT IN HUMAN HISTORY."

"SO FAR WE FIND ONLY A MASS OF CONTRADICTIONS AS TO THE DETAILS OF SPIRIT LIFE, EACH NATION AND TRIBE, AND ALMOST EVERY SENSITIVE, APPARENTLY COLORING HIS OR ITS TALE TO SUIT THE RELIGIOUS BELIEFS OF THE LISTENER. IN OTHER WORDS, THE WORLD HAS NO RELIABLE INFORMATION AS TO WHAT WAS GOING ON IN THE LIFE BEYOND DEATH."

"THESE ARE ALL POINTS TO BE REMEMBERED, FOR OUR 'SENSITIVE' USUALLY BELIEVES HE IS GIVING US A SPIRIT COMMUNICATION. THEY ARE ALWAYS FOUNDED ON EXPERIENCES IN EARTH LIFE. I HAVE SO REPEATEDLY GIVEN THE SCIENTIFIC REASONS FOR MY ASSERTION THAT BOTH SPIRIT AND MORTAL ARE IN FOGLAND WHEN THEY MEET THAT I NEED NOT REPEAT THEM NOW. BUT MORTAL EXPERIENCE IS OF ITSELF QUITE SUFFICIENT TO PROVE THE UNTRUSTWORTHINESS OF ALL TALES OF SPIRIT LIFE."

"WHEN I ASK THE AMERICAN SPIRITUALIST WHAT HE BELIEVES AS TO HIS OWN FUTURE HE IMMEDIATELY QUOTES WHAT HE HAS HEARD FROM HIS LOVED ONE, OR PERHAPS HIS GRANDMOTHER, THROUGH HIS FAVORITE MEDIUM, OR POSSIBLY THROUGH HIS OWN ORGANISM, HERE BEGINS THE TROUBLE. FOR THE LOVED ONES OF THE FRENCHMAN TELL A DIFFERENT TALE. AND THE SISTERS AND COUSINS AND AUNTS OF THE THEOSOPHIST COME BACK TO DENY BOTH AUTHORITIES."

Every people on earth has some descriptive faith in its own future as individuals. That this is colored by national characteristics is well known. The all important fact is that no two nations have the same conception as to the details of their life beyond death. The Norseman whose highest ideal of manhood was battle to the death, believed he would go on fighting, and, if killed, would be alive again the next morning ready to begin all over again. It was just his mortal life grafted on to eternity. The red Indian was to have a happy hunting ground where he could chase and kill as in his present life. Only there was to be no death for himself or the animals he hunted. To him the change meant a death-flash into a life such as he would have desired here for his conception of happiness. To the Moslem his heaven for the true believer is just a harem, with wine, women and song to mark the love and approval of his deity.

The Hindu, who likes a life of rest, expects to take a nap of one or more centuries, and then, because his priests tell him so, he is to come back and try earth life all over again. The savage has the heaven belief of a savage, with all that implies. The heaven of the pagan was bespangled with gods and their families, as a divine copy of the rulers who managed his earth life.

The Christians tried hard to excel the pagan idea, so split up Deity into three,—one part cruel and jealous, another to embody the love principle; and the third part to fly round like a dove, and go just where he was sent by the other two. To complete their theology a hell of fire was designed to suit the cruel first part of their god, who was to continue cruel for all eternity. The second fraction of this Christian god was to have a heaven where love was to be the ruling principle. But the details of life in this heaven are left strangely misty and unreal. All we learn from the greatest of Christian seers is that there is a city there all ready for those the cruel part of deity has not seized. The houses of this city are to be as high as the city is broad, and there are to be great concerts there in which everybody joins by playing upon golden harps, and occasionally chanting "hosanna." Gold is so plentiful that it is used for paving the streets. There are horses with wings, and other beasts who can also say "hosanna." There are angels who go round playing trumpets, and doing a lot of fighting. Beyond this we have no details of the daily life in that heaven. It is left with as drear a monotony as that of the victims of the other part of god, who, apparently have nothing to do but to turn over and groan. The exact occupation of the "dove" part of deity in that heaven is left untold with the rest of the details of which we would like information.

The one point I want the reader to note is that every people, no matter what form its religion has taken, has always had its sensitives and mediums to voice messages from the spirit side of life. Let us keep that in mind as the most important fact in human history.

Now we turn to the "Modern Spiritualist" and ask him to give us his descriptive faith in his own future. He professes to have a telephone through which, for a dollar, he can chat with a spirit at almost any time. Sometimes he has a telephone of his own, that is to say, he is so sensitive that he can hear spirit sounds, and see spirit sights inaudible and invisible to the rest of us. All history tells us of such sensitives in every nation and tribe on the face of the earth.

Such sensitives were, however, never plentiful. They were always oracles, wonder workers and miracle dispensers. Sometimes the influences seemed to be diabolical, and gained power by threats. At other times they talked love, and coaxed their followers by miracles of healing. But all alike had something to say about another life, and claimed belief because they were there, and therefore knew all about it. Still, taken as a whole, they were very human, and always quarreling with the followers of some other sensitive. And, as civilization advanced one set of believers got the better of the rest both in numbers and power, and then usually called any intercourse with spirits "witchcraft," and therefore criminal unless endorsed by the priesthood in power.

So far we find only a mass of contradictions as to the details of spirit life, each nation and tribe, and almost every sensitive, apparently coloring his or its tale to suit the religious beliefs of the listener. In other words, the world has no reliable information as to what was going on in the life beyond death.

At last, we are told, a number of powerful spirits, who had been eminent in earth life, got together and determined they would open a school of truth for the benefit of the whole race of mortals. There had been sporadic attempts previously such as through the Shakers, through Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, Hudson Tuttle and others, but the wonderful era of truth for the masses was supposed to begin with the Fox-girl era at Hydesville. It was then that Modern Spiritualism was born.

The tests given by these spirit visitors were often convincing, but necessarily had to be on the plane of mortal experience. They used every power of the sensitive as if it were all of the spirit. Clairvoyance, clairaudience, psychometry, and the inreaching power of the subjective self were all strings played upon in this spirit anthem. The troubles of earth life were often relieved, and its pains and sorrows soothed. The happenings of earth life were sometimes known to the spirit in minute detail, so that, at last, these controls of sensitives were often almost worshiped as truth-tellers. The consequences to the mortal are not the purpose of this article. It is enough for us to recognize that it seemed natural that if a spirit could tell you the truth about this life he would be just as reliable when he told you about his daily experiences in his spirit home. But the fact that he almost never brought to earth any truth or statement of fact not known to some mortal somewhere, began at last to arouse suspicion as to his limitations in other respects. So it happened that the spirit teacher became himself a subject for scientific study.

It was realized by the present writer that if we could not perceive or sense the vibrations of his life while we were normal mortals, neither could he sense our vibrations while he was a normal spirit. In fact normal mortals and normal spirits were without possibility of contact. This was a tremendous discovery, for it explained many of the discrepancies and absurdities that often made genuine spirit return ridiculous. It was seen that only an abnormal spirit and an abnormal mortal could become teacher and pupil. They could meet neither in the spirit world, nor on the level of earth life. So the present writer called the vibratory region where they could meet, FOGLAND.

The abnormal mortal we call a "sensitive" because he (or she) senses vibrations impossible to the rest of us. The abnormal sensitive is, for the same reason, a sensitive among his fellows. But since both are "befogged," their talk, when they meet, is always translated into earth vibrations by the mortal, and therefore colored and more or less distorted.

But a mortal "sensitive" is sensitive to other abnormal vibrations with which the spirit visitor has nothing to do. He is so negative that the thought of a sitter or companion is expressed as if it were coming from a spirit. His own subconsciousness becomes wide awake, and tells its tale. But we remember that "sensitive" is in FOGLAND, and while in that condition, so far as telepathy is a natural fact, he is influenced by thoughts floating in the atmosphere, discharged by mortals regardless of distance.

These are all points to be remembered, for our "sensitive" usually believes he is giving us a spirit communication. They are always founded on experiences in earth life. I have so repeatedly given the scientific reasons for my assertion that both spirit and mortal are in FOGLAND when they meet that I need not repeat them now. But mortal experience is of itself quite sufficient to prove the untrustworthiness of all tales of spirit life.

The utterances of spirits through their mediums are full of contradictions on questions of fact. We can get nothing of value from a "control" concerning any event in the distant past, that is to say, no statement that will not be contradicted by some other spirit. In fact we are obliged to acknowledge, if we are careful seekers after truth, that the usual mixture of mortal and spirit is about as uncertain in its effects as the drug mixture of the learned doctor. And, as a matter of fact, how much is spirit, and how much is mortal cannot be decided by any mortal jury. We may almost consider it settled that anything of real value in mortal life comes from the psychic powers of the sensitive, stimulated and possibly inspired by an invisible helper. Under such conditions how much of either the past or the future of such teachings have we a right to accept as SPIRIT TRUTH? And it is the future which is the really important fact for each of us. We each want to know, if it is possible to KNOW, something of our own coming future.

The reader will please understand that in writing this article I am as anxious as he is to discover the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth concerning my own future as well as his. For we are fellow mortals, and one day our future will be relatively the same. I have no sympathy with the pure materialist to whom intelligence is secreted by the brain, just as bile is by the liver. He believes that when brain and liver disintegrate intelligence and bile are in a state of nothingness. My own personal experiences in "spirit return," as well as the scientific gatherings of the Society for Psychical Research, have convinced me that immortal man is as much a fact as man the mortal. And, I take it, this is the position of most of my readers. It is the next step that is trouble.

When I ask the American Spiritualist what he believes as to his own future he immediately quotes what he has heard from his loved one, or perhaps his grandmother, through his favorite medium, or possibly through his own organism. Here begins the trouble. For the loved ones of the Frenchman tell a different tale. And the sisters and cousins and aunts of the Theosophist come back to deny both authorities. Here, for instance, is a sensitive in America telling some thrilling tale of spirit life in the name of a spirit, as his personal experience. It is always beautifully natural, because just a glorified copy of earth life, flavored with a few quite unexplainable conditions that leave out the disagreeables of mortal existence. But the Theosophist claims to be in contact with intelligences who have crossed the divide, and now directly contradict both the American and the French teachings. So we are beginning to have sects founded upon the different teachings of spirits, each with his own personal experience.

We have a yet more serious perplexity in the fact that our own spirit teachers tell a tale through one medium; and very likely contradict it through another. This is the case at the present time through the spirits who were evangelical teachers through Stainton Moses, and now contradict themselves through Mrs. Piper. The thinker who dares face such facts must realize that all is uncertainty as to the details of the life into which he is presently going. In the midst of so much uncertainty the one important question becomes this: What do we know about man the mortal which must more or less affect his future? I don't mean from the theological teachings of our clergy. And I don't mean from the teachings of these contradictory returning spirits. Both offer us a befuddling mixture that upsets the mental stomach of every earnest seeker after truth.

I know it is fashionable among theologians and Spiritualists to sneer at the scientist who passes his life accumulating facts, and labeling them for future reference. But facts are truth, and that is what we are after. I do not know how many of my readers have studied, or even believe the proved scientific fact that the personality of man the mortal can be split into fragments by shock or disease. But the reader will please remember that our conception of our own future is founded on our belief that we carry our own personality right out to the next life. If wicked, we go there wicked. If we have led a noble life, our immediate future is to be a replica of this. I know the theologian absurdly teaches that our future is to be determined by what we have believed here. To that nonsense I am not replying. But our earth conduct is an altogether different matter. And here we face the deepest problem of mortal existence, which cannot be solved without scientific assistance, although the scientist may deny the lesson of his own facts.

We have first the myriad cases like that of Miss Beauchamp, studied and recorded by Dr. Morton Prince in his wonderful book, "Dissociated Personality." Such cases prove, oh, reader, that your personality and mine can be broken into fragments by shock or disease, and that such fragments become each a new personality. Once accept that as a natural fact and we have made the most momentous discovery since the day that man was able to think. When added to the fact of "spirit return" it becomes certain that a man is only partly expressed in mortal life. You ask what are the facts that tell us this tale of a newly discovered truth? We find them in spirit return itself.

Certain men who have devoted their lives to the scientific study of the psychology of the mortal, like Myers of England, and Hodgson, who recently died in Boston, are if almost any theory of future life is accepted as probable, both willing and anxious to give mortals an account of their present experiences. Myers had carefully provided as proof of his spirit identity, a statement in a sealed letter. The proof failed, as have the vast majority of such attempts. No mortal knew what was in that sealed letter, therefore we have the right to assume that "telepathy," even if accepted as between mortals is a failure as between mortal and spirit. Out of thousands of mortal sensitives, one or more would certainly have caught the thought of spirit F. W. Myers, whose life work had been to prove the survival of man the mortal after death. What was the cause of this, and a myriad similar failures? Undoubtedly the cause was that Myers the spirit was now a different personality, in some respects from that he manifested in earth life.

When it is once proved and accepted as a fact in nature that mortal personality is but an uncertain factor for any of us, we have the key to these discrepancies, uncertainties and contradictions that too often make spirit return little but a farce. If a shock can break up a personality into several personalities, each demanding separate identification as "spirit return," how is it possible to make any asserted proof more than a test of the identity of the personality we knew in earth life? Take the case reported with such care by Dr. Wier Mitchell of Mary Reynolds, who had two distinct personalities. The last, the better of the two, remained for twenty-five years, and she died with it. But how are those who only knew the first Mary Reynolds to find her spirit if personality remains unchanged by death? When I take such facts, and the myriad others now on record, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that neither the reader nor I know what will be our personality after we have left death behind. I know that some seem to be almost unchanged at first, but such seem almost always to belong to the earth-bound class. But as soon as they have made real progress there is such a change of personality that they can hardly recall any details of their earth life when they return.

Of course there are some who will say we have not yet enough recorded cases of "dissociated personality" to justify this conclusion. But after thousands of carefully recorded cases of spirit return, many scientists are still clamoring for more before they can believe in their own immortality. We are told that Newton caught the law of universal attraction from the fall of one apple. That was a fact to him, and he learned its lesson. And the independent thinker will likewise learn the lesson of these recorded "dissociations" which, with other facts I have pointed out, prove that our own personality after death is, most likely, but a faint resemblance of our earth selfhood by which we know one another now.

This article is already too long, so I will close with a brief summary. Accepting the fact that a change of personality is possible and proved, we can know little or nothing of the new personality, or any of its experiences. The only personality that gets back must be so closely related to earth life that its tales of spirit life must be nine-tenths founded on mortal experience. Those who would return from a higher spirit level can only reach us through FOGLAND, and thus leave their present personality an unknown quantity to the investigator, and their identity unprovable.

We know that many a spirit has brought with him a blessing to earth life. We have to also acknowledge that tales of spirit life are absolutely unprovable, and that the present personality of our spirit visitor is also unprovable. This being a logical deduction from gathered facts, we are compelled to acknowledge that any asserted detail of our own future remains also unprovable. The love that can meet and blend in that future that belongs to us all will most certainly not be founded on the personality we worship in earth life, but will have the basis of a larger manhood, only part of which is represented by us to-day. Your mother, wife, child, is developing a grand personality of which you have no memory, although the identity will remain ever the same.

Such is the lesson for us all from the many recorded destructions of the personalities by which we know each other in earth life.

MOSES HULL.

Close the folds of his tent! Softly tread
The brown turf, for our Chieftain lies dead.
In camp there is woe!
Spears, fallen prone, lie deep in the dust;
Tears splashing their brightness with rust,
And camp-fires burn low.

Heavy chains to white slave-limbs, of old,
Were forged, fastened by fetters of gold,
In bondage of shame!
We had marched thro' the wilderness, far;
Hope, at last saw a light, and a star
O'er Bethlehem came.

In the midst of the march he hath died,
And the host are encamped at his side,
Dark shadows creep down
From the hilltops that rise to the sun.
Death! thou steal'st ere the battle is done,
From victor, the crown.

Close the folds of his tent! Softly tread
The brown turf, for our Chieftain lies dead.
His armor still on.
Thro' the shadows the heights we must gain;
Onward march, though we weep for our slain,
Through mists of the dawn.

Saviors, thorn-crowned, have died.
Heroes fall;
But the truths they upheld conquer all,
At last, and for aye!
Our grand Chieftain e'er loved Earth's oppressed;
Fought Oppression and gave it no rest
By night nor by day.

Close the folds of his tent! Softly tread
The brown turf, for our Chieftain lies dead.
Disturb not his rest!
For our glorified Cause like a star,
Rising high o'er the hill-tops, afar,
Illumes his calm breat.

A MEMORABLE TRIO.

Sarah A. Byrnes, Moses Hull, Jennie Hagan Brown—Their Works Do Follow Them.

Dear beloved Sarah A. Byrnes, a woman of dignity, truthfulness and uprightness of character. How we shall miss her from our ranks. She was indeed a credit to the Spiritualist platform, more noticeable in the early days of Onset, when mediums of a more crude and uneducated class were obliged to be employed to voice the sentiments from the spirit world, because, as is well known, no matter how deep the subject, it cannot be delivered in a manner satisfactory to the spirit instructor, if given through an uneducated person who stands in the place of a medium, or received by a critical public with proper weight or consideration.

Moses Hull was well convinced of the importance of education among our mediums, and that was the reason he worked so steadily and untiringly for the success of the Pratt school, founded for the purpose of putting before the world a class of mediums whese education should help to carry conviction to the people and not subject the medium as well as the spirit to scoffing and derision, for the world in general does not stop to consider that Jesus chose his disciples from the lowly, or that a medium is a medium because born as such, no matter what his early education or environment may have been.

Our dear Sarah was always the same, never puffed up by adulation or spoiled by flattery. She was ever looking for growth and betterment of self, as well as for others, and always considered herself a "fellow-student" with the most humble seeker after truth. She said to me, after one of her forcible lectures, when someone rose to speak of the good she had accomplished, "It surprises me to find these people just waking up to my work and worth at the last day, when I have been a worker for the cause since childhood, and in my early days an appreciation of my efforts would have been an incentive to greater action; now I am along in years and about to retire, I do not need it."

Her words of sympathy, hope and encouragement have been a support and comfort to mourning ones at the death of friends, and many will think of her now with gratitude.

Dear Sarah Byrnes, we shall hear her glad voice or see her sweet smile no more in the form, but her memory will be cherished through life, and may her loving arms be outstretched to greet us when we, too, all torn and bleeding and bruised with the scars of earth, shall lay down our burdens for a better condition in spirit life.

Moses Hull, that grand old man, what a power he has been in the hands of the spirit world. We cannot realize the half he has done for the furtherance of the cause of Spiritualism. How he has helped to open the eyes of the blind and expand the minds of the people. His bible lessons and interpretation of the Scriptures has helped to banish old-time idolatry and set the people to thinking for themselves and to understand that every soul must be its own Savior.

What a fearful responsibility we feel is ours when we wake to the understanding that we are to be our own Savior, and not that we can throw our responsibilities upon the shoulders of another. The thought is overwhelming at first to a thinking mind, for what more exacting or rigid accuser can we have than our own conscience?

I received a letter from Brother Hull only four days before he left the body, full of hope as ever. He wrote he would like to visit dear old Onset once more to see some of the old friends, but if the time came for him to go before, he was little concerned about what became of his body. He said Mrs. Hull and he were receiving their full share of abuse and contumely, but they flattened on it; and what worker for an advanced thought does not receive it, and they expect it when they start out and in time grow used to it. To place a rose in our cold and stiffened fingers as we lie in our casket does not in any way compensate for the wrongs and heartaches caused while we were in the body striving to do the right as we saw it. When will people even in our own ranks, learn to bear with each other's shortcomings, and try to rule that little member, the tongue.

Mr. Hull was a pioneer in every sense of the word, and he fully realized he was not in this world to sit idly down, fold his hands and take comfort in that way, but he felt there was a great work to do and every hour of the day, with him, was one of work for humanity.

But his work here in the body is finished, and his dear companion alone knows best how he is missed, but his work will go on and on, and I trust his mantle will fall upon one well worthy to fill his place in the work he has chosen.

We have not fully recovered from the shock of our loss in the two above mentioned, when news comes of the departure from the body of Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, another of our great workers in the cause, and well known as a lecturer from Maine to California. She was a little sprite in the early days of Onset, and used to improvise verse after verse from subjects given by the audience. A mere child when first brought here by her mother, and as she grew and expanded in intellect, she took up the work of lecturing. I remember well her first lecture, and the encouragement given her by Dr. Storer, J. Frank Baxter, and others. She was then and there given the title of "The Daughter of Onset," and was ever after known as such, being herself proud of the title.

Dear little Jennie, we shall always think of her with love and tenderness.

Sarah A. Byrnes, Moses Hull, Jennie Hagan Brown, WHAT A TRIO! What a concentration of power. It seems that we cannot afford to lose them at this time, but perhaps it is best so. They have done their work well and gone up higher to work in a broader field, and I hope places that knew them so well may be filled by others who may prove to be shining lights in the cause of true Spiritualism.

AN ENJOYABLE AFFAIR.

Birthday Party in Honor of the President of the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C.

Mr. F. A. Wood, the genial and able president of the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., was made the distinguished recipient of an enjoyable and unique testimonial on the occasion of the anniversary of his birth—March 1—in a theatre party of twenty-one friends, given in his honor by Miss Florence Ahl, who has been spending a greater part of the winter in the Capitol City.

The party of prominent Spiritualists, including the well-known lecturer and medium, Oscar A. Edgerly, Mr. and Mrs. Stephens, the latter a popular medium of Washington; Mrs. H. D. Morgan, secretary of the First Association; Mr. and Mrs. N. White, Mrs. Dr. Moore, Prof. and Mrs. Longley met in the lobby of the Columbia Theatre where the inimitable May Irwin and her talented company, were drawing large audiences, and were each supplied with boutonnieres and ribbon-decorated programs, by Miss Ahl, and conducted to the choice seats which she had secured for the occasion. Needless to say that the entertainment was hugely enjoyed by each one, as was the dainty collation at a popular cafe, given by the hostess at the close of the performance.

While at the table, Mrs. Longley in a few appropriate words gave thanks in the name of all present to the hostess for the happy evening all had spent, and also, in behalf of Miss Ahl, presented the honored guest, Mr. Wood, with a beautiful copy of Elbert Hubbard's choice booklet on Silence. Mr. Wood responded in a felicitous manner. Miss Ahl, the hostess of the evening is a lady of rare mental endowment, a teacher and thinker along the lines of high and ennobling thought. She has endeared herself to many friends in Washington.

During the day, Mrs. Longley wrote the following poem and sent it to Mr. Wood from herself and the spirit world:

To Mr. F. A. Wood, President of the First Association of Spiritualists:

Dear friend, it is with sweet accord
That loving hearts unite
And waft to thee the golden word
That ever shines in light;
The glorious word that glows above
In souls that hold you dear—
The tender word of matchless LOVE
That earth-friends waft you here.

For all above, and all below
Who know you most and best
Have watched your steppings—to and fro—
And seen that you have blest
So many humans in your path—
Have done so much of Good,
That many, for you blessings have
In name of Brotherhood.

We thankful are, that you were born
And that you've reached this day—
This mortal world you still adorn
With blessings on your way;
With grace of soul and noble worth
Your life has shown in light—
And so we praise your latest birth,
This anniversary night.

Sweet blossoms of the early spring,
That ever fadeless bloom
The loving angels to you bring—
A message of perfume;
And pure affections in our hearts
Are flowers that will not die;
Each one to you new life imparts
And brings celestials nigh.

Oh, may you live these many years
To bless our human lives,
Your work in loftiness uprears,
And fainting hearts revives;
We give our best to you this hour,
Our love and tribute sweet—
Oh, may it bear to you new power
Till yonder, all shall meet.

—Spirit Nannie, through Mrs. M. T. Longley, Medium.

CONSCIOUSNESS.

The Truth and Meaning of Development.

I wish I might call the attention of every reader of The Progressive Thinker to the—to me—wonderfully valuable article on this subject from the pen of our good brother, W. V. Newcum, and I wish furthermore they could all see and understand the deep esoteric meaning in every line, for I believe the truth and meaning of development would come home to them as never before, and it would help them so much to understand themselves and their own possibilities. It appeals to me as a beautiful inspiration, and a restfulness and peace has come from its reading.

His illustration of the lessons given the child applies with equal truth to us all, and one can easily see that one lesson at a time is or can be given us, and that one in accord with our unfoldment.

Of what avail would further lessons be to us if the first was not understood? And is it not true that in our eager pace to get over the hard places in life, failing to see that we need just such trying conditions, and failing likewise to learn our lessons from those hard experiences, that our feet continue to stumble, and we rise only to fall again, and we rebel at our lot and mourn that better things do not come to us. Would that we all might say with John Burroughs:

"Serene, I fold my hands and wait,
Nor care for wind nor tide nor sea;
I rave no more 'gainst time or fate,
For lo! my own shall come to me."

Instead of mourning and rebelling "'gainst time or fate" or adverse circumstances, let us rise up to this one thought, that what is ours will come to us as surely as "the stars come to the night," and the faster we learn our lessons, the sooner will greater problems be given us to solve through the soul's awakened consciousness. Let us turn about and try to feel and understand that the present condition corresponds with exactness to the needs of the hour, and only when we do realize this truth and utilize the lesson contained therein, can we come into higher and better conditions, and then we will go on and on from one step to another, as the soul grows in strength and power, for "We mount the ladder by which we rise round by round."

THE CONSTITUTION.

And Its Relation to Religion—"If the People of the State of New York, for Instance, Were So Disposed They Could Make the Roman Catholic Church or Any Other Church the State Establishment, and Dr. Silverman Would Invoke the National Constitution Against It in Vain."

Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman of Temple Emanuel, New York, recently delivered a discourse on the separation of church and state. He said, among other things: "It may be a surprise to many of our patriotic citizens and our legislators to learn that while technically and constitutionally there is a separation of church and state in this country there is in fact a decided union between religion and government."

That there is recognition of religion by our governments, state and national, is true. As the Chronicle recently stated, it is customary to open the sessions of political bodies with prayer. The senate and the house of representatives in Washington are so opened. The same is true of the houses of most if not all of our state legislatures. The national and often the state conventions of most of our political parties are usually opened in like manner.

Formerly our public schools were usually opened with bible-reading and prayer, but that practice has been generally discontinued, though from what Dr. Silverman says it is to be inferred that it still prevails in the city of New York. Oaths are administered to public officials, judges, jurors and witnesses in a manner implying some measure of religious belief.

It is undeniably true also that in all this recognition of religion by government preference is given to the Christian religion. It certainly is not given to Judaism or Mohammedanism, nor is any recognition given to any religion which is essentially idolatrous or pantheistic.

But this preference so far as the government of the United States is concerned is by no means in violation of the letter or the spirit of the national constitution, as Dr. Silverman seems to think. The constitution provides that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust in the United States." It also provides that "congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

That is all the national constitution says on the subject. There is nothing in either provision to forbid such preference as is shown. Such preference does not set up a religious test as a qualification for office or trust. It does not have the force of law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. It is therefore not inconsistent with the constitution.

Dr. Silverman shows himself still more mistaken when he says: "It is folly to say that bible reading and prayer in the public school are no violation of the constitution"—that is, of the national constitution.

It may be a surprise to Dr. Silverman himself to learn that the public schools, excepting in the District of Columbia and the territories, including reservations, are state institutions conducted under state constitutions and laws, and that the states are at liberty to prescribe such religious observances and exercises for their public schools as they please.

Much as it may astonish Dr. Silverman, there is nothing in the national constitution to prevent any state from establishing a church if it chooses. It can provide that there shall be bible reading and prayer in its public schools if it so pleases, and there is not a word in the constitution of the United States to prevent.

Undoubtedly no state in the union wants a state church, unless it is Utah. Undoubtedly no other state is disposed to prescribe a religious qualification for office or to abridge religious liberty. But we have to thank the people of the several states for this, not the constitution of the United States.

If the people of the state of New York, for instance, were so disposed they could make the Roman Catholic church or any other church the state establishment, and Dr. Silverman would invoke the national constitution against it in vain.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To the Spiritualists of Wisconsin, Greetings.

Your attention is called to the seventh annual convention of the State Association, to be held in Milwaukee, Wis., April 16, 17, and 18. Ethical Hall, Jefferson street, between Martin and Juneau avenue, has been secured for the occasion; good music and talent, both local and outside

The ladies of Milwaukee will serve dinner and luncheon at convention hall for a small amount of money to all visiting delegates and friends

Miss Elizabeth Harlow of Columbus, Ohio, will be the main speaker for the evening meetings. Mrs Georgia Gladys Cooley of Chicago, Ill., who was the message medium at the National Spiritualists' Convention, held in Chicago, last October, and whose wonderful descriptions and messages convinced all who heard her, will be the test medium at all public meetings.

Hotel headquarters have been established at the St. Charles Hotel at reasonable rates.

The order of convention business will be about as follows:

Monday, April 15, 8 p. m., reception at St. Charles hotel, parlors for officers, delegates and friends.

Tuesday, April 16, morning, meeting of delegates and members at the hall, for the purpose of introducing and outlining for the convention; afternoon, business meeting; evening, public meeting.

Wednesday, April 17, morning and afternoon, business meeting; evening, public meeting.

Thursday, April 18, morning, business meeting and election of officers; afternoon, public meeting devoted to demonstration of mediumship; evening, public meeting.

Legislation for this convention will comprise important points of interest to all Spiritualists, and fixing of place for next convention, election of delegates to the N. S. A. convention; election of officers of the State Association and other questions of vital importance will be disposed of.

For further information concerning the convention apply to the Secretary, Miss Louise G. Loebel, 202 North ave., Milwaukee, Wis.

It is hoped that every member of the Association and all friends of the cause will be present and add their influence to this convention, to make it serve the best interests to the cause of Spiritualism and Humanity.

LOUISE G. LOEBEL, Sec'y.

What Happens When We Die

O, DEATH, WHERE IS THY MYSTERY IF HUMANKIND CAN STUDY THY WAYS AND SEE THE ROAD THOU GOEST?

ANNIE BESANT, THE FAMOUS ENGLISH EDUCATOR IN INDIA, SAYS THERE ARE MANY LIVING PEOPLE WHO HAVE STUDIED DEATH FIRST HAND, AND THAT SHE HAS HAD CONVERSE WITH SUCH.

THE PROCESS OF THE MAN'S WITHDRAWAL FROM THE BODY HAS BEEN WATCHED BY CLAIRVOYANTS AND DEFINITELY DESCRIBED, DECLARES MRS. BESANT. THUS ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS, "THE POUGHKEEPSIE SEER," DESCRIBES HOW HE HIMSELF WATCHED THE ESCAPE OF THE ETHEREAL BODY, AND HE STATES THAT THE MAGNETIC CORD DID NOT BREAK FOR MORE THAN THIRTY-SIX HOURS AFTER APPARENT DEATH. OTHERS HAVE DESCRIBED HOW THEY SAW A FAINT VIOLET MIST RISE FROM THE DYING BODY, GRADUALLY CONDENSING INTO A FIGURE WHICH WAS THE COUNTERPART OF THE EXPIRING PERSON AND ATTACHED TO THAT PERSON BY A GLISTENING THREAD.

O, Death, where is thy mystery if humankind can study thy ways and see the road thou goest?

Annie Besant, the famous English educator in India, says there are many living people who have studied death first-hand, and that she has had converse with such.

The process of the man's withdrawal from the body has been watched by clairvoyants and definitely described, declares Mrs. Besant. Thus Andrew Jackson Davis, "the Poughkeepsie seer," describes how he himself watched the escape of the ethereal body, and he states that the magnetic cord did not break for more than 36 hours after apparent death. Others have described how they saw a faint violet mist rise from the dying body, gradually condensing into a figure which was the counterpart of the expiring person and attached to that person by a glistening thread.

Soul Attached to Body by Magnetic Thread.

The snapping of the thread means the breaking of the last magnetic link between the dense body and the remaining principles of the human constitution; the body has dropped away from the man; he is excarnated, disembodied; six principles still remain as his constitution immediately after death, the seventh, or his dense physical body, being left as a cast-off garment.

The body now is left to the rioting of the countless lives of which it is composed, and begins to decay—that is, break up—and with the disintegration of its cells and molecules passes into other combinations.

Death, says Mrs. Besant, consists in a repeated process of unrobing or unsheathing. The immortal part of man shakes off from itself one after another its outer casings, and—as the snake from its skin, the butterfly from its chrysalis—emerges from one after the other, passing into a higher state of consciousness. Now, she says, it is the fact that this escape from the body and this dwelling of the conscious entity, either in the vehicle called the body of desire, the kamic or astral body, or a yet more ethereal thought body, can be effected during earth-life; so that man may become familiar with the excarnated condition, and it may lose for him all the terrors that encircle the unknown.

Leaving the Body at Will.

He can know himself as a conscious entity in either of these vehicles, and so prove to his own satisfaction that life does not depend on his functioning through a physical body. Why should man, who thus repeatedly has "shed" his lower bodies, and has found the process result not in unconsciousness, but in a vastly extended freedom and vividness of life—why should he fear the final casting away of his fetters and the freeing of his mortal self from what he realizes as the prison of the flesh?

Man is held to be a spark, a living flame, passing out from the central fire of the Divine Life. It weaves for itself covering within which it dwells, and thus becomes the reflection of the immortal self.

This sends out its ray, which becomes incased in grosser matter, in the dense body or kamic elements, the passioned nature, and in the etheric double and the physical body. The once free immortal intelligence thus entangled, enswathed, enchained, works heavily and laboriously through the coatings that envelope it. In its own nature it remains ever the free bird of heaven, but its wings are bound to its sides by the matter into which it is plunged.

Opening the Doors of the Prison-House.

When man recognizes his own inherent nature he learns to open his prison doors occasionally and escapes from his prison jail. First, he learns to identify himself with the immortal part of his nature, and rises above the body and its passions into a pure and moral life. Then he learns that the unconquered body cannot hold him prisoner, and he unlocks its door and steps out into the sunshine of the true life. So when death unlocks the door for him he knows the country into which he emerges, having trodden its ways at his own will. And at last he grows to recognize that fact of supreme importance, that life has nothing to do with body and with this material plane; that life is his conscious body and with this material plane; that life is his conscious existence, unbroken, unbreakable, and that the brief interludes in that life during which he sojourns on earth, are but a minute fraction of his conscious existence, and a fraction, moreover, during which he is less alive because of the heavy coverings which weigh him down.

Shadow Like Double of the Body.

The etheric double is the etheric part of the gross body of man. It is the double that is sometimes seen during life in the neighborhood of the body, and its absence from the body generally is marked by the heaviness or semi-lethargy of the latter. Acting as the reservoir or vehicle of the life principle during the earth life, its withdrawal from the body naturally is marked by the lowering of all vital functions, even while the cord which unites the two still is unbroken. The snapping of the cord means the death of the dense physical body.

When the etheric double finally quits the body it does not travel to any distance from it. Normally it remains floating over the body, the state of consciousness being dreamy and peaceful, unless tumultuous distress and violent emotion surround the corpse whence it just has issued. And here it may be well to say that during the slow process of dying, while the etheric double is withdrawing from the body, taking with it the higher principles, as after it has withdrawn, extreme quiet and self-control should be observed in the chamber of death. For during the time the whole life passes swiftly in review before the ego, the individual, as those have related who have passed into the unconscious and pulseless state.

Memory Is Active at Last Moments.

A master has written: "At the last moment the whole life is reflected in our memory, and emerges from all the forgotten nooks and corners, picture after picture, one secret after another. The man often may appear dead, yet from the last pulsation, from and between the last throbbing of his heart and the moment when the last spark of animal heat leaves the body, the brain thinks, and the ego lives over in those brief seconds his whole life. Speak in whispers, ye who assist at a deathbed and find yourselves in the solemn presence of death. Especially have ye to keep quiet just after death has laid her clammy hand upon the body. Speak in whispers, I say, lest ye disturb the quiet ripple of thought and hinder the busy work of the past, casting its reflection upon the veil of the future."

This vivid sight is succeeded in the ordinary person by a dreamy, peaceful semi-consciousness, as the etheric double floats above the body to which it has belonged. Sometimes this double is seen by persons in the house or in the neighborhood, when the thought of the dying has been strongly turned to someone left behind, when some anxiety has been in the mind at the last, something left undone which needed doing, or when some local disturbance has shaken the tranquillity of the passing entity. Under these conditions or others of a similar nature the double may be seen or heard; when seen it shows a dreamy, hazy consciousness, is silent, vague in its aspect, unresponsive.

Etheric Body Appears as Wraith.

As the days go on the five higher principles gradually disengage themselves from the etheric double, and shake this off as they previously shook off the grosser body. They press on, as a five-fold entity, into a state next to be considered, leaving the etheric double with the dense body of which it is the counterpart, thus becoming an ethereal corpse as much as the body had become a dense corpse. The ethereal corpse remains near the dense one, and they disintegrate together.

Clairvoyants see these ethereal wraiths in church-yards, sometimes showing likeness to the dead dense body, sometimes as violet mists or lights.

The man now is clothed with the body of desire, often termed fluidic, so easily does it during earth life take any form impressed upon it from without or molded from within.

The desire body undergoes a marked change soon after death. The different densities of the astral matter of which it is composed arrange themselves in a series of shells or envelopes, the densest being outside, shutting the consciousness away from all but limited consciousness or expression.

Up to the point of this rearrangement of the matter of the desire body the post-mortem experience of all is much the same—a dreamy, peaceful semi-consciousness. And this in the happiest cases passes without vivid awakening into the deeper unconsciousness, which ends with the blissful awakening in heaven for the period of repose that intervenes between two incarnations.

Earthly Emotions Haunt the Soul.

But the average man or woman has lived much in the enjoyment of objects of sense and in the pleasures of the emotions, hence they cannot quickly disentingit themselves from the desire or astral body, the seat of the emotions. Hence a considerable delay in transition while the desires wear themselves out to a point at which they no longer detain the soul with their clinging arms. This is the purgatorial state, the life in paradise ere heaven is reached.

Some of the communications made through mediums are from this source, from the disembodied man thus drawn back to the earth sphere, a cruel kindness, delaying its orderly evolution.

Finally the man sets himself free from the desire body and passes on to the heaven state; the laboror is called in from the field, rich or poor according to the fruitage of his life. He now is wholly beyond the sphere of earth. He is in heaven. Life in heaven is the fruition of the aspirations of earth life; not the indefinite prolongation of a single instant, but its infinite developments, the various incidents based upon the one single moment of moments of rapture. Into heaven enters nothing that defileth, for gross matter has been left behind. But if the sower has sowed but little seed the heavenly harvest will be meager.

Living Men May Visit Heaven.

These regions of purgatory and heaven are known, says Mrs. Besant, to many men and women by personal experience. All that is needed for the study of these regions is the evolution of the faculties latent in every man; a "living" man, in ordinary parlance, can leave the dense and ethereal bodies behind him and explore these regions without going through death's gateway: In this way these regions become matters of knowledge.

These regions interpenetrate our own world and are interpenetrated by it, but the state of matter in the two worlds differs, they co-exist without the knowledge of the intelligent beings in either. Only under abnormal circumstances can consciousness of each other's presence arise in the inhabitants of the different worlds.

IN RE SPIRITUALISM.

The President of the N. S. A. Defends Our Cause Against the Violent Attack of Prof. H. Spencer Lewis.

To the Editor Washington Post:—

In behalf of 300,000 Spiritualists, in the United States and Canada, who have the courage to avow themselves as such before the world, and can give good and sufficient reasons "for the faith that is in them," I respectfully request the use of your columns for a brief reply to an article from the pen of Prof. H. Spencer Lewis, that appeared under prominent headlines in the columns of your highly esteemed Journal, January 13, 1907. With much that Prof. Lewis has said, all well informed Spiritualists are in full accord, for he cannot condemn fraud and chicanery more vigorously nor any more conscientiously than they do. His illustrations as to the ring, the weeping parents, the amazed teacher, and the bogus materialization may all be drawn from fact. Without doubt, many things transpire that are ascribed by the uninformed and over credulous Spiritualists to the agency of excarnate beings. No one among us who has studied the subject of Spiritualism from its scientific, philosophical, and religious aspect could or would be deceived by such simple tricks as those Prof. Lewis exploits as typical of all phenomenal manifestations in Spiritualism. As a matter of fact, all well-informed, progressive members of our denomination outgrew all of these simple and easily explained conditions long before Prof. Lewis and his society were ever known. He has assumed to set forth as evidence of his prowess, and discernment of soul, a few absurdities, which, in his lack of knowledge, he has seen fit to label psychic phenomena. He has succeeded in showing his readers that he knows little or nothing of the subject of which he writes.

His expose of the simple tricks in his two-column article is but the addition of one more testimony to the multitude that the Spiritualists have collected through their own fearless exposure of the knaves who have endeavored to steal the livery of heaven in which to serve Satan. No man, even if he be as opinionated as Prof. Lewis, can gain as much knowledge in nine years, through a FEW experiments as men and women of equal and even superior mental power, have gained through MANY experiments extending over a period of more than sixty years.

In brief, there are people as well qualified to sift and determine evidence as Prof. Lewis, even though they may not be members of his highly respected and most thoroughly respectable society. He has constituted himself counsel for both sides, the Judge and the Jury in the case, and proceeded to pronounce an opinion that he held long before he ever heard of psychic phenomena, or tried to test a phenomenon. If the facts do not conform to his theory, so much the worse for the facts. This statement is warranted by his brazen declaration that the Spiritualists have yet to gave a single proof of spirit communion. He has egotistically placed himself above the wisest and best minds of the ages, to say nothing of such wonderful seers and prophets as the gentle Nazarene, the Apostle Paul, Swedenborg, John and Charles Wesley, Flammarion, C. E. Varley, A. R. Wallace, J. J. Mapes and hundreds of others in comparison with whom Spencer Lewis, Professor though he is, is as a mole-hill to a mountain, a pygmy to a giant.

It is quite clear that Prof. Lewis is not posted with regard to what his intelligent superiors accomplished in the field of psychic science long before he entered it. Andrew Jackson Davis as long ago as 1845 proved beyond possibility of a doubt that excarnate intelligences can and do communicate with the denizens of the earth. John and Charles Wesley, as well as Emmanuel Swedenborg, did the same thing in the eighteenth century. Upon the proof given by Jesus of Nazareth, Paul was able to establish a world religion known as Christianity. In 1851, Cora L. V. Scott, a child of eleven years, gave proof that dumfounded the wiseacres of that day, as to the interference of spirits in the affairs of men.

In 1853 and '54, Prof. Robert Hare gave ample scientific evidence of the fact of spirit communion through his crucial tests of the phenomena examined by him. In 1857, a boy in Harvard College, Fred. L. H. Willis, gave such wonderful evidence of the presence of spirit intelligences and their ability to make themselves known to their friends, that he was expelled from that classical institution by reason of his having given its learned faculty such an overdose of truth as to make them tremble lest they have to give up their theories for his wonderful facts.

From 1870 to 1874, Sir William Crookes made most painstaking investigation of all kinds of occult phenomena and was forced to admit that the only possible explanation for his array of facts was that spirits of the so-called dead were able to communicate with mortals.

Equally crucial tests were made by Prof. Cromwell F. Varley, Prof. Alfred Russell Wallace, Prof. Zollner, Prof. Rudolph Virchow, Carl du Prel, Col. Albert de Rochas, Count Alexander Aksakoff, Matthews Fidler, and other men equally intelligent and eminent in scholarship, scientific acumen and ability to weigh evidence. Over their own signatures, these eminent men and their confreres declare that they have proved the great truth that spirits out of the body can give intelligent and helpful messages to spirits in the body.

Prof. Thomson J. Hudson, of just name and fame, and exceptionally gifted in his special field of study, has gone so far as to declare that "He who doubts or denies psychic phenomena, is not entitled to be called a skeptic; he is simply ignorant." Of course. Prof. Hudson does not admit that these phenomena of themselves emanate altogether from spirit agencies, yet he does admit that some of them at least, are due to the forces whose nature is not yet known to scientists. Against the evidences of these men, against their solemn observations as to the absolute truth of their statements, let Prof. Spencer Lewis measure his few experiments, and painful lack of knowledge. In whose favor would the comparison really be? The feeble, infantile utterances of Prof. Lewis would not be heard at any given distance by reason of the resonant vibrations that would fill the air from witnesses qualified to speak.

Prof. Lewis and his friends, as well as his apologists, are requested to take notice that none of these people whose names are given above made use of the puerile methods he describes at such length, to establish the fact of spirit communion; only the most crucial and painstaking tests would do for them, hence they wasted little if any time upon the tricks with which Prof. Lewis was pleased to satisfy himself. Again I will admit that many of the so-called messages can be traced to clever guess-work and shrewd observations; but MANY by no means implies that ALL can be thus explained. Given the guess-work and trickery even to enormous quantities; there yet remains the residuum of fact which can be explained only through spirit intervention in the affairs of men.

Prof. Lewis has neglected this most valuable and important residuum in order that he might indulge in a good play spell with many bushels of chaff. He has manifested neither the zeal of a true scientist nor yet the open mind of a philosopher. The millions of intelligent men and women who have been testing psychic phenomena through all of the ages, especially since 1843, have not done so simply for amusement. They have been in search of truth, and in that searching they have been rewarded by revelations more valuable than all the scientists unitedly have been able to produce in a thousand years. They have discovered the most precious of all truths—that death does not end all; that man lives on in a more progressive state of existence from which he can send his message of love to those dear ones of his life whom he left upon the earth. This discovery had been made and the proof thereof given by and through the agency of Spiritualism.

Let Prof. Lewis hug his empty delusions, dig up, expose, explain away, exploit all of the tricks and nonsense that he can find, yet over all, around all, and beyond all is the one thing he has not been able to grasp, much less destroy or overcome—and that one thing is—THE GENUINE MESSAGE FROM THE WORLD OF SOULS TO SOME MORTAL IN THE WORLD OF SENSE. Yours for Truth.

I KNOW THE TRUTH.

"Ye Shall Know the Truth, and the Truth Shall Make You Free."

When we say "I know," we make a positive assertion that we are convinced of the truth, and can no more depart from that knowledge than time can cease to move.

We cannot forget our childhood education, but we must learn to unlearn much that was taught us that was not the truth. We cannot consistently blame our teachers; they taught the best that was in them in their understanding of religious matters. The teachers of the truth have come later on and revolutionized the old orthodox theory, and are in the present day teaching the teachers.

The "I know" fills every pore of the material body, it goes to make up our being. It enfolds us in its embrace and purifies us by excluding all our false education; it removes the old and brings in the new.

True Spiritualists live, move, and have being in the "I know the truth." It is the world in which they exist, and no one who has embraced it fully will ever depart from its teachings, but will make every exertion to teach it to others and learn them to say "I know"; and as we gather them in, we are living our Spiritualism in all it teaches.

We know we exist throughout all eternity. We know nature ushered us into being for a purpose, and in finding out that purpose we have discovered our mission, and that is to make the world better by teaching the truth, and banishing error and superstition.

Invite them in, learn them how to try the spirits, and when they can say "I know," they have gained their freedom, they are no longer slaves to the creed of the church, they have stepped forth into the sunlight of love, light, wisdom, truth and justice; they have come out from underneath the bondage of ignorance, into the light of heaven, and caused great rejoicing among their spirit friends.

When I was brought to the point where I could say "I know," it became a day of rejoicing to me. My spirit has been laughing, singing, dancing, ever since, to know I am eighty years young, and blessing Spiritualism night and day.

Give me my "I know," and you may have all the churches in christendom, with preachers, priests and bibles thrown in. I have traveled up out of the valley of ignorance and am dwelling on the mountain of our true philosophy, and am looking far out, beholding nature robed in spiritual garments, holding up the torch of enlightenment to the children of earth, and they are awakening from their slumber, casting off their fetters, marshalling on their hosts, holding their banner high, joining the ranks of Spiritualism as their only savior; it is the cross of the Legion of Honor; it is worn by all true believers, it is the emblem by which they are known and they are proud to wear it.

Our religion demands of us to be up and doing, to prepare the way for the incoming generation, by laying a firm foundation for them to build upon what we have commenced. They find many a breach to repair, or room for improvements; there will be spies, and frauds to be removed from the camp of the army; the sentinels to be more vigilant on guard duty, traitors to be ferreted out and all wrong righted.

The present generation being the advance guard that shouldered arms when the tiny rap tapped the drum, are still marching on to victory and constantly adding new recruits until we can estimate our army up to the millions, throughout the nations of earth. Heralds from European nations bring good tidings of the work going forward; they are not lagging for the want of spirit of action, but are battling bravely for the cause of Spiritualism. Clairvoyants can see legions of spirits marching shoulder to shoulder with the veterans, shouting the glad tidings, "We come." Fraud will be no bar to the advancing army, they will overcome all obstacles, and hang their banners on the outer wall.

To know the truth is to know the keystone of the arch of Spiritualism, the arch that supports the greatest knowledge ever given to man, that was given by the tiny rap.

That rap has changed the face of the religious world. It came without our bidding, it has come to stay. To us it is a divine revelation; they are founded on natural law. Those who fight the truth of spirit return, fight all tangible knowledge of immortality, fight answers to prayer, fight their loved ones in heaven, fight spirit angels and the universal intelligence. The mystic rap echoed around the world, and there was joy in heaven. It has startled the earth from slumber, it has burst into the sunlight of day, and millions are entranced by it. Our truth goes marching on and by putting our shoulders to the wheels of the N. S. A., and the good old Progressive Thinker we can say we have met the enemy and they are ours.

HE HAS A SOUL.

Chicago Dog Solves Mathematical Problems With Ease.

The family of a teacher who lives on the south side is the proud possessor of a marvelous dog whose feats of calculation rival those of Jim Key, Bozzie, Hans, and all the other popular pets which have ben publicly exhibited. "Tasseau," however, performs solely for the entertainment of the friends of his master, who is justly proud of the results achieved.

This ultra-cultured, super-educated dog, to whom mathematics is the merest child's play, has nothing weird or uncanny about his appearance. He is a big, handsome tan and white Scotch collie, who has a knowing twinkle in his eye and an irrisistibly confidential way of wagging his bushy tail. He looks like all the other dogs that are well versed only in shaking hands, playing dead, and the niceties of canine etiquette.

But Tasseau can understand everything you say to him. He can add, subtract, multiply, divide, count money, and do several other stunts which would feaze a human being of his own age. And he is willing to display his talents, not only at his master's request, but also for anyone else who wins his confidence.

Collie Does Sums in Arithmetic.

The question, "Do animals reason?" pops up with about as much regularity as the old favorites, "Is Mars inhabited?" "Should women vote?" and others of their school. Yet there is no doubt that we are a long way from the answer to any of them. Cynics who come with theories to explain the exploits of this smart dog are disarmed when he responds with alacrity to their questions.

Tasseau's master arranges the performance with a fine feeling for climax. His pet first wins your heart by "playing doughnut," "pretending to be a roast turkey," saying his prayers, and other similar pretty tricks.

At length the more trying part of the test begins.

"How much is 2 and 3?" asks a voice.

The dog raises his paw deliberately, once, twice, three times, four times—five times!

"How much is 5 from 8?"

Three times the paw is raised.

"Good doggie!" says his master, and Tasseau gets his reward—a piece of his favorite kind of ginger cookie.

"Multiply 3 by 2."

"Six is right, and more cake for you, Tasseau."

Solves Written Problem Without Mistake.

"O, well," you say to his master, "there is something about your voice that guides him. Write down a sum and let him do it."

The sum is written on a card, and the dog responds. Division, subtraction, and multiplication are successively indicated on paper, and each time Tasseau covers himself with glory.

You are overwhelmed, but your astonishment reaches its height when Tasseau copes successfully with problems of this sort: 10 plus 2 times 2 divided by 6; and then with multiplications involving two figures, such as 9 times 4. This he indicates by raising his paw first three times and then six times.

To convince you that there is no trick, his master leaves you alone in the room with the dog, and if you are the right sort of an individual, and look as if you could be trusted, Tasseau will respond as readily to you as to his owner. He counts five when you show him a nickel, and eleven when you display a dime and a penny. Wise dog, this!

Finally you are more abstract in your remarks.

"How many people are there in the room?" you inquire, aggressively. "How many men? How many women? How many dogs?" (Tasseau always counts himself as a person.)

Pleads Guilty When He Makes Error.

"How many books have I in my hand?" you ask, as a last resort, and when the paw motions four times you fall back in your chair at a loss, your last vague theory about signals completely invalidated.

Just as you are going to ask humbly whether Tasseau ever makes a mistake you notice that he is insisting that 4 and 2 make 5. You are relieved. You are glad to know that to err is canine as well as human.

"Why, Tasseau!" says his master, "you can't make us believe anything like that!"

Tasseau looks foolish for a moment, and then wags his tail submissively.

"Well, I won't be dogmatic about it," he means, and he raises his paw for the sixth time.

How to explain this phenomenon? Psychologists insist that reason has been denied to every animal except man; and yet every now and then inexplicable cases of this sort are found. What is the answer? Tasseau rolls his eyes knowingly, growls a bit, and goes on munching his cake; but that doesn't help much.—Chicago Tribune.

MORIBUND.

Can'st thou, then, oh, Life, desert me,
Fail me now, that Pain doth give Fearful fancies in the darkness
Torture through which none could live?

As you start, oh, life, to leave me,
Mocking memories arise
Memories that will haunt, and grieve me,
Must, till Death shall seal my eyes.

For, oh, life, with wanton Pleasure
Dallied I, and wasted thee,
Sought not for the soul's great treasure
Faith in immortality.

Pause! I clutch thy form to hold thee,
Life! I cannot let thee go,
Thou wert mine. I would enfold thee!
Breath of mine—thou fallest—so—

Would'st thou leave me in the gloaming,
Where the phantoms cold and gray
Whisper of the sad entombing
Shutting out the light of day?

Oh, the torpor slowly creeping
Upward to my burning brain
Nearer, Stygian waves are sweeping,
Deathlike cold is numbing pain.

Day and night hath sleep forsaken
Pillows that my head hath pressed;
Life, and I, will soon be taken
Once—forever—on her breast.

Could I speak to tell the anguish
That o'erwhelms my tortured soul,
Pulses fall me, eyelids languish,
Where, oh whither, is the goal?

Faintly now my heart doth flutter
Fainter pulses, shorter breath—
Human lips could never utter,
Ah! Dear God! The Joy of Death!

The Psychic Riddle.

By I. K. Funk, D.D., LL.D., Editor-in-Chief of "The Standard Dictionary"; Author of "The Widow's Mite, and Other Psychic Phenomena," "The Next Step in Evolution," etc.

A book full of psychic suggestions, supported by startling experiences, all told in a wonderfully conservative way. It harmonizes with the judgment pronounced by The Review of Reviews, New York, on the author's previous publication of this subject: "A very sensible, cautious, level-headed piece of work all through;" and also with the judgment on the same book pronounced by the Cleveland Record: "There has never been so fair and painstaking a book put forth on this subject as this one." Price, $1.00.

PROTISTA.

The Kingdom of the Unseen, as Explored by Hudson Tuttle.

Beneath the ordinary visible world of animate beings is another in many respects so unlike anything we see, that it seems a different creation. Our unaided senses bring to us the cognizance of a realm of organic forms, ranging from the moss to the oak; from the minnow to the whale; from the mouse to the elephant, and we think these larger beings limit creative power. But if we bring to our aid the magnifying glass, we find that beyond the verge of beings visible to the unassisted senses, lies a kingdom of the unseen, such as the senses never dreamed of.

Its portals are entered by means of the microscope, and having entered, we are amazed by the display of countless species having methods of life which appear like fairy tales, or freaks of creative power. It is a domain where Life in Nature appears to have its beginnings and there are glimpses of the processes by which Cosmic Intelligence expresses itself through the plastic forms of matter.

So distinct has research shown these to be, that it has been proposed to place them in a new kingdom, called Protista. The characteristics of animal and vegetable are so blended in most of these beings that naturalists have been at a loss where to place them—whether they were plants or animals. And the same difficulty is met with in the new classification of the Protista into Protophytes, beings approaching plants, and Protozoa, beings approaching animals. There is such blending and shading together, that prominent species have been repeatedly transferred from one of these divisions to the other. The presence of chlorophyl, the coloring matter, usually green, found in plants, at one time was taken as a distinguishing character, and all forms in which it was present were classed as plants; but it is now well known that it is present in species which in every other respect are animals. The dividing line is as indeterminable as that between a hill and the valley into which it descends.

Before going farther, I wish to explain to the reader that while I propose to give a plain presentation of the subject and avoid technical phraseology, I have no choice in the names which have been given to these beings by naturalists. They may appear pedantic and out of all keeping with the monads they stand for, but these little creatures have no other.

Where Are They Found?

Almost everywhere, the exception being where they are not. In salt and fresh water, in soil, in all decaying substances, animal and vegetable infusions, in the blood and various organs of higher animals they swarm, being the active cause of decay, fermentation, of many malignant diseases, and contributing to normal growth.

How Large Are They?

The lens of the highest power has limitations beyond which we cannot pass and leaves us at these minute forms as the telescope at the other extreme leaves the astronomer. He may increase the power and new stars appear, but there are always stars beyond, which the strongest glass makes no more than points scarcely distinguishable from the blending light of space. There are beings plainly discernible, others just perceptible, and beyond this horizon, the yet unseen. Among the smallest of these monads are the most elegant of the Flagalants which swarm in infusions of animal matter.

a—Dallingeria; b—Monas lens; c—Bacteria termo.

A characteristic form is represented in figure 1; a is the Dallingeria; b the Monas lens, or lens-shaped Monas. If 4,000 of the first were placed loosely in a line, that line would reach an inch in length; or 16,000,000 would be required to cover a square inch; one cubic inch would hold 65 billions. The Monas is still smaller, taking 5,000 to make a row an inch in length, or for a cubic inch, 125 billions, which is about 9,000 times the human population of the earth.

In weight it has been estimated that 41 billions of Bacteria termo would possibly weigh one grain.

Incomprehensible as this number, it is as a unit to that which applies to yet smaller bacteria which have been observed and at least approximately measured. The bacteria termo (fig. 1—c) is nearly to the limit of the highest magnifying power that can be applied, and to make out the flagellum requires the greatest skill in manipulation. It is the cause of putrefactive decay, and hence is always present when that process is taking place. In an infusion of flesh these bacteria may be cultivated and observed. They are olive-shaped with a thin flagellum or lash in constant motion. They are 1-20.000th of an inch in diameter and somewhat of greater length. This means that a cup, an inch cube in measure will contain 800 trillions of these beings. These Bacteria are ranked with the Protophytes and in the division of Algae and Lichens.

A Study of Some Species Found in Water.

If we take a drop of stagnant water and place it under the microscope, of high power, a new world, hitherto unseen, greets our astonished vision. It seems as though the horizon lifted and we stood on the threshold of a new creation. Strange and grotesque forms dart across the field of view, a myriad swarm in a vast sea, and we see the same struggle for existence in the tiny drop as in the great world around us. There are quiet vegetable feeders browsing among the algae, and rapacious carnivora, restless hunters, devouring incredible quantities of food. It is difficult to count the number in the ocean of a drop, and in a cubic foot the count would run into millions and millions of millions. But be not alarmed, for few of these are harmful, the most being beneficial, purifying the earth and water. They are the scavengers, the great transforming agency of nature.

What Are They Like?

It would be difficult to give a description by which they would be recognized, without drawings, so different are they from anything the eye is accustomed to. They are embryonic forms—the beginnings of life in individual being. The lowest and typical groups are formless specks of a jelly-like substance, comparable to the white of an egg, which has been called protoplasm. The clear, viscid substance which is present in all animals and plants where there is growth, is protoplasm. It is called by some authors sarcode. The lowest beings are simply fragments of this protoplasm. This speck of jelly, not as large as the smallest grain of dust by a thousand times, has no specialized organs whatsoever, nor permanent shape. It has no outer covering; is homogeneous throughout except a spot, or granule in its substance and something like an air cell or vacuole. These are frequently wanting. They have no mouth or stomach, no trace of nerves, although if as it has been conjectured they have sensation, they must have a "diffused" nervous system. They move in the water by thrusting forward a portion of their substance. They are constantly on the hunt for food, and when they meet another infusoria often larger than themselves, they simply fold their jelly-substance around it, any place opening for a mouth and any part acting for a digestive sac. The prey thus embedded soon dissolves. As the substance is perfectly transparent, the food is plainly discernible at all stages of digestion.

a—Amoeba in its quiescent state; b—one of its many aspects.

Figure 2 represents an amoeba; a is its quiescent shape; b one of its many changing aspects. This speck, when closely observed, will be seen to constantly change form. The projections or arms, are drawn in, and others sent out in other portions. At times so many are projected that they absorb the body and seem only to touch a central point, at other times a single projection will reach out like a finger. By these elongations, the being is able to move through the water. While thus moving, if one of the protista which serve it for food, is touched by one of the arms, it is held fast, other arms close on it, and it is drawn into the substance of its captor. Although there is no stomach cavity, the food is digested and absorbed.

Figure 3 is a Rotifer which belongs to the highest types of Protista. They are among the most interesting objects presented by the microscope. Like beautifully shaped wine-glasses attached to slender stems they wave to and fro in the current. The upper rim is surrounded by a fringe of celia, in constant circular motion drawing food to the mouth which is in the center of the vortex. The hardening of the protoplasmic body has encased it in a strong envelop, and it has a digestive sac and nerve ganglia. A very simple being, a stomach like a bag with the open end for mouth, and around the mouth a row of celia for the capture of food, and locomotion.

Locomotion.

The locomotion of these beings is unlike walking, running, or flying. An inventor required to furnish means of propulsion and forbidden the use of wings, legs or fins, would be at a loss what scheme to adapt to supply these essentials. But the problem is worked out in several ways in the structure of these beings. Some have celia or hairs in rings or over their whole bodies, which work simultaneously, driving them rapidly forward or back. Others have a flagellum or lash at one or both extremities which they use as a sculling oar.

The above cuts show two typical generic forms of the flagellum; one c, of the free moving Euglenidae, the other, d, the Circumanus. The latter being stationary and in colonies, the flagellum is used exclusively for seizing its prey. Its method of doing this is shown in the figure at a.

Intelligence.

Do these beings think? Have they any intelligence? It is remarkable that some of these forms which are most nearly related to plants, most clearly manifest sensation and simulate the animal so far as to have rudimentary eyes. If we accept the doctrine of evolution then we must say that the two great lines along which the animal and vegetable kingdoms traveled, blended at their beginning and for a time traversed the same course. But in plant life the course of evolution changed and whatever had been attained was lost. No one can watch these beings without becoming convinced that they have sensation. Their movements show a choice of direction. Some are sluggish and take things easy, but the most are active and always hungry. Yet they have a choice and are epicureans in their taste. This speck of jelly may not have had a meal in a week, but it will not take indiscriminately into its substance anything it meets. Some of them are herbivorous, others are carnivorous. The food of the former is mainly algae. There is one species that feeds exclusively on bacteria. A majority are omnivorous, taking everything which comes to their open mouths.

An attempt has been made to explain this choice of food by supposing there is an affinity between the food and the substance of the animal. The materialist would thus bridge the gulf between life and matter.

Another theory is that the size of the mouth determines the choice. That is flatly contradicted by the rejection of certain species regardless of size. When an amoeba meets with an indigestible body it throws out a protuberance and pushes it away, but when it meets an infusoria it relishes, the protuberance does not push it away. The end becomes a crater or cup into the hollow of which the victim is engulfed by the folding of the edges over it.

a—Mature and attached by a footstalk; b—Early and free state; at a and b the filaments a Rotifer and an Amoeba.

A step above the Amoeba is the Actinophrys, differing in this, that from the body radiate long filaments which extend on every side. The Acinetae (fig. 6) are furnished with similar filamentous arms, differing in being hollow and having suckers at their ends. When an infusoria comes within reach, one of these arms is thrown around it like a lasso, it is drawn close and other arms grasp it and one of the suckers is applied and the contents of its body transferred to that of the captor. The Acineta has a choice, and selects from the passing swarm such only as belong to the species it prefers.
